GENTLEMEN,—I have received your chain per express, for which I paid $1 50. I have also received with it, I consider it a cheap article. Please send me one of the same description as the watch you sent before. Send it C. O. D., by express, to Fort Union, New Mexico, where the mail conductor from this post will receive them for me on their arrival expenses. I have no doubt but I will be able to procure a number of orders when the watches are sent here.

Yours respectfully,

J. R. BOTCH, Quartermaster Sergeant, Co. "F," 37th U. S. Infantry.

LITTLE ROCK, ARKANSAS, December 21, 1867.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

SIRS.—Please send me one more of your oriode watches. I received the watch you sent, and I am very much obliged for such a good timepiece. Very respectfully,

FARRINGTON, IOWA, December 25, 1867.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co., New York:

GENTLEMEN,—I am much pleased with the watches, and concluded to keep them both. There is another order on the way for you, sent on my account. Hoping the above may be satisfactory, and expecting to send more soon, I remain,

Yours truly,

A. T. CRUCEN.

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA, January 19, 1868.

Messrs. Collins & Co.:

GENTS.—We are very much pleased with the watches, and have no fear but they will give satisfaction them generally. Hoping your advertisement in our paper will do you much good, &c.,

M. T. WOLF, PRESS OFFICE.

BLACKSHEAR, GEORGIA, December 27, 1867.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

GENTLEMEN,—You will please send me one of your oriode hunting watches by express to Blackshear, Ga.

—No. 8, A. & G. R. R.—C.O.D. I saw the watch you sent to Mr. W. W. Campbell, which created a great sensation. I think you will be astonished if you hold and prove the watch. I would be pleased to be your agent if I would be any help to you. There will be quite a number here that will send for watches in a short time.

Respectfully yours,

E. F. SWEAT.

FORT UNION, NEW MEXICO, December 29, 1867.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

SIRS.—I have the pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of your watch, and it gives entire satisfaction; but you forgot to send me the $2 chain. You will please send me one from me before long. Yours respectfully,

JAMES DILLON, "A" Co., 3d Cavalry, Fort Union, New Mexico.

TOPEKA, KANSAS, January 4, 1868.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

SIRS.—The watch came safely to hand to-day. I think it will prove all I expected. Please send me one ladies' size, double case, by the Merchants' Union Express, Topeka, Shawnee Co., Kansas, G. W. Wines. Please send me a nice watch, and oblige

GEORGE W. WINES.

GUNPOWDER, $1 25, best $1 50 ℔ lb.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20c., 25c., 30c., 35c., best 40c. per pound. Hotels, Saloons, Boarding-House Keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in their outlay by using our French Breakfast and Dinner Coffee, which we sell at the low price of 30c. per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50c. to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St. (Post-Office Box, No. 5643), New York City.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

The great cost system of supplying clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city.

Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a club say how much tea or coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Then let some one person constitute himself or some one club in existence be appointed to act as agent, and we will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost, so there may be no mistakes in their distribution —such party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the club can divide equitably among themselves.

The funds to pay for the goods ordered are to be sent by drafts on New York, by post-office money orders, or by express, as may suit the convenience of the club. Or, if the amount ordered is large, say $50 or $100, and desired, the goods by Express to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We make no complimentary package for Clubs of less than $30.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-third by sending directly to "The Great American Tea Company."

BEWARE of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our Establishment, or any one name, either wholly or in part, as they are bogus or imitations. We have no branches, and do not, in any case, authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office orders and drafts make payable to the order of the Great American Tea Company. Direct letters and orders to the Great American Tea Company,

QUEEN VICTORIA'S JOURNAL:

OUR LIFE IN THE HIGHLANDS.

LEAVES FROM THE JOURNAL OF OUR LIFE IN THE HIGHLANDS, from 1848 to 1861. To which are prefixed and added Extracts from the same Journal giving an Account of Earlier Visits to Scotland, and Tours in England and Ireland, and Yachting Excursions. Edited by ARTHUR HELPS. 12mo, Morocco-Cloth, Beveled Edges, $1 75.

The charm of this volume is, in one word, its inimitable artlessness, and its entire freedom from pretension, affectation, and cant. These are marks of the highest breeding, and the highest breeding adds dignity and grace to the highest station.—In the Journals all is natural and all is pure.—Edinburgh Review.

They have the charm which perfect naturalness combined with exquisite gracefulness might give to another writer; but from her natural writer they have a far higher interest. They serve, as nothing which was written for the purpose of doing it could serve, to set before her people the real tone of the life which their queen has been for so many years combining healing: its simplicity, its truthfulness, its high family affectionateness, its thorough sympathy with all around the royal persons who form the centre of the group, and who, even in hours of unusual rest from public business, are still engaged in discharging household duties and cares, and kindness which few humble people could equal, and perhaps none surpass.—Quarterly Review.

Her Journal is remarkable for a healthful simplicity: it shows her to possess a well-trained mind, refined and cultivated taste, rational judgment, and a ready appreciation of goodness. . . . A valuable legacy to after times, and a most useful contribution to the history of her reign.—Round Table.

Since the Queen's belief in her own luck of literary gifts is strongly expressed, most persons will be inclined to note the evidence which the "Leaves" afford, either in favor of this belief or against it. Our own opinion is that the belief rests on no better ground than that pleasing natural diffidence which is felt by every true artist when he ventures on a new path. There is indeed, a very great difference in style between the early and the later writing. What the Queen wrote at twenty-three is prettily girlish—tender, sentimental, rather gushing—compared with what she wrote at forty-seven. Each style has its own charm of lightness; and in all the Queen's writing there is a freshness which compensates a reader for the absence of severer and more conscious art.—Athenæum.

Emphatically a home book, detailing in plain, homely language the joys, sorrows, and household events which mark the daily life of a model wife, mother, and woman.—Home Journal.

The pictures given of scenes of much interest are natural and pleasing.—Boston Traveller.

Written in a pleasing, unaffected style, and deals very familiarly with every-day occurrences.—Boston Journal.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $1 75.

Also ready a New Edition of QUEEN VICTORIA'S MEMOIR OF THE PRINCE CONSORT. The Early Years of His Royal Highness the Prince Consort. Compiled, under the Direction of Her Majesty the Queen, by Lieutenant-General the Hon. C. GREY. Portraits. 12mo, Morocco-Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 00.

A mute appeal to our better nature.—Fraser's Magazine.

A unique book in literary history.—Round Table.

It were well that it should enter into every household in England and America, as an example of goodness and of stainless honor.—Home Journal.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $2 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS,

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

ONE WHO KNOWS.

A cloth all dripping wet with PAIN
Drives inflammation out,
Brings back the smile to laughing eyes,
And scatters every doubt.

PAIN PAINT is trump, we bet our pike,
For all who look can see
That false reliefs are sinking fast—
Soon dead as dead can be.

The poor or rich can buy PAIN PAINT:
'Tis sold at every store;
Twenty-five cents and fifty too—
Dollar bottles holding more.

Five-dollar bottles take the run;
You save three dollars sure.
They hold a pint, some much more than gold,
Of WOLCOTT'S PAIN PAINT pure.

All pills and physic out of style,
I hear the people cry;
But give us PAIN PAINT's cooling touch
When fever rages high.

All rheumatism leaves, my boys:
PAIN PAINT is tested free
In Chatham Square, New York, my lads,

"Economy is Wealth."—Franklin.

WHY will people pay $50 or $100 for a Sewing Machine when $18 will buy a better one for all PRACTICAL purposes? Notwithstanding reports to the contrary, many subscribers log to inform their numerous friends that the "FRANKLIN" and "MEDALLION" machines can be had in any quantity. This Machine is a double thread, complete with Tucker, constructed upon entirely new principles, and DOES NOT infringe upon any other in the world. It is emphatically the poor man's Sewing Machine, and is warranted to excel all others, as thousands of purchasers will testify. ☞ AGENTS WANTED.—Machines sent to Agents on trial, and GIVEN AWAY to families who do not remunerate. (The qualities and resemblance of this new metal are such, compared to gold, that every one is deceived) and "ROSKOFF'S PATENTED PEOPLE'S WATCH."
TRADE MARK.
REGISTERED
The Improved Bronze Aluminum of which my watches are made is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. It has seriously occupied the attention of scientific men, and has not only called forth the eulogiums of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition, and even been favorably noticed by rescript of His Holiness Pius IX., authorizing its use in the manufacturing of Church goods.
The qualities of this metal are such that it is surpassed by none, if we except gold itself, and that only on account of the intrinsic value of the latter. Further details will be found in my circular, which will be sent postpaid on demand.
My watches are made of three sizes, all huntingcased—one small for ladies or kids, and two for gents. The movements are well finished, carefully put together by skilful workmen, and perfectly regulated. I can therefore warrant them a correct time-keeper. These goods being manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to sell any of the above sizes at the extremely low price of $16 00. None genuine unless bearing my Trade-mark as above. A full assortment of all kinds of chains always on hand.
Goods sent by express, C.O.D., with charges.

WANTED, AGENTS, $75 to $200 per month, every where, male and female, to introduce the GENUINE IMPROVED COMMON SENSE FAMILY SEWING MACHINE. This Machine will stitch, hem, fell, tuck, quilt, cord, bind, braid, and embroider in a most superior manner.
It will sew from fifteen hundred to two thousand stitches per minute, and is fully warranted for five years. We will pay $1000 for any machine that will sew a stronger, more beautiful, or more elastic seam than ours. It makes the "Elastic Lock Stitch." Every second stitch can be cut and still the cloth can not be pulled apart without tearing it. We pay agents from $75 to $200 per month and expenses, or a commission from which twice that amount can be made. Address SECOMB & CO., PITTSBURGH, PA., or BOSTON, MASS.
Caution.—Do not be imposed upon by other parties palming off worthless cast-iron machines, under the same name or otherwise. Ours is the only genuine and really practical sheep machine manufactured.

SOONER OR LATER. A Novel. By SHIRLEY BROOKS, Author of "The Silver Cord," &c., &c. With Illustrations by GEORGE DU MAURIER. 8vo, Cloth, $1 00; Paper, $1 50.

We are enabled to congratulate Mr. Shirley Brooks on the many excellences of a tale by which his permanent place among English novelists will be in a great measure decided. In more senses than one "Sooner or Later" is his magnum opus so far as prose fiction is concerned.—The Sunday Times.

It is not often that we meet with a novel of which we can truly say that the plot is highly ingenious, the style is singularly effective, and the tone is thoroughly good; but these merits are united in the case of the book now before us.—London Review.

Mr. Brooks has produced his most powerful and most artistic work. "Sooner or Later" is a more remarkable book than often comes under the critic's eye.—Illustrated London News.

There is a healthy, vigorous tone about all he writes, that never satisfies, and is always welcome. . . . The dialogue is occasionally very sparkling.—Examiner.

On the great beauty of "Sooner or Later" in the perfection of character-painting which it displays. Some of the personages who flit across its pages—such as that glorious creation Magdalen Dorner, the heroine, and the quaint, witty, astute, worldly barrister, Mr. Sergeant Penguin—are simply admirable.—Illustrated Times.

Every reader who can appreciate the sparkling style, the fine healthy flow of animal spirits, the artistic effects, the smart sayings, the clear emphatic humorous scenes, the pathos even, will enjoy a double enjoyment from its perusal." For all those graces are added to the mere charm of a clever story, which is very great. The mystery of the opening chapter is kept up to the last, and the interest is absorbing all along. Besides which there are several distinct side creations, full of life and power and interest, that run parallel to, and touch and mingle with, the main threads.—Scotsman.

For Mr. Shirley Brooks, though claiming full scope in conversations and descriptions for the display of his rare epigrammatic skill and power of clear, bright narration, indulges himself and his readers with a tremendous, harrowing plot, whose mystery is most dexterously maintained throughout.—London Telegraph.

THE NATIONAL INQUEST.

THE President of the United States is impeached, and will be tried under the Constitution and by the laws; and Mayor HOFFMAN of New York made an exceedingly silly remark when he said that the assassins of ABRAHAM LINCOLN and the impeachers of ANDREW JOHNSON will be equally infamous in history. Whether Mr. HOFFMAN seriously thinks so, or merely said so under the pressure of party necessity, he is entitled to be pitied. The immediate and remarkable change of opinion and of action upon the part of the House of Representatives was sufficient to show that impeachment was not a party measure. Indeed, however desirable it might have been thought in an exclusively party view, it was the almost unanimous conviction of the dominant party that the offenses of the President, however disastrous in their consequences, were not such open and absolute violations of law and of his duty as imperatively to demand impeachment. But when, emboldened by a wise forbearance, the President pointedly violated the law and defied the Representatives of the people, seizing with one hand the prerogative of Congress and with the other that of the Supreme Court, thus usurping all the functions of the Government, the remedy which the Constitution provides was promptly applied, and he was solemnly summoned to answer to the country and to declare the reasons of his conduct.

The summons revealed the truth that the President had no friends. No party in the country is responsible for him. The republicans elected him, and he has striven to overlay to defeat their policy. The Democrats thought him rather worse than CALIGULA'S horse; and although the Democratic party had advocated for the mission to Austria, and their late Presidential candidate Minister to England; although he corrects chiefly with the most monstrous of the Democratic and Republicratic successes at the polls as vindications of his policy; although he has struggled hard to deliver the late rebel States wholly into the power of the rebels, and to cause the abandonment and betrayal of those to whom he promised to be a Moses; yet the Democratic party have not for a day chief Secretaries philo filled with old Whigs and Republicans, while the faithful have been kept from a monopoly of the patronage. This is the mortal sin which "the natural enemies" of the country never forgive, and the Democrats, who were glad enough to use him as a party weapon against the Republicans, turn quietly upon their backs when he plainly transcends the law, and without a word for him betake themselves to maligning and falsifying those who bring him to judgment.

But all the Democratic orators in Congress, all the newspapers which oppose the impeachment, all the speakers at the "Conservative" meeting of protest—whether the wise Mr. GERARD, the consistent Mr. BROOKS, or the foolish Mr. HOFFMAN—say but two things: first, that Mr. JOHNSON was not appointed by the President; and, second, that the President has a right to test the constitutionality of the law. The first point is very small quibble, and did Mr. STANTON happen to be Secretary of War under the present Administration? Because the President, finding him in office, invited him to remain. It was the only way in which, under the circumstances, he could have been appointed; and it would be very hard to show that the right to remain was not a perfect appointment. As to the second point, the simple and sufficient reply is that if the President chooses to test a law he must do it as every other citizen does, at the risk of the consequences. The police do not release a sneak-thief until the constitutionality of the law against larceny, which declares that he possessions, can be determined. He is tried for violating the law. The position taken by the opponents of impeachment is really that when the President refuses to execute a law for unconstitutionality, and it is passed over his veto by the constitutional two-thirds, he may still impose his veto, and refuse to obey the law until the Court holds it to be valid. If this be not a fundamental change in our system of government, we should like to know what would be? If this be not revolution, there is no such thing.

One of the most persistent defamers of Congress says that "it can not be unlawful for the President to violate an unconstitutional law, which is simply no law at all." If this means any thing, it is that the President may decide the question of constitutionality; or may refuse to execute the law until he can have a decision of the Supreme Court. But if he may refuse to execute one law he may refuse to execute all laws, until he has such a decision, and all legislation must wait, if he chooses to call it unconstitutional, until the Court pronounces; the Court, of course, taking its own time. When the people of the United States assent to such a doctrine as this they will assent to the overthrow of their own power, and will have intrusted the Government to one man elected for four years, and to nine men appointed for life.

Those who think impeachment an exciting disturbance are mainly the supporters of the renction which would place the country as nearly as possible just where it was before the war. But the great national necessity is not the restoration of the old Southern policy in the Government—it is the complete and final destruction. What we want is peace, and what hinders it? The President. His obstinate refusal to co-operate with Congress, whether in the matter of the Freedman's Bureau, of the civil rights of all citizens, of the Constitutional Amendment, or of the final reconstruction policy, has produced all the confusion of the last two years. With the Government a unit in its general political policy, it can have time to attend to the financial and other necessities of the time. But those who now oppose Congress in doing nothing but discuss reconstruction forget that not only is that of necessity the paramount question, but that with the Executive incessantly striving to baffle its policy, Congress could not desert its constant care of the subject without guilt. The moment this state of things is changed and harmony restored, public attention will be concentrated upon other and pressing questions. The President will be fairly tried. He will not be convicted, we are very sure, except upon testimony and arguments that will satisfy the most doubting; and should he be removed from office public confidence will be wonderfully restored. But the final accord between the great branches of the government, while a man whose conspicuous elevation has been a profound humiliation to every self-respecting American will sink suddenly and forever into oblivion.

THE NEW YORK CONVENTION.

THE New York Constitutional Convention, which met on the 4th of January, 1867, adjourned sine die on the 28th of February, 1868. Excluding its long adjournment of six or seven weeks at the time of the election, its recess at the holidays, and its practical cessation of business during most of its term from Friday until Tuesday, the Convention has sat a few days more than six months. Measured by many precedents, this is not a very long time. The Convention of New Hampshire, in 1791, sat for a year; that of Vermont, in 1820, for nine months, and in 1841 for nine and a half months; that of Pennsylvania, in 1837, for ten months; that of Ohio, in 1850, for ten and a half months; that of Virginia, in 1850, for one year, for nine and a half months; and that of Massachusetts, in 1853, for nine months. The New York Convention of 1821 sat, however, for fifteen weeks only, and that of 1846 for seventeen weeks. But the chief interest in such an assembly is what it did, not how long it was doing it.

The convention of 1867-68 was composed of one hundred and sixty members, of whom thirty-two, sixteen from each party, were appointed by mutual agreement. The Democratic members there were generally about a hundred and fifteen present during the earlier months of the term, but, during some of the winter weeks toward the end, there was usually a party of a dozen for several days. At the final revision, however, the members were as at the beginning of the long session, almost all on the left on Friday, before the vote upon the adoption of the Constitution, the number voting was one hundred and eighty, of which eighty-four, a majority of the whole, voted for the article, were for the Constitution, and thirty-one against it. This was a strictly party vote, all the Republicans supporting it and all the Democrats in the negative, with the single exception of Mr. SOLOMON TOWNSEND, of Queens County. There was no more candid delegate than Mr. TOWNSEND, and there was no more kindly feeling entertained. He was in the Convention of 1846, and his father, we believe, in that of 1821, and his position, as model of fidelity, always present and always ready. Mr. TOWNSEND, generally voted with his party, but upon the question of the adoption he differed with his friends, and very truly, "their excuses are trivial, and the Constitution is an improvement upon that of '46." This is high praise from a friend and disciple of MICHAEL HOFFMAN.

Mr. TOWNSEND, we think, justly estimated the conduct of his party friends in voting against the adoption of the Constitution. Mr. SANFORD E. CHURCH, one of the Democratic chiefs of the State, is substantially the author of the Finance article in the new instrument; Judge CONSTOCK, the most conservative and respected member of the Judiciary Committee, and did not conceal his hearty approval of the new Judiciary article; and Senator HENRY C. MURPHY supplied to the Constitution its definition of the power of MAYORS of cities. But all these gentlemen voted against the adoption of the Constitution by the Convention; and Mr. CHURCH dissented for himself, Mr. MURPHY, Judge CONSTOCK, Mr. CORNING, and Judge ROBERTSON, from the address to the people which commends the work of the Convention; an address prepared by a Committee of ten members of which they were chairmen.

When the final voting began Mr. BERGEN stated that he voted No, because of a general provision for equality of taxation; Mr. DEVELIN for what he called a discrimination against foreigners, which he did not explain and would probably have found it difficult to explain; while Judge COMSTOCK and Judge A. J. PARKER made no objection to the provision of the instrument, but declared the method of its submission a fraud, and so voted against the Constitution itself.

What these gentlemen called a fraud is simply a ballot labeled "Property qualification," and which, upon the inside, contains the words "Property qualification for colored men." They call it a fraud because the words are not also printed upon the outside; although it is hardly a wild flight of imagination to suppose that voters usually look into their ballots to see what they are voting for. In this case we think the label might wisely have been simply "Suffrage," for we have repeated the words upon the inside; but inasmuch as a label is merely an indication of what is within, it was a lively misapprehension whether the words were "Suffrage" or "Property qualification." To call a ballot a fraud because its exterior does not express every thing that is within is a gross misuse of terms. It would be, in the present instance, to show to what straits the Democratic leaders were driven to find an excuse to pronounce against the Constitution. The explosion of their conduct is that they were unwilling to commit themselves to the support of the new instrument until they and the other party chiefs should whether the party as such will gain or lose more by opposing or supporting it. Most of the Democratic delegates signed the Constitution, however, simply as attestation of the indictment as the work of the Convention.

The Convention of 1867-68 differs from that of 1846 in the absence of any single controlling hand. The Convention of 1846 is the work of MICHAEL HOFFMAN, and the traditions of the Convention are stories of him. But there was no corresponding figure in the Convention that has just closed. It contained, however, many men of great ability and experience upon both sides; and the general dignity of the proceedings, the courtesy to colleagues, and the agreeable personal relations of the delegates of all parties were remarkable. Very much of the uniform high tone of the assembly was due to the Chairman, Mr. WHEELER, a lawyer of Franklin County, in the northern part of the State; and there was never a more spontaneous and striking expression of real respect and regard than when Mr. WHEELER offered the resolution of thanks to the President, which was introduced during Mr. WHEELER'S absence by Mr. BROOKS, and seconded by Mr. SPRAGUE and by various gentlemen of all parties. Simple dignity of manner, an accurate knowledge of Parliamentary law, the utmost promptitude in ruling, an inflexible justice to all sides, and exhaustless patience and courtesy, were the characteristics of Mr. WHEELER as President. His impartiality was admirable; during the entire term of the Convention there was no appeal from one of his decisions. Mr. WHEELER'S little speech of farewell was altogether manly and admirable, and at its close the delegates lingered, saying their last words to each other with a sincerity and warmth that were the highest evidence of the mutual respect with which they parted.

We shall hereafter speak of the changes proposed in the present Constitution, and we have little doubt that the people will learn what their delegates have done they will heartily approve the work.

IMPEACHMENT.

THE question whether the power to remove civil officers of the United States, appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is devolved by the Constitution on the President singly, or on him in conjunction with the Senate, has never received a judicial interpretation. HAMILTON, in the 77th No. of the Federalist, declared that "the consent of that body would be necessary to displace as well as to appoint." But in the First Congress, only after very able debate, in effect decided—Vice-President ADAMS giving the casting vote—that such consent was unnecessary. The words of the Act creating the War Department are, that whenever the Secretary shall be removed from office by the President," contemplated that such officer was thus removable. This is considered a legislative construction of the Constitution. The Tenure-of-Office Act, however, passed March 2, 1867, gave it a new and different construction, by providing that every person holding any civil office, to which he has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate..... shall be entitled to hold such office until a successor shall have been in like manner appointed and duly qualified, except as herein otherwise provided. Provided that the Secretaries..... of War, and.....shall hold their offices respectively for and during the term of the President by whom they have been appointed, and for one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

This Act was intended to assert the doctrine of HAMILTON, so far as concerns removal, though it provided for suspension, and in terms repeals all laws which are inconsistent with it. It consequently repeals so much of the Act of 1789 as amounts to a legislative recognition of such power of removal as residing in the President alone.

The President supposes that the language of the above proviso takes the case of the Secretary of War out of the reach of what precedes it but it will appear that this is mere subterfuge. The term referred to is the term of four years from March 4, 1865, which has not yet expired. This was his construction of the Act when he suspended Mr. STANTON under its powers.

Has the Congress power to pass this Act, or, in other words, is it the true interpretation of the Constitution? The question is the highest importance, not alone as one upon which the trial will turn, but in its effect upon the welfare of the country. To the unbridled use of the power of removal, indulged in without the restraint of the Senate, is due much of the universal desire for office that prevails, and "the frailty and profligacy which attend its gratification.

A power to suspend from office during a recess of the Senate until the suspension is acted upon by the Senate, the circumstances to be reported, supplies every necessity and can never be thus abused. The friends of the Administration must have sincere pleasure in placing in the President's defense upon the Constitution itself, as they have charged in every variety of form that this sacred instrument has been lost sight of by those who have thought it equal to all the emergencies which have been relied upon for its overthrow.

The Presidential authority over vacancies is thus stated in the Constitution: "The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session." It is a well known rule of construction that the specification of a particular authority excludes a general authority. If, then, the President's friends contend, he is armed, as a necessary ingredient of the general executive power, with authority to make vacancies and fill them during the sitting of the Senate, or otherwise, at his pleasure, the clause expressing when and how he may fill particular vacancies is idle. Leaving out of view the Act of 1867, above quoted, it may be affirmed that there was no "vacancy" in the office of Secretary of War; and if there were, it did not occur during the recess of the Senate." Mr. STANTON was in possession of the office during the sitting of the Senate, and his removal was attempted at that time. The case, therefore, has no connection with the sixth section of the Tenure-of-Office Act.

It is contended that the proviso in the Act of March 1867, supposes that the Secretary is thus removable. To this we have two answers—first, that the proviso opposite was intended, as the President well knew and so decided; and secondly, that it is not in the power of Congress to confer such a power alone that which the Constitution in the section immediately preceding the one already quoted, § 2, art. 2, provides that "the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments." The War Department, being a known and recognized department in all important Governments, could not have been referred to under the head of "inferior officers;" and hence the appointment of Secretary of War—which is not mentioned in the Constitution—is not embraced in this provision, but belongs to that intended in the preceding clause, as follows: "he (the President) shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for and which shall be established by law."

The power to fill the executive offices must be vested in a President," and that "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed," can not be construed to override the direct direct and implied of these special and defining provisions. They limit the power of the President acting singly to make appointments, or rather "to grant commissions" (for such is the language) to cases of "vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate," and they also limit the power of Congress to "inferior officers," as those, the appointment of which may be vested in the President, etc.

It is clear, therefore, to us that HAMILTON was correct in saying that by the Constitution the consent of the Senate is "necessary to displace as well as to appoint." If such is the case this consent can not be dispensed with by act of Congress. It is unnecessary to consider whether or not the President had power to suspend the Secretary of War under the sixth section of the Tenure-of-Office Act, as this was not the character of the late proceeding. Was the President guilty of an impeachable offense in attempting, during the sitting of the Senate, to remove Mr. STANTON, and put Major-General

THOMAS as Secretary ad interim in possession of the War Department? A Secretary ad interim, except in the contingency of a suspension of the chief officer, is unknown to our laws. The act creating the Department provided that, in case of vacancy, the chief clerk shall act till the vacancy is filled. It was an attempt, therefore, to place a wholly irresponsible person in a position of high trust, which of itself is an impeachable offense, even if the other is not. The removal also was in open and clear violation of what Congress intended by the Tenure-of-Office Act. To fix the tenure of office is a legislative power and duty, and as the Secretary of War is an officer created wholly by Congress, it is competent for Congress to prevent his removal, except in the manner implied in his appointment—that is to say, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Such is the act. It was passed in precise conformity with the Constitution, and declares that its violation shall be deemed a high misdemeanor. The President is charged, therefore, with its provisions, and, when the attending circumstances are considered, the violation should be treated as willful. At the time of General GRANT'S appointment as Secretary of War ad interim, MR. STANTON had been suspended under the sixth section of the Tenure-of-Office Act, which provided for such suspension in case of misconduct in office, or for crime, or for incapability, or for legal disqualification. The suspension by any of those supposed causes was, as the country well knows, a fraud upon the Act, and he was restored by a vote of the Senate. On the 21st February the President, instead of proceeding to report the reasons that justified MR. STANTON that he was removed, and he so informed the Senate, and also that he had appointed MAJOR-General THOMAS Secretary ad interim, an appointment under the circumstances wholly without precedent or authority. The correspondence at the time of several newspapers in the confidence of the President proved, after Major-General THOMAS'S failure was known, that the latter had proceeded unskilfully and inefficiently, or he might, they suppose, have obtained possession and secured complete command of the Department. The frequency and uniformity of this criticism on the conduct of Major-General THOMAS suggest the inference that a cure was not medicinally had, and that its failure caused universal disappointment. If the movement had succeeded to place this irresponsible person in possession and control of all the material of war, the whole power of the Administration would doubtless have been employed to hold the place in defiance of Congress and of the loyal sentiment of the country. For what lengths the President would have gone acting through an officer unknown to the laws, it is impossible to say. His aim is the unresisted power of the Executive in violation of the Constitution. It is right, therefore, to suppose that if he could have wielded the War Department in all its influence and power, he would have accomplished his objects, if necessary, by force.

In lieu of this it is more probable he will find that if justice is not done him he sees in a firm in her grasp and certain to inflict punishment for such a grave transgression. Even if the President had the power of removal he had not the power to appoint Major-General THOMAS as Secretary ad interim, as he could do that only in the contingency of the suspension of MR. STANTON. His right to appoint some one in the place of MR. STANTON he could exercise only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and it would take effect only after such consent. Such a vacancy by the President has been claimed, on the ground that the Secretary of War is a member of his Cabinet and should be in unison with the head. The violently usurped over the Heads of Departments is thus defined in § 2 of art. 2: "He may require the opinion in writing of the principal officers in each of the Executive Departments upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices," showing that the construction of a cabinet, one member to give opinions as to the duties of the others, was not contemplated. The creation of a cabinet is the offspring of custom, and in no manner changes the Constitution.

The claim supporting civil officers to impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors has a signification in its relation to the Presidential office, varying from that which applied to inferior officers. The elevated character of the position gives to the President's violations of law, and to his assaults upon Congress, an influence so important as to be overlooked. An attempt to bring that Department into disgrace, or to weaken its authority by representing it as hanging on the verge of the Government, and as not constituted according to the Constitution—uttered on the stump and to large assemblages—amounts to a prostitution of the Presidential office, and constitutes, along with the act in question, a clear impeachable offense under the Constitution.

It is by this instrument that the President will be condemned by the judgment of every loyal citizen, and by the more impartial judgment of History.

The question whether the Court shall be constituted with or without the Chief Justice depends on the fact whether or not MR. JOHNSON is President; for it is on the trial of the President alone that he is to preside. The fifth subdivision of § 1 of art. 2 provides that in case of the death of the President "the powers and duties of the said office shall devolve on the Vice-President," but it does not state that the office shall devolve upon him. He, however, was sworn in as President. This question has been broached in the meaning of the phrase referred to, but no mere technicality should be allowed to interfere with the manifest intention of Congress.

"CONSERVATISM" IN ALABAMA.

THE circumstances of the Alabama election are daily revealed. The voters were kept from the polls by every kind of coercion. The Montgomery Daily Mail, the leading Conservative organ in that city, says, upon the 11th of February:

"Within the past few days a large number of negro employés have been discharged in the city, who, by voting for the negro Constitution, directly strayed themselves against their white and their business interests. Served them right. The negroes were warned of this in time, but many of them preferred to go with the scalawags and carpet-baggers, and against their own friends, and the result is that they are now out of employment. We are glad to see that this plan has already practically begun to be nearly all parts of the State."

The same excellent "Conservative" pride seen with pleasure that "the Mobile Register is publishing a list of the white scalawags and renegades who voted for the bogus Constitution, to print similar lists in every city." It also exhorts the friends in the interior to send forward the names of the white voters for publication. If such judicious "Conservative" measures, assisted by the general spirit of conservatism, which declares that the Daily Mail and its friends ought to have their own way, do not secure civil liberty and constitutional reconstruction the failure must be ascribed to the unwise leaders.

A Union man in Alabama, and therefore a "white scalawag," sends us the following letter, which shows that the spirit of a Spanish conduct of Registration who is what can be called a Conservative. In all the parishes in which I was appointed men for Registrars who were opposed to the Constitution, they having the majority counties, but one poll opened, and the Conservatives, challenging every voter, refusing to take the oath required, I remained in the cold and rain for hours. The lives of every Union man were threatened, and I was driven out of their homes, and no work given to them, if they voted. In Edenton, Gates County, the election lasted—both white and black—that they took their votes and kept them in their pockets, for fear of what they had but one place to vote at. Efforts were made to have more opened, and the Commissioners of the general commanding of the district; but the other boxes were not opened. The result was that Gates, for the mean time the voters, after staying two days and nights in the rain, went home sick.

"In Lowndes they had a party, headed by the Sheriff of the county for protection, and were driven off by their abuse and threats deterred the negroes from voting. They could not keep them off, and voted on the third day—too late; for the voters had got frightened and went home, supposing that it was impossible.

"In this city you will see by the papers what has been done. Conservatives and Democrats, they have kept many colored and many whites from voting. They have declared that they were willing to do so, there were more than enough to give the Constitution a majority. It is not rejected by the voters, but by those who would have voted could not get the chance; for, as the Conservatives say, they have no right to vote, unless their own way, they grew bolder, and used more violent means.

"From all parts of the country letters are coming in from Union men telling of their threats, and asking if they are to be left to the mercies of the rebels. They are leaving their homes, and ask where they can be protected. The rebels have threatened our lives, and we know not what to do. The Conservatives will not leave us to their mercies. The old times of secession are now renewed. If we will not submit we will be compelled to leave the State in a body; for stay here it is impossible, and if we go from here to where we can do, as our all is here? Respectfully."

THE PACIFIC MAIL COMPANY.

THE President of this Company has just published a very interesting report of its affairs and condition, and of its progress since 1861. At the date named the assets of the Company were $8,222,485 of which amount employed eleven steamers in the Pacific, and carried 22,806 passengers, 28,745 tons of freight, and $84,509,985 of treasure. The steamer sailing October 31, 1865, immediately preceding the establishment of the route between New York and Aspinwall, the number of passengers carried was 23,026; freight, 27,345 tons; treasure, $38,911,865. In 1867, the Company's business, exclusive of that of the China branch, was as follows: passengers, 31,899; freight, 60,134 tons; treasure, $40,754,175. The gross receipts during the three periods named were $13,056,851. On the 1st of February, 1868, the Company's assets, estimated in currency, were about $28,000,000, including twenty-six steamers and various properties in the United States, China, Panama, etc. The net earnings during seven years have been $14,-935,988, out of which dividends have been paid amounting to $8,374,595. The difference has been invested in steamers and other property.

Several causes have combined of late to depreciate the market value of the Company's stock, which is now selling at about 110. Among these are the enormous increase of the capital stock; the rivalry of an opposition line recently established; the controversy in the Board of Directors; and the decrease in the percentages of dividends. It is believed that the surplus earnings of the Company for some time to come will be required to fight the opposition line, and therefore not available for dividends; consequently shares are not eagerly sought for investment.

SEATS AND STOVES IN CARS.

"AN Engineer" sends us a reply to the strictures of "A Sufferer," in which he says:

"I did not propose to box the seats in all summer, thereby cramping the space needed for the feet of passengers. I simply suggested running a back-board or partition from the floor of the car to the under side of the seat, striking in the centre and dividing the under side of the seat into two equal surfaces, and running parallel with the length of the same. Such an arrangement would not encroach upon the space for the feet, nor would it add to the cost to any either seat or stove, but it would most effectually stop the draught, or, more properly speaking, the cold feet current.

"The back-board or partition could be made of either iron or wood, as the directors of the Railroad Company; the means or method of accomplishing the desired object would be determined at, and the best method to be used in this particular case; and if the directors do not like it with a bow, as he states, I must confess my inability to see wherein the bulkheads or partitions are worse than "gallant pillars."

In the matter of heating "An Engineer" says:

"It will be recollected that I did not propose securing the stove beyond the possibility of being displaced in the event of an accident, but simply to construct a stove for the purpose that would be safe from fire at all times, regardless of the nature of the smash-up, and this I contend can be done every day. I believe, further, that I can not see wherein a benzoborner, placed under the car, would be more dangerous than the coal less than with the present style of stoves.

"But, Mr. Editor, since I last writing you on the subject I have had my mind constantly at work on this important matter, and am more than ever at the firm conclusion that for the present, and till the locomotive can be improved to a double front or back engine enough for the purpose, that the best method of heating railway cars is by the judicious application of the forward baggage-car for the accommodation of the small number of passengers that would require enough to heat the cars. The ordinary piping should be placed in every car, with the necessary connections for the diffusion of the heat. Under each car should be placed a heater, and for the general supply be connected from car to car by a piece of gum hose, with a like arrangement on the opposite side for returning the condensed steam or water to the boiler in the baggage-car, thus obviating the necessity of carrying a large supply of water for the purpose.

"With a little care and study as to keep the fire within itself, in case of an accident, the future scarcity and pressure upon the locomotive will be entirely overcome, and I am of the opinion that economy in fuel will be the result. I have no personal interest in the matter, as I am not connected with any railroad company."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

THE progress of impeachment has been traced in a separate column. The bill amending the Reconstruction Act, passed by the House, a majority of votes would decide elections in the South was passed by the Senate February 27, by a vote of 35 to 11, an amendment to the bill enacts that in the elections ratifying Constitutions for States a plain elect Representatives and other officers provided for by the Constitutions shall be chosen. The Senate passed the Naval Appropriation Bill—in the House, February 27, a communication was received from the Postmaster-General, submitting the report of the Commissioners, appointed to examine new Post-offices for New York. The plans are approved by the Commissioners, the Postmaster-General, and the Secretary of the Interior, and an appropriation of $2,942,950 asked to be used for the purpose. The bill was passed by the Senate on the evening of the 29th, at which 75 members of the House were present. The bill passed the House, Speaker, Boutwell, Wilson, Williams, and Logan were the tellers to confirm the announcement, and the choice was confirmed by a vote in the House, March 2.

FOREIGN NEWS.

LORD DERBY resigned the Premiership of Great Britain February 26, and is succeeded by Chancellor DISRAELI.

A treaty has been arranged between North Germany and the United States, relative to the rights of naturalized citizens. Prussia claims that the right of military service has heretofore been claimed.

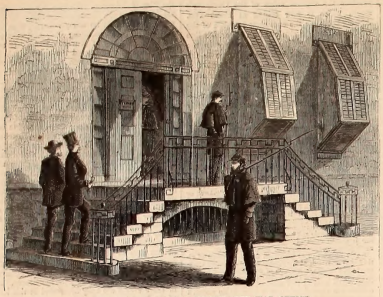
THE IMPEACHMENT.

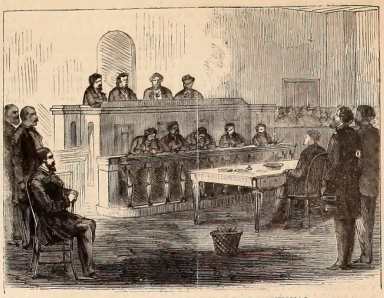
OF this all-absorbing episode of the times we give in this issue of the Weekly a full account, with illustrations of the principal and most interesting events.

The offense for which the President has been impeached is the violation of the Tenure-of-Office Bill, which he believes and declares to be unconstitutional. This act was passed by Congress and vetoed by the President immediately (on March 2, 1867) the bill was passed over his veto, and thereby became a law. In suspending EDWIN M. STANTON on a previous, and the same occasion, the President seemed desirous of accomplishing his purpose in accordance with the requirements of the law, and with the same view he sent a message to the Senate giving his reasons for the suspension. The Senate, on hearing these reasons, disapproved of his action, and MR. STANTON was restored to his office. MR. JOHNSON seemingly acquiesced in this decision; matters became more quiet; it seemed as if the rest of his term was to be spent in comparative peace; and so disposed was Congress to remove all obstructions to the harmonious action of the various bodies composing the Government, as to cause all action having the slightest resemblance to personal persecution of the President, that on February 13 the Impeachment Committee of the House of Representatives refused to entertain a proposition for impeachment, holding that up to that time the President had done nothing for which he could properly be impeached.



But the President reopened upon Congress on the 21st of February. Finding it impossible to rid himself of the obnoxious Secretary by suspension, he issued an order removing him, and another order appointing Adjutant-General THOMAS Secretary of War ad interim. It may be that he misinterpreted the spirit which led the House to oppose impeachment in December last by a vote of 107 to 57; he may have attributed this action to fear and hesitancy. But he claims that from the first it was his purpose to maintain his right of removal; and in his last message to the Senate he, moreover, declares that to this case of MR. STANTON the Tenure-of-Office Bill has no application, since the commission held by the Secretary was given by PRESIDENT JOHNSON. The attempted removal of Secretary STANTON, the appointment of General THOMAS, and the announcement of these acts to the Senate and House of Representatives was made on February 21, and, as already described in a previous issue, great excitement ensued throughout Washington, and indeed throughout the whole country. General THOMAS formally demanded possession of the War Department, was refused, arrested for interfering with the duties of the War-office, and finally discharged on bail. The House of Representatives resolved on February 24 by a vote of 126 years to 47 nays, to impeach the President; on February 25 the accomplishment of this action was made to the Senate, and the Committee at once began to prepare the indictment. All of these events are fully illustrated in this issue of the Weekly.

The articles of impeachment presented by the committee declare that the President has, "in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States, duly enacted, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States, did, being before himself in Washington Virginia, and Illinois, by force, intimidation and by threats in the Department of Washington and the military forces of the United States, and there, as such Commander-in-Chief, declare and order in writing, a part of which is as follows, to wit: 'An act making appropriations for the support of the army for the year ending June 30, 1868, and for other purposes,' especially the second section thereof, which provides among other things that all orders and instructions relating to military operations issued by the President or Secretary of War shall be issued through the General of the Army, and, in case of his inability, through the next in rank," was unconstitutional and in contravention of the commission of said General, and therefore not binding in law, in as an officer in the army of the United States, which said provision of law had been theretofore duly and lawfully promulgated by the proper order for the government and direction of the army of the United States, as the said ANDREW JOHNSON then and there well knew, with intent thereby to induce said ESTORY in his official capacity as Commander of the Department of Washington to violate the provisions of said act, and to take and receive, act upon and obey such orders as by the said ANDREW JOHNSON, might make and give, and which should not be issued by or through the General of the Army of the United States, according to the provisions of the said act. Each of these acts of the President is set forth in a distinct styled "a high misdemeanor in office," with the exception of the conspiracy as acted upon the property of the War Department, which is pronounced a "high crime."



The "General of the Post-office," illustrated on page 164, is the usual guard of honor which has for years paced before the Seventeenth Street entrance of the Department, and is not, as may have supposed, a special guard detailed to protect MR. STANTON at his juncture. Persons entering the Department freely and without challenge from the sentry.

The next sketch (in chronological order) represents the arrest of Secretary STANTON at the War-office of MR. STANTON. This scene took place on February 21. General THOMAS presented himself at the War Department, demanded the Secretary of War ad interim to MR. STANTON in the latter's room of the War-office. He was courteously received by the latter, asked for a little time to consider, and General THOMAS left with a notice that he would formally demand possession of the Department at nine o'clock on the following day. In the mean time he was arrested on complaint of Secretary STANTON, and, on examination before the Police Justice, was released on bail. He subsequently again demanded possession of the War-office and was again refused. His trial came on on Monday, February 24, but no one appearing against him, he was discharged. He subsequently sued Secretary STANTON for false imprisonment, laying his damages at $100,000. Our sketch of the Courtroom represents the scene of February 24.

As of great interest in this connection we give on pages 168 and 169 a large and beautiful engraving of the House of Representatives, showing the principal features of the architecture, and containing portraits of several of the most distinguished representatives of the present Congress. On the occasion of the adoption of the Impeachment resolution, February 24, the galleries of the House were crowded to overflowing, and the whole House presented the busy and interesting aspect delineated in our sketch.

Next in the order of their occurrence is the event illustrated in our engraving on the first page, representing Messrs. Stevens and Bingham announcing the passage of the Impeachment resolution to the Senate. This proceeding occurred on February 25. Mr. Stevens, too feeble to walk from his residence to the Senate chamber, was carried to its entrance in an arm-chair by two stout colored men, and, leaning on the arm of Mr. Bingham and supporting himself by a cane, he entered the Hall, followed by a large delegation from the House, which took position in various parts of the lobby. The Sergeant-at-arms announced a message from the House of Representatives, and Mr. Stevens, pale, emaciated, deathlike in appearance, but in a stern, vigorous voice, and in a bold, lofty manner, made this formal announcement to the Senate:

> In obedience to the order of the House of Representatives, we appear before you at the bar of the Senate of Representatives and in the name of all the people of the United States. We do impeach Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, of high crimes and misdemeanors in office; and we further inform the Senate that the House of Representatives will in due time exhibit articles against him, and make good the same, and in their name we demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of said Andrew Johnson to answer said impeachment.

Mr. Wade, President of the Senate, announced that "the Senate would take order in the premises," the usual reference to a committee was made, and the Representatives withdrew.

Since the completion of these preliminary steps the Committee on Impeachment have been busily engaged in preparing the indictment. One of our engravings on this page represents the Committee in session in their room engaged in this important labor.

CHAPTER XVIII.

GOING down to the front-door I met the Sergeant on the steps.

It went against the grain with me, after what had passed between us, to show him that I felt any sort of interest in his proceedings. In spite of myself, however, I felt an interest that there was no resisting. My sense of dignity sank from under me, and out came the words: "What news from Frizinghall?"

"I have seen the Indians," answered Sergeant Cuff. "And I have found out what Rosanna bought privately in the town on Thursday last. The Indians will be set free on Wednesday in next week. There isn't a doubt on my mind, and there isn't a doubt on Mr. Murthwaite's mind, that they came to this place to steal the Moonstone. Their calculations were all thrown out, of course, by what happened in the house on Wednesday night; and they have no more to do with the actual loss of the jewel than you have. But I can tell you one thing, Mr. Betteredge—if we don't find the Moonstone, they will. You have not heard the last of the three jugglers yet."

Mr. Franklin came back from his walk as the Sergeant said those startling words. Governing his curiosity better than I had governed mine, he passed us without a word, and went on into the house.

As for me, having already dropped my dignity, I determined to have the whole benefit of the sacrifice. "So much for the Indians," I said. "What about Rosanna, next?"

Sergeant Cuff shook his head.

"The mystery in that quarter is thicker than ever," he said. "I have traced her to a shop at Frizinghall, kept by a linen-draper named Malthy. She bought nothing whatever at any of the other drapers' shops, or at any milliners' or tailors' shops; and she bought nothing at Malthy's but a piece of long cloth. She was very particular in choosing a certain quality. As to quantity, she bought enough to make a night-gown."

"Whose night-gown?" I asked.

"Her own, to be sure. Between twelve and three, on the Thursday morning, she must have slipped down to your young lady's room, to settle the hiding of the Moonstone while all the rest of you were in bed. In going back to her own room her night-gown must have brushed the wet paint on the door. She couldn't wash out the stain; and she couldn't safely destroy the night-gown—without first providing another like it, to make the inventory of her linen complete."

"What proves that it was Rosanna's night-gown?" I objected.

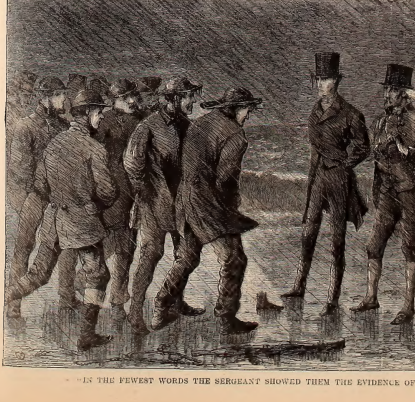
"The material she bought for making the substitute dress," answered the Sergeant. "If it had been Miss Verinder's night-gown, she would have had to buy lace, and frilling, and Lord knows what besides; and she wouldn't have had time to make it in one night. Plain long cloth means a plain servant's night-gown. No, no, Mr. Betteredge—all that is clear enough. The pinch of the question is—why, after having provided the substitute dress, does she hide the smeared night-gown, instead of destroying it? If the girl won't speak out, there is only one way of settling the difficulty. The hiding-place at the Shivering Sand must be searched—and the true state of the case will be discovered there."

"How are you to find the place?" I inquired.

"I am sorry to disappoint you," said the Sergeant—"but that's a secret which I mean to keep to myself."

(Not to irritate your curiosity, as he irritated mine, I may here inform you that he had come back from Frizinghall, provided with a search-warrant. His experience in such matters told him that Rosanna was in all probability carrying about her a memorandum of the hiding-place, to guide her, in case she returned to it, under changed circumstances and after a lapse of time. Possessed of this memorandum, the Sergeant would be furnished with all that he could desire.)

"Now, Mr. Betteredge," he went on, "suppose we drop speculation, and get to business. I told Joyce to have an eye on Rosanna. Where is Joyce?"



Joyce was the Frizinghall policeman, who had been left by Superintendent Seegrave at Sergeant Cuff's disposal. The clock struck two as he put the question, and, punctual to the moment, the carriage came round to take Miss Rachel to her aunt's.

"One thing at a time," said the Sergeant, stopping me as I was about to send in search of Joyce. "I must attend to Miss Verinder first."

As the rain was still threatening, it was the close carriage that had been appointed to take Miss Rachel to Frizinghall. Sergeant Cuff beckoned Samuel to come down to him from the rumble behind.

"You will see a friend of mine waiting among the trees, on this side of the lodge gate," he said. "My friend, without stopping the carriage, will get up into the rumble with you. You have nothing to do but to hold your tongue, and shut your eyes. Otherwise, you will get into trouble."

With that advice he sent the footman back to his place. What Samuel thought I don't know. It was plain, to my mind, that Miss Rachel was to be privately kept in view from the time she left our house—if she did leave it. A watch set on my young lady! A spy behind her in the rumble of her mother's carriage! I could have cut my own tongue out for having forgotten myself so far as to speak to Sergeant Cuff.

"IN THE FEWEST WORDS THE SERGEANT SHOWED THEM THE EVIDENCE OF THE FOOTMARKS."

"TRY TO FORGIVE ME, MAMMA."

The first person to come out of the house was my lady. She stood aside, on the top step, posting herself there to see what happened. Not a word did she say, either to the Sergeant or to me. With her lips closed, and her arms folded in the light garden-cloak which she had wrapped round her on coming into the air, there she stood, as still as a statue, waiting for her daughter to appear.

In a minute more Miss Rachel came down stairs, very nicely dressed in some soft yellow stuff that set off her dark complexion, and clipped her tight (in the form of a jacket) round the waist. She had a smart little straw-hat on her head, with a white veil twisted round it. She had primrose-colored gloves that fitted her hands like a second skin. Her beautiful black hair looked as smooth as satin under her hat. Her little eave wave like rosy shells—they had a pearl dangling from each of them. She came swiftly out to us, as straight as a lily on its stem, and as lithe and supple in every movement she made as a young cat. Nothing that I could discover was altered in her pretty face but her eyes and her lips. Her eyes were brighter and fiercer than I liked to see; and her lips had so completely lost their color and their smile that I hardly knew them again. She kissed her mother in a hasty and sudden manner on the cheek. She said, "Try to forgive me, mamma"—and then pulled down her veil over her face so vehemently that she tore it. In another moment she had run down the steps, and had rushed into the carriage as if it was a hiding-place.

Sergeant Cuff was just as quick on his side. He put Samuel back, and stood before Miss Rachel, with the open carriage-door in his hand, at the instant when she settled herself in her place.

"What do you want?" says Miss Rachel, from behind her veil.

"I want to say one word to you, miss," answered the Sergeant, "before you go. I can't presume to stop your paying a visit to your aunt. I can only venture to say that your leaving us, as things are now, puts an obstacle in the way of my recovering your Diamond. Please to understand that; and now decide for yourself whether you go or stay."

Miss Rachel never even answered him. "Drive on, James!" she called out to the coachman.

Without another word the Sergeant shut the carriage-door. Just as he closed it Mr. Franklin came running down the steps. "Good-by, Rachel," he said, holding out his hand.

"Drive on!" cried Miss Rachel, louder than ever, and taking no more notice of Mr. Franklin than she had taken of Sergeant Cuff.

Mr. Franklin stepped back thunder-struck, as well he might be. The coachman, not knowing what to do, looked toward my lady, still standing immovable on the top step. My lady, with anger and sorrow and shame all struggling together in her face, made him a sign to start the horses, and then turned back hastily into the house. Mr. Franklin, recovering the use of his speech, called after her, as the carriage drove off, "Aunt! you were quite right. Accept my thanks for all your kindness—and let me go."

My lady turned as though to speak to him. Then, as if distrusting herself, waved her hand kindly. "Let me see you before you leave us, Franklin," she said, in a broken voice—and went on to her own room.

"Do me a last favor, Betteredge," says Mr. Franklin, turning to me, with the tears in his eyes. "Get me away to the train as soon as you can!"

He too went his way into the house. For the moment Miss Rachel had completely unmanned him. Judge from that how fond he must have been of her!

Sergeant Cuff and I were left face to face at the bottom of the steps. The Sergeant stood with his face set toward a gap in the trees, commanding a view of one of the windings of the drive which led from the house. He had his hands in his pockets, and he was softly whistling the Last Rose of Summer to himself.

"There's a time for every thing," I said, savagely enough. "This isn't a time for whistling."

At that moment the carriage appeared in the distance, through the gap, on its way to the lodge-gate. There was another man besides Samuel plainly visible in the rubble behind.

"All right!" said the Sergeant to himself. He turned round to me. "It's no time for whistling, Mr. Betteredge, as you say. It's time to take the business in hand now without sparing any body. We'll begin with Rosanna Spearman. Where is Joyce?"

We both looked down, and received no answer. I sent one of the stable-boys to look for him.

"You heard what I said to Miss Verinder?" remarked the Sergeant, while we were waiting.

"And you see how she received it? I tell her plainly that her leaving us will be an obstacle in the way of my recovering her Diamond—and she leaves us in the face of that statement! Your young lady has got a traveling companion in her mother's carriage, Mr. Betteredge—and the name of it is The Moonstone."

I said nothing. I only held on like death to my belief in Miss Rachel.

The stable-boy came back, followed—very unwillingly, as it appeared to me—by Joyce.

"Where is Rosanna Spearman ?" asked Sergeant Cuff.

"I can't account for it, Sir," Joyce began; "that I am very sorry. But somehow or other—"

"Better or worse, Frizinghall," said the Sergeant, cutting him short, "I told you to keep your eye on Rosanna Spearman, without allowing her to suspect that she was being watched. Do you mean to tell me that you have let her give you the slip?"

"I am afraid, Sir," says Joyce, beginning to tremble, "that I was perhaps a little too careful not to let her discover me. There are such a many passages in the lower parts of this house—"

"How long is it since you missed her?"

"Nigh on an hour since, Sir."

"You can't look to your regular business at Frizinghall," said the Sergeant, speaking just as he composed himself, in his usual quiet and dreary way. "I don't think your talents are at all in our line, Mr. Joyce. Your present form of employment is a trifle beyond you. Good-morning."

The man slunk off. I find it very difficult to describe how I was affected by the discovery that Rosanna Spearman was missing. I seemed to be in fifty different minds about it, all at the same time. In the first state I started asking Sergeant Cuff—and my powers of language quite failed me.

"No, Mr. Betteredge," said the Sergeant, as if he had discovered the uppermost thought in me, and was picking it out to be answered, before all the rest, "we're not young friends. Detectives won't slip through my fingers so easily as you think. As long as I know where Miss Verinder is, I have no reason at my disposal for tearing Miss Verinder's acceptible. I prevented them from communicating last night. Very good. They will be together at Frizinghall instead of getting together here. The present inquiry must be simply shifted. (rather sooner than I had anticipated) from this house to the house at which Miss Verinder is visiting. In the mean time, I'm afraid I must trouble you to call the servants together again."

I went round with him to the servants' hall. It is very disagreeable, but it is none the less true that I had another attack of the detective-fever when he said those last words. I forgot that I hated Sergeant Cuff. I seized him confidentially by the arm. I said, "For goodness sake, tell us what you are going to do with the servants now!"

The great Detective took cold—still, and stood himself in a kind of melancholy rapture to the empty air.

"If this man," said the Sergeant (apparently meaning me), "only understood the growing of roses, he would be the most completely perfect character in the face of creation!" After a strong expression of feeling he sighed, and put his arm through mine. "This is how it stands," he said, dropping into again to business. "Rosanna has done one of two things. She has either gone direct to Frizinghall (before I can get there), or she has gone first to visit her hiding-place at the Shivering Sand. The first thing to find out is, which of the servants saw the last of her before she left the house."

On instituting this inquiry, it turned out that the last person who had set eyes on Rosanna was Nancy, the kitchen-maid.

Nancy had seen her slip out with a letter in her hand, and stop the butcher's man who had just been delivering some meat at the back-door. Nancy had heard her ask the man to post the letter when he got back to Frizinghall. The man had looked at the address, and had said it was a roundabout way of delivering a letter, directed to Cobb's Hole, to post it at Frizinghall—and that, moreover, on a Saturday, which would prevent the letter from getting to its destination until Monday morning. Rosanna had answered that the delivery of the letter being delayed till Monday was of no importance. The only thing she wished to be sure of was that the man would do what she told him. The man had promised to do it and had driven away. Nancy had been called back to her work in the kitchen. And no other person had seen any thing afterward of Rosanna Spearman.

"Well?" I asked, when we were alone again.

"Well," says the Sergeant. "I must go to Frizinghall."

"About the letter, Sir?"

"Yes. The memorandum of the hiding-place is in that letter. I must see the address at the post-office. If it is the address I suspect, I shall pay our friend Mrs. Yolland another visit on Monday next.

I went with the Sergeant to order the post-chaise. In the stable-yard we got a new light thrown on the missing girl.

CHAPTER XIX.

THE news of Rosanna's disappearance had, as it appeared, spread among the out-of-door servants. They too had made their inquiries; and they had also put hands on a specific little imp, nicknamed "Duffy"—who was occasionally employed in weeding the garden, and who had seen Rosanna Spearman for a short half an hour since. Duffy was certain that the girl had passed him in the fir-plantation, not walking, but running, in the direction of the sea-shore.

"Does this boy know the coast hereabouts?" asked Sergeant Cuff.

"He has been born and bred on the coast," I answered.

"Duffy!" says the Sergeant, "I can want to earn a shilling? If you do, come along with me. Keep the pony-chaise ready, Mr. Betteredge, till I come back."

He nodded to the Shivering Sand at a rate that my legs (though well enough preserved for my time of life) had no hope of matching. Like Duffy, in the way in which I now avenges in our parts when they are in high spirits, gave a howl, and trotted off at the Sergeant's heels.

Here, again, I find it impossible to give any thing like a clear account of the state of my mind in the interval after Sergeant Cuff had left me. A curious sense of helplessness got possession of me. I did a dozen different needless things in and out of the house, not one of which I can now remember. I don't even know how long it was after the Sergeant had gone to the sands before Duffy came running back with a message for me. Sergeant Cuff had given the boy a leaf torn out of his pocket-book, on which was written in pencil, "Come to the house at Rosanna Spearman's boots, and be quick about it."

I dispatched the first woman-servant I could find to Rosanna's room; and sent the other back to say that I myself would follow him with the boots.

This, I am well aware, was not the quickest way to take of obeying the directions which I had received. But I was resolved to see for myself what mysterious thing or things (or, before I trusted Rosanna's boot in the Sergeant's hands. My old notion of screening the girl if I could seemed to have revived in me, at the sight of the eleventh hour. This state of feeling (to say nothing of the detective-fever) hurried me off, as soon as I got into the open air, to the nearest and nearest approach to a run which a man turned seventy can reasonably hope to make.

As I got near the sands, I remember gathered black and the rain came down, drifting in great white sheets of water before the wind. I heard the thunder in the air as I ran down the sand, at the mouth of the bay. A little further on I passed the boy crouching for shelter under the lee of the wood-hills. Then I saw the figure of one of the rollers tumbling in on the sand-bank, and the driven rain sweeping over the waters like a flying curtain. And then I saw Sergeant Cuff on the beach with one solitary black figure standing on it—the figure of Sergeant Cuff.

The man had his hand toward the north when he first saw me. "Keep on that side!" he shouted. "And come on down here to me!"

I went down to him, choking for breath, with my heart leaping as if it was like to leap out of my body. He waited till I got up to him, put some questions to put to him; and not one of them bore upon my hopes. His face frightened me. I looked at it, and I looked at the face of the terror. He snatched the boot out of my hand, and set it in a footmark on the sand, bearing south from us as we stood. It exactly filled the mark in the rocky ledge called the South Spit. The mark was not yet blurred out by the rain—and the girl's foot fitted it to a hair.

The Sergeant pointed to the boot in the footmark, without saying a word.

I caught at him with my hand to speak to him, and failed as I had failed when I tried before. He went on, following the footsteps down and down to where the rocks ran again to breast the sea. The South Spit was just awash with the flowing tide; the waters heaved over the hidden face of the Shivering Sand. Now the rain ceased for the first time, with an obstinate silence that fell on you like lead, with an obstinate patience that was dreadful to see. Sergeant Cuff tried the boot in the footsteps, and always found it pointing the same way—toward the Shivering Sand. There was no sign could be find any where of the footsteps walking from them.

He gave it up at last. He looked again at me; and then he looked out at the waters before us, heaving in deeper and deeper over the hidden face of the Shivering Sand. He looked at me, and looked—and I saw his thought in his face. A downful dumb trembling crawled all over me on a sudden. I fell upon my knees on the sand.

"She has been back at the hiding-place," I heard the Sergeant say to himself. Some fatal accident has happened to her on those rocks."

The girl's altered looks, and words, and actions—the numbed, deadened way in which she listened to me and spoke to me, when I had found her sweeping the corridor but a few hours since, rose up in my mind and warned me, even as the Sergeant spoke, that his guess was wide of the dreadful truth. I tried to tell him of the fear that had frozen me up. I tried to say, "The death she has died, Sergeant, was a death of her own seeking." No! the words wouldn't come. The dumb trembling held me in its grip. I couldn't feel the driving rain. I couldn't see the rising tide. As in the vision of a dream the poor lost creature came back before me. I saw her again as I had seen her in the past time—on the morning when I went to fetch her into the house. I heard her again, telling me that the Shivering Sand was the only place to draw her to it against her will, and wondering whether her grave was waiting for her there. The horror of it struck at me, in one long moment, way through my own child. My girl was just her age. My girl, tried as Rosanna was tried, might have lived that miserable life, and died this dreadful death.

The Sergeant kindly lifted me up, and turned me away from the sight of the place where she had perished.

With that relief I began to fetch my breath again, and to see things about me as they really were. Looking toward the sand-hills, I saw the men-servants from out-of-doors, and the fisherman named Yolland, all running down to us together; and all having taken the alarm, calling out to know if the girl had been found. In the fewest words the Sergeant showed them the evidence of the footmarks, and told them that a fatal accident must have happened to her. He then picked out the fisherman from the rest, and put a question to him, turning about again toward the sea: "Tell me this," he said, "Could a boat have put off to you from that ledge of rock where her footmarks stop?"

The fisherman pointed to the rollers tumbling in on the Shivering Sand, and to the great waves leaping up in clouds of foam against the headlands on either side of us.

"No boat, Sir, could have built," he answered, "could have got to her through that."

Sergeant Cuff looked for the last time at the footmarks on the sand, which the rain was now fast blurring out.

"There," he said, "is the evidence that she can't have got back to land. And here," he went on, looking at the fisherman, "is the evidence that she can't have got away by sea. Have you any thing more to say?" he added, to me. I was seen running toward this place, half an hour before I got here from the house," he said to Yolland. "Did you see any thing of her?" Call it altogether an hour ago. How high would the water be at that time on the side of the rock?" he continued, to the south side—otherwise, the side which was not filled up by the quicksand.

"At the tide makes to-day," said the fisherman, "there wouldn't have been water enough to drown a kitten on that side of the Spit an hour since."

Sergeant Cuff turned about northward toward the quicksand.

"How much on this side?" he asked.

"Less still," answered Yolland. "The Shivering Sand would have been just awash, and no more."

The Sergeant turned to me, and said that the accident must have happened on the side of the quicksand. My tongue was loosened at that.

"No accident!" I told him. "When she came to this place she came, weary of her life, to end it here."

He started back from me. "How do you know?" he asked. One of them crowded round. The Sergeant received himself instantly. He put them back from me; he said to me, "Hush, for God's sake!" and then he shaken me; he said, "Let him alone a little." Then he turned to Yolland and asked, "Is there any other place, besides this, that she can get at again?" And Yolland answered, "None. What the Sand gets the Sand keeps forever." Having got his answer, Sergeant Cuff came a step nearer and addressed himself to me.

"Mr. Betteredge," he said, "I have a word to say to you. You are a very young woman's father. Four foot out, broadwise, along the side of the Spit, there's a shelf of rock about half fathom under water at this time of the question is—Was it a question of time, or was it a question of chance, from off the spit, for all in whose there's a threshold at the sea-side, at a depth that would barely cover her to the waist. She must have waded out, or jumped out, into the Deeps before—or she would have been missing now. Resident, Sir! The Deeps of the Quicksand have got her. And they have got her by her own act."

After that testimony from a man whose knowledge was to be relied on the Sergeant was silent. For the rest of the time, during our pause, I felt one accord we all turned back up the slope of the beach.

At the sand-hillocks we were met by Samuel, running to us from the house. The lad is a good lad, and has a good character for me. He handed me a little note, with a decent sorrow in his face. "Penelope found this, Mr. Betteredge," he said, "in my mistress's room."

It was her last farewell word to the old man who had done his best—thank God, always done his best—by her mother.

"You have often forgiven me, Mr. Betteredge, in past times. When you next see the Shivering Sand try to forgive me once more. I have found my grave where my grave was waiting for me. I have lived, and died, Sir, grateful for your kindness."

There was no more than that. Little as it was, I hadn't manhood enough to hold up against it. I went home—where was there you're young, and beginning the world. Your tears come easy, when you're old, and leaving it. I burst out crying.

Sergeant Cuff took a step nearer to me—meaning kindly, I don't doubt. I shrank back from him. "Don't touch me," I said. "It's the dread of you that has driven her to it.

"You are wrong, Mr. Betteredge," he answered, quietly. "But there will be time enough to speak of it when we are all indoors again."

I followed the rest of them with the help of Samuel's arm. Through the driving rain we went back—to meet the trouble and the terror that were waiting for us at the house.

CHAPTER XX.

THOSE in front had spread the news before us. We found the servants in a state of panic. As we passed my lady's door it was thrown open violently from inner side. My mistress came out among us (with Mr. Franklin following and trying vainly to compose her), quite beside herself with the horror of the thing.

"You are answerable for this!" she cried out, threatening the Sergeant wildly with her hand. "Unfield's death—that wretch his money—and now the sight of him!"

The Sergeant was the only man among us who was fit to cope with her—being the only one among us who was in possession of himself.

"I am no more answerable for this distressing calamity, my lady, than you are," he said. "If, in half an hour from this, you still insist on my leaving the house, I will accept your ladyship's dismissal, but not your ladyship's money."

It was spoken very respectfully, but very firmly at the same time—and it had its effect on my mistress as well as on me. She suffered Mr. Franklin to lead her back into the room. As the door closed on the two the Sergeant, looking about among the women-servants in his observant way, noticed that, while all the rest were merely frightened, Penelope was in tears.

"When your father has changed his wet clothes," he said to her, "come and speak to us in your father's room."

Before the half hour was out I had got my dry clothes on, and had lent Sergeant Cuff such change of dress as I could muster. He then came on to us to hear what the Sergeant wanted with her. I don't think I ever felt what a good dutiful daughter I had so strongly as I felt at that moment I took her and sat her on my knee—and I prayed God bless her. She hid her head on my shoulder, and put her arm round my neck—and we waited a little while in silence. The poor dead girl must have been at the bottom of it, I think, with my mistress present with me. The Sergeant went to the window and stood there looking out. I thought it right to thank him for considering us fools in this way—and I did.

People in high life have all the luxuries to themselves—and no others the luxury of indulging their feelings. People in low life have no such privilege. Necessity, which spares our betters, has no pity on us. We learn to put our feelings back into ourselves, and to jog on with our duties as patiently as may be. I don't complain of this—I only notice it. Penelope and I were ready for the Sergeant as soon as the Sergeant was ready on his side. Asked if she knew what had led to Rosanna's death, Penelope herself, my daughter answered (as you will foresee) that it was for love of Mr. Franklin Blake. Asked if she had ever mentioned this notion of hers to any other person, Penelope answered, "I have not mentioned it, Sir, to any person else." I felt it necessary to add a word to this. I said, "And for Mr. Franklin's sake, my dear, as well. If Rosanna Spearman died for love of him, it is not with his knowledge or by his fault. Let him leave the house to-day, if he does leave it, without one unkind word to remember him by." Sergeant Cuff said, "Quite right," and fell silent again; comparing Penelope's notion (as it seemed to me) with some other notion of his own which he kept to himself.

At the end of the half hour my mistress's bell rang.

On my way to answer it I met Mr. Franklin coming out of his aunt's sitting-room. He mentioned that he had had a long talk with my lady. Sergeant Cuff—in my presence as before—and he added that he himself wanted to say two words to the Sergeant first. He went back to my room he stopped and looked at the railway timetable in the hall.

"Are you really going to leave us, Sir?" I asked. "Miss Rachel will surely come right again, if you only give her time."

"She will come right again," answered Mr. Franklin, "when she hears that I have gone away, and that she will see me no more."

I thought the spoken in remonstrance at my young lady's treatment of him. But it was not so. My mistress had noticed, from the time when the police first came to the house, that the main question of him was enough to set Miss Rachel's temper in a flame. He had been too fond of his cousin to like to see her made the subject of a coarse joke—and now the one resolution which a person of his temper would take was plain enough.

What he had to say to the Sergeant was spoken in my presence. He described her ladyship as trying to acknowledge that she had spoken unfeelingly. And he asked if Sergeant Cuff would consent—in that case—to accept his fee, and to leave the matter of the Diamond where the matter stood now. The Sergeant answered, "No, Sir. My fee is paid me for doing my duty. I decline to take it until my duty is done."

"I don't understand you," says Mr. Franklin.

"I'll explain myself, Sir," says the Sergeant. "When I came here I have stated the case to Lady Verinder as the case now stands, and when I have told her plainly what course of action to take for the recovery of the Moonstone, the responsibility will be off my shoulders. Let her ladyship decide, after that, whether she does, or does not, allow me to go on. I shall then have done what I undertook to do—and I'll take my fee."

In those words Sergeant Cuff reminded us that, even in the Detective Police, a man may have a reputation to lose.

The view he took was so plainly the right one that there was no more to be said. As I rose to conduct him to my lady's room he asked if Mr. Franklin wished to be present. Mr. Franklin answered, "Not unless Lady Verinder desires it." He added, in a whisper to me, as I was following the Sergeant out, "I know what that man is going to say about Rachel; and I am too fond of her to hear it and keep my temper. Leave me by myself."

I left him, miserable enough, leaning on the sill of my window, with his face hidden in his hands—and Penelope peering through the door, longing to comfort him. In Mr. Franklin's place, I should have called her in. When you are ill—used by one woman there is great comfort in telling it to another—because, nine times out of ten, the other always takes your side. Perhaps, when my back was turned, he did call her in? In that case it is only doing my daughter justice to declare that she would stick at nothing in the way of comforting Mr. Franklin Blake.

In the mean time Sergeant Cuff and I proceeded to my lady's room.

As the last conference we had held with her we had found her not overwilling to hit her eyes from the book which she had in her hand. On this occasion there was a change for the better. She met the Sergeant's eye with an eye that was as steady as his own. The family pride showed itself in every line of her face; and I knew that Sergeant Cuff would meet his match when a woman like my mistress was strung up to bear the worst he could say to her.

INIGO AT THE CHARITY BALL.

"BUT the greatest of all these is Charity," may liberally be interpreted to mean that the greatest of all balls is the Charity Ball.

It comes off regularly once a year, generally at the end of winter, which is an excellent arrangement for the poor, inasmuch as it gives them time to look around and see where they can buy wood and coal cheapest before cold weather again sets in.

Of course the Charity Ball is under feminine management. Was there ever a good work contemplated or executed that was not under the ban, arranging the march after her peculiar ideas of fitness, or else bringing up the rear in delightful confusion, shaking up the dead and wounded, and generally propping their heads a little too high? As Pope—or is it Pagan?—beautifully expresses it:

"Oh woman, in our hours of ease,
Uncertain, coy, and hard to please,
But seen too oft, familiar with thy face,"
We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

I like woman. We like our opposites, it is said—by which is meant, I suppose, the opposite sex. Certainly I do not always like the young man who sits opposite me at table, or the children across the way, who make faces at me through the railings, and call me names which are neither pat nor pat.

I attended the Charity Ball at the Academy of Music last evening—Monday, February 24, 1868—usually I don't care a fig about balls, but occasionally it is well to be particular. To say that all the lady managers were there is to say that the attendance was large, for the list is made to comprise about all the worthy ladies that the city affords, or could afford, were it much larger than it is. I would say that their name is Legion, but that name having a savor of masculinity—being scarcely a proper name under the circumstances we will set it down as Academy. None will claim. I trust, that the change can not be effected legally.

Apropos of Lee—it is said that the Confederate General of that name was present last evening. That has certain meanings, for the attention that I attracted. People thought I was he—that is to say, Lee—there is one of the penalties of looking conspicuously distinguished man. I've got a way like his, too, a sort of lee-way, so to speak, about me, which encourages very many to range up and take the weather-gage. Sometimes I succeed in hold my own, and assume a virtue if I have it not; but they generally contrive to get my gage, weather or no.

It is bruited about that there were a great many distinguished persons present on the occasion. Very possibly; but how they could be distinguished in such a crowd passes my comprehension. Early in the evening I started from the roof to find a lady of my acquaintance who stood on the floor. I wished to ask her a question. Arrived at the place where she was, she wasn't there. By standing on an old gentleman's toes I at last discovered her chignon bobbing up and down at a distant part of the hall. Arrived there, she wasn't there, but a portion of her dress was. So from point to point I followed her, recognizing the path she had taken by small pieces of familiar muslin, but not finding her until late at night and at the supper-table. As it was the privilege of hunting her in to the table that I wished to ask, I might as well not have found her at all. To have asked her then would simply have been a work of supererrogation. Two over thus. I never made up my mind to pay for any young woman's supper that some one else did not step in and manage to forestall me. It is the principle of the dear gazelle with variations. Making up one's mind to do a thing, let me remark, is what exists; it is in the preliminary business that the mental effort and anguish comes in—doing it is but a trifle in comparison.

To accommodate the dancers the Academy was floored. A number of the dancers were floored also during the evening. But this was not the work of the Committee. It was rather the work of a moment. When rapidly revolving bodies come suddenly in collision, one or the other must go under—this is a law of gravitation which governs the whirled.

The Committee were not in fault for any thing—not even for having "waltz" printed "valse" on the programme. Any one who knows any thing should know that that's French. The French have to spell waltz with a v, inasmuch as they have no w in their language. How they manage to spell wagon I don't know; but you can find out by looking in the dictionary. Probably they spell that with a v too.

The Committee were hardly to be distinguish them from the other persons present, somewhat as Daniel in the Den of Lions, in the picture, was assisted with a great many subordinate under his arm, to distinguish him from the lions. There was little necessity for conferring the badges in advance, seeing to me—all in authority were tolerably certain to be badgered before the evening was through.

Of the dresses worn it is scarcely worth while to attempt a description. I could be censorious if I chose; but this was a Charity Ball. Were the contrary the case I should proclaim that Mrs. Sm-th (I use dashes to disguise the names and spare the ladies' feelings) wore a dress which, to my certain knowledge, had been worn before; that Miss Br-wn's lace was imitation (no one saw the point, at least); and that Mrs. Jo-es's white satin was cut with too extended a train. It persisted in getting on the wrong side and encumbering all her movements. "Get thou behind me, Satan!" was the necessary ejaculation when she attempted to walk.

After a considerable study of the matter I have determined that come-outers are inappropriate attire for those who dress with an eye to the main. The "Frog" does very well for hops; watered silks are not inappropriate for those who desire to float gracefully through the dance; but for those who have an ambition to stalk it, believe me there's nothing like coral.

Haste is said to make waste—and beyond doubt a great many waists are made in haste—but it has always seemed to me that the material that ladies should be swift to put on magnificent dresses to vex the crowds where the chances are against their being seen, and against in favor of their being torn to pieces. As a case in point, the dress of this evening was covered with fragments of dresses, of which the wearers had undergone up to the most gossamer of all gauzy substances. They had up enough pieces to make several complete dresses, had been pinned and reconstructed. They might have been but pieces of patch-work—as they all, but patch-work pieces seem to be quite in favor now—but they were not out of the world—or out of the Times, Herald, and Tribune, for that matter—as out of the fashion.

Very many of the ladies had their heads powdered. I had expected to hear, indeed, that some had theirs pulverized in the mortar, as a generic thing I don't like powder. A lady's head should be a magazine of useful knowledge, undoubtedly, but that is a different thing from being a powder magazine. Think of the danger if the lady happens to be bullet-headed and inclined to shoot off at a tangent! Dust can be thrown in masculine eyes in various ways without shaking it from the head. But I am opposed to powder on several heads, and on one head particularly—whose head I will not specify, as I do not wish to be blown up by the weaver.

When I thus raise my voice against a pernicious fashion, take my word for it, 'tis indeed a guilty bawl!

The seats of the Academy are numbered, but the receipts of the evening have not yet been counted. They are variously estimated, but by none, probably, will they be higher esteemed than by the recipients. The names of the managing committee-ladies are legion, and none will be properly applied, but there is nothing like having it in safe hands in the mean while. I must close here, for I've got to get home. I simply throw out the suggestion for what it is worth. I'm not a National Bank, it is true, but that circumstance tends to establish my soundness rather than otherwise. I have neither President, Cashier, Teller, nor clerks about me, which is another feature in my favor, as it is evident that one man can not steal as much as many could. By all means make me a place of deposit!

In any event, I hope and trust that the money will be well bestowed—which is to hope and trust that it will not be stowed away so as not to be forthcoming when wanted.

Is there not a proverb something as follows? "Charity covereth a multitude of shins." The proceeds of this ball should cover a multitude of bodies, else have the labors of Theodorus been in vain. By Theodorus I do not mean the king of Abyssinia, but him surnamed Moss, who is the first called upon to supervise all such entertainments, and who is ready to devote his time to self into the abyss for conscience sake. He who for this eventful evening had the titles of K. C. B. (Night Commander of the Charity Ball) conferred on him. In conclusion may we not well sigh,

Alas, for the rarity
Of Christian Charity—balls!

INIGO.

LONDON AND PARIS CONTRASTED.

IT would scarcely be possible to find two cities more different in almost every characteristic than the two capitals which approximate most closely in population. London has nearly three and a quarter million inhabitants, Paris nearly two million. No other European capital has so many as half a million. Nevertheless, between Paris and Vienna, between Paris and Florence, between Paris and St. Petersburg, there is far more akin than there is between Paris and London. M. Taine has described in graphic language his first impressions on drawing near the British capital; how he saw the faint blue sky that had gleamed overhead since he left the coast becoming ever more faintly blue as he journeyed inland, until the blue gave place to gray, and the gray was changed to black by the smoke of five hundred thousand houses; how the river-bank, which in Paris is a promenade, in London is a warehouse and wharf; how the street passengers, who in Paris saunter as though they had the whole day before them to take holiday, in London press forward with anxious haste as though life depended upon their speed of foot. English men who visit Paris are no less than M. Taine impressed by this contrast. Mr. Gladstone latterly and M. Chevalier and his brother economists that in Paris there was too little smoke. The Englishman saw in the city on the Seine a charming pleasure-garden, but he missed the signs of that energy and industry which is so strong in London, and especially to the financier, are more pleasing than the handsomest of monuments, the broadest of streets. In fact, the two cities not only differ, they are opposed to each other. In London men get money; in Paris they spend it. The Londoner who has made a fortune retires to the country to enjoy it. The French provincial scarcely believes in the possibility of true enjoyment outside of Paris. If he has but income enough to take a flat not too far from the Champs Elysées, he will not long resist the influence of that centripetal force which is so strong in France. London has but one lounge, and it is only for some three hours of the day that the class who frequent it is to be seen there. Every one goes to a lounge from end to end—from Montmartre to Montrouge—from the Bois de Vincennes to the Bois de Boulogne; and it is full of loungers the whole day long. The busiest boulevard has its café every fifty paces, with its open-air tables and green-colored chairs rarely empty from dawn to midnight. It is impossible to imagine a London tradesman at the door of a pastrycook's in Holborn or even in Berkeley Square. He does not drink eau sucré at all, and his substitute for coffee is to be had inside those glass doors through which shines the glare of gas. He does not pay at dominos at all, and at carré only now and then, when he has his own house. He is not to be found at home haughing over the smart dialogue of his favorite feuilletoniste. He has read his paper in the train, and his leader as he was borne by bus or train to his office or counting-house, and he will glance at the debates and the play-bill while he is in the act of taking his dinner of one course in a reeking chop-house. The inhabitants are different because the cities are; the cities are different because the inhabitants are. Whatever difference there was originally between the Parisian and the Londoner, between Lutetia and London, has been developed and intensified until it seems impossible to believe that ten hours will suffice to take us from the one to the other, from the city of play to the city of toil.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

BY A FASHIONABLE YOUNG MARRIED WOMAN.—The blushing sex.—My husband.

A MISS-SPENT LIFE.—Squandering all your salary on a girl who does not care for you.

"You ought to lay up something for a rainy day," said an anxious father to a profligate son. "And so I have," replied the youth. "WAIT!"—An umbrella.

Why are boarders settling with their landlady like birds in April?—Because they pay her.

When is the Hudson River shockingly profane?—When it dams its foe.

Dr. Brown, having long admired a very beautiful young lady, resolved to call and always giving her for his toast. Being once told it was time to change, he replied: "I believe I've forgot, though I have been toasting her for these twenty years I have not been able to make her Brown yet."

A MODERN GLOSSARY.

Angel—The name of a woman, commonly a very bad one.

Author—A laughing stock. It means likewise a poor fellow, and is generally an object of contempt.

Beau—A country gentleman; or indeed any animal on legs.

Bride—A word implying plain dealing and sincerity in general: but more especially applied to a philosophical one.

Bridegroom—The principal accomplishment of men and women.

Critic—A word applied by all writers to the wit and humor of others.

Dinner—A complex idea compounded of poverty, hunger, piety, and simplicity.

Fool—A name of endearment in every-day life.

Love—A word properly applied to our delight in parting with our money, sometimes metaphorically spoken of the favorite object of our appetites.

Woodcock—Sport or pastime.

Modesty—Awkwardness.

Novels—Philosophy, especially the philosophical writings of the ancients.

Pickle—A substitute for public office.

Politics—The art of getting such an office.

Prose—A man of different opinion from yourself.

Quiet—A sleepy dean.

Taste—The present whim of the town, whatever it is.

Temperance—Want of spirit.

Wit—A quality of good men and good things.

What discretion of a maiden animal will terminate the world's career, according to Revelations?—The opening of the last seal.

"What a beautiful place heaven is!" said a little boy at a funeral.

"Why do you think so?" said his mother.

"Because," said the latter, pointing to the stars, "the wails of the floor are so beautiful."

"John," said a stingy old curmudgeon to his hired man as he was taking dinner, "do you know how many punches you've eaten?" "No." "Well, you've eaten fourteen." "Well," said John, "you count and I'll eat."

Saturday, at the open lot in Paris: "What! you here, Jones? I thought you were to be married to your husband." "Yes, so I am; but—he has the typhoid fever, and so I thought I would have a little fun."

GENERAL THOMAS BEGS TO BE EXCUSED.

When is a gardener like a scout?—When he has young suckers and roots in the ground.

THINGS I LIKE SEE.

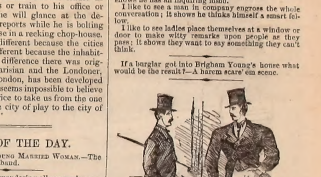
I like to see a whole neighborhood get into a quarrel about nothing; it shows that there are independent spirits in the world.

I like to hear the character of my friend slandered; it gives me an opportunity to defend him.

I like to see fifteen or twenty young men parade themselves in front of the church on the Sabbath, and stare at the ladies as they pass; it shows they have read Chesterfield's advice to his son.

I like to be surrounded by a lot of fellers when I am in a hurry; it leaves me to be pulled.

I like to have one ask me the news, and, before I have time to speak, answer himself; it shows he knows more than I do.



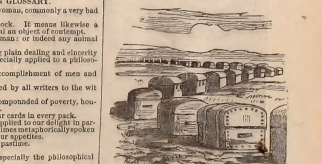
I like to see people ride for pleasure, go a-fishing or hunting on Sunday: "the better day, the better deed."

I like to have a man prying into my business; it shows he has an inquiring mind.

I like to see a man in company engross the whole conversation; it shows he thinks himself a smart fellow.

I like to see ladies place themselves at a window or door to make silly remarks upon people as they pass; it shows they want to say something they can't think.

If a burglar got into Brigham Young's house what would be the result?—A harem scare'em scene.



MUSCLE OF PADDING.

FIRST SWELL. "Been cultivating your muscle at Wood's, Bill?"

SECOND SWELL. "Ah, no! Yer see I came to the conclusion that my shoulders were not broad enough to bear the burdens of this life, so I went to my tailor's and got my shoulders and credit both extended."

THE POET'S BOUQUET.

By day I steal from her with secret guile
Each slightest word, each little passing smile,
The quiver of a curl, soft curvesies,
The gleams, the shades, that flit across her eyes;
The transient rose that dawns upon her cheek,
The veil that playful breezes love to seek;
The echo of her steps, the perfumed air
That floats about her lips and dusky hair;
The very pain of her smiling gown,
And make of these sweet nothings, thus unknown,
A poet's bouquet.—Then at eventide
I seat me with my flowers on the sea beside,
And on this fragile group, arranged by me,
Let day and moonlight gather silently.
Glad as a child, with pencil and with speech,
I converse hold with all, with sill and each;
Spell out the thoughts within their cups of light,
Tremble, complain, and tears of fond delight;
Say to the air: "Our voiceless language be,
Take her these words, and bring back here to me!"
Then, ere I go, my bouquet I unmove—
Bouquet of hope and melancholy too!
Full-hearted, breathes its scent ethereal
Touch every flower, and meanings give to all;
Caressing both the faded and the bright,
I count my booty still with fresh delight!
And when at midnight I retire to rest,
That cherished bouquet to my heart is pressed;
And while I sleep, her image ever seems
To scatter all its flowers amid my dreams!

TREVANION'S SHOT.

"THIS, Sir," said the housekeeper, somewhat in the tone of Mrs. Jarley when exhibiting her waxen-work—"this, Sir, is Miss Esther Garfield. She died a raving lunatic because her lover was killed to her father."

Mrs. Esther proved to be a small looking young lady, with her hair in puffs and her eyes somewhat impaired by time, and, altogether, unattractive, so I signed to the housekeeper to proceed.

"This stern gentleman," she observed, "is Mr. Trevanion Garfield, of whom a strange story is related."

"Strange story, indeed!" I said, with my hand in the act regarding a face peering out of the darkness into vacancy, and thrown the back ground of the picture.

"If you would please to hear it—" suggested the housekeeper, with a gentle cough.

"Let me see, I said, consulting my watch. "Time, twenty minutes to 40, and it is now 4.15. Yes, I think I might hear it. Let it, however, finish our inspection of the pictures."

"Now we come to more grim and uninteresting ladies and gentlemen belonging to the house which was to be sold, and which I, as Mr. Esther's agent of business, had been down to Virginia to report upon—and after glancing at them we left the chilly, lonely gallery, and went to the comfortable room by the fire.

"I have been here many years," said the old lady, half solemnly, half mournfully; "and though all the ladies I see in the church yard, they seem to linger about the house, and this room is the one with a sort of consolation. No, I am not lonely. They were a good old Virginia family, and I like to think of them."

Seeing herself on the other side of the fire, she was quite at home in a minute, as if seeking to recall the dim past, and then began:

You must know that this old house was built about fifty years ago by Trevanion Garfield, a proud, imperious, self-willed man, who had never married, and who, consequently, was not only in large fortune, spending it with prodigal liberality. There were the first that tried these rooms; he was the first to open the tower door, overlook the river, and from that tower he shot himself with a gun.

Trevanion Garfield had a nephew and a niece, who were the first that tried these rooms; he was the first to open the tower door, overlook the river, and from that tower he shot himself with a gun.

Trevanion Garfield himself upon being the best shot in the Eastern shore. He was an uncouth, unlettered man, proud, imperious, self-willed man, who had never married, and who, consequently, was not only in large fortune, spending it with prodigal liberality. There were the first that tried these rooms; he was the first to open the tower door, overlook the river, and from that tower he shot himself with a gun.

Trevanion Garfield himself upon being the best shot in the Eastern shore. He was an uncouth, unlettered man, except the higher classes, who could write in a rude way. To be able to sign his name was the sole education he had, and always in the open air, hunting or practicing with his pistols at a mark. He hated the world, and, although his property lay far from him, refused to have any thing to do with them.

"Don't come near me," he said, "or I'll set my dogs at you!" He took him at his word, and, as no love was lost between them, let him alone. That was pretty much the same with every one, for he was a man who had no gates a sign "no risk read:" "No priests or ministers admitted on the premises." When he went forth the children got out of his way, and their parents would close the doors until he had passed. Strangers, however, were not troubled by acquaintances, and within the old stone walls he could retire at nightfall, and drink deeply until daylight, when he would be carried, cursing and yelling, to bed. Thus his days were passed in the field, and his nights at the punch-bowl. Drinking is the worst species of dissipation—a truth which Trevanion must have felt, for sometimes he would send for his brother, or some of the tenants, to keep the punch with him, and then, in a sudden turn of humor, kick them out and ask every thing that came in his course. His conversable temper and bad ways would have served him of every (so-called) friend, but his wife varied, and sometimes he was kind—even tender-hearted. While in these humors he would shut all sorts of presents and favors upon his wife, and then he fell to thinking he turned a weather-cock, which suddenly whirls and on a clear day and wickedly points for storms, and then, in his most brutal way, he would drive them out, and seek his favorite punch-bowl, cursing like a drab.

This state of things could probably have continued until the day of his death but for a certain incident. Trevanion was out hunting one day, and, in one of his vile humors, tormented his horse (a spirited animal) to such a degree that at last it ran away with him. On they went like a flash of lightning, and God knows where Trevanion would have been laid, but suddenly a young man was seen standing in the infuriated creature's path. With reckless daring he sprung at the horse and caught him by the bridle. He was dragged some distance, but the animal was checked, and a stranger alone stood trembling and quiet as a lamb.

Trevanion, who, with his ruddy face quite pale, had remained stupefied during this pretty escapade, dismounted in a hurry, and commenced his usual tirade of curses and blows upon the poor horse.

"Don't beat him," said the young man.

"Who asked you to interfere?" screamed Trevanion.

"My feelings of humanity," replied the young man.

"Blast your feelings of humanity," growled the wicked man; the cursed beast tried to break my neck."

"Because you ill-treated him."

Trevanion, who had opened his mouth for another curse, paused and fixed his bold, hand-some eyes upon the speaker.

"Who are you?" he asked.

The young man smiled.

"I don't think you would care to know," he replied.

Trevanion restrained an oath.

"You're a cursed looking man," he said, "and ought to answer a decent question."

The young man smiled again.

"No," I don't think otherwise," though I don't think my answer will please you. Trevanion Garfield, I am your nephew."

"The devil you are!" said Trevanion, smiling grimly; "well, you've saved my life, and were a fool for doing so; but I thank you. Come with me to Garfield Hall. The dogs shan't be set on you, and you're not a man to be kick'd, I know, or you would have let the horse break my neck and the devil get his own. Come with me to the House."

The young man would have declined, but Trevanion would take no Nay for an answer, and forthwith they came to this house, and, in every room, sat them down by the fire.

"So you are my nephew?" said Trevanion; "one of the tribe that lives five miles off? Well, I like you; but the deuce take your family. Give me a punch, Sir, and whatever I am to others, remember I am always your friend."

Very strange to say, from that time the ill-asserted cousins became friendly to each other, and Trevanion rode with George—for that was the name of the nephew—taught him to shoot, and would often have caught him in a fox-chase, and swear, only his pupil declined to receive lessons in those accomplishments.

"You are right," he said; "Trevanion once said, when his weather-cock pointed to clear weather: 'That is a good man, my dear. God knows we can not be too good.' He used that time after his weather-cock would turn, and he would be swearing over the floor with his spurs clanking, his ruffles nearly stained with wine. However, if he did pursue pretty much his bad course, he was not at all gentle to George, who was nearly always by his side; and when the rough way Trevanion strove to make the young man like him. A proof of his affection he received to make George the best shot in the country.

"My dear," he would say, "the deuce take your pot-hooks and hangers, they were made for women folks. I'll teach you how to shoot. Come out; I'll give you a lesson.

And off they went to the target. Trevanion shot wonderfully well, not only with his right hand with his left hand, and was proud of his skill.

"I can pop off any thing," he would say, triumphantly. "That stupid ass of a doctor will have it that I shall be stricken with paralysis because of my drinking! Let him try it on my nerves—see how steady they are! Deuce take the doctors, he's a quack. Now, George, try that shot again."

And pop! pop! pop! they would go; while the people in the village would hasten from the noise, shook their heads and said: "That poor Garfield is at some of his wicked tricks again."

You may imagine, then, how the scandal when it was discovered how intimate George Garfield became with the ungodly man," as Trevanion was universally called; but George was a young fellow of spirit, and the scandal-mongers got little for their interference. George's family knew Trevanion was ungodly and disreputable, though they did not speak to George about it) how his fortune, they were aware to be considerable, and how they had inspired in the old sage-grouse, George continued to keep company with his uncle, and told him every thing that he had replied to the neighbors, upon which Trevanion laughed heartily, and went on the strength of the news summoned the gentleman and drank until his red face became purple, when he was, as usual, dragged to bed.

George had conceived a strange attachment for his blasphemous uncle. The young man pitied him sincerely, and strove to reform him; but when gray hairs are steeped in sin they can not be unraveled; and when eyes are dim with drunkenness. When sin goes hand in hand with old age let none interfere, for the devil will not be deprived of his own.

So George did not succeed in doing much in the reformation of his uncle, but Trevanion was touched by the true regard his nephew felt for him, and one day, when his weather-cock had come around to clear weather, he said,

"George, I like you, my dear, and I think you like me. I'll make you my heir."

And no sooner said than done. This tie bound them closer than ever. George, affected at this proof of Trevanion's love for him, could not leave when he saw how pleased the old man was with his society. And so the two jogged on together a month after month.

One day, however, another young man arrived —a fine, likely young fellow, with dark hair, a handsome, rather wicked face, manners soft and winning. He told Trevanion he was an orphan, and a nephew of his, and delivered a letter written by Trevanion's brother to Illinois, bequeathing him to Trevanion's care.

Trevanion's red face grew redder and more apoplectic as he read the letter, and his little, and his writing went no further than to scrawl his name), and passed the document to George, who read it in his turn, and looked, while the dark stranger (whose name was Edward) looked on with a sneer.

"What!" says Trevanion, "a big loppus like you bequeathed to me."

"Boy young stranger laughed.

"Good enough old boy," give me a trial, and if I prove non compos then foot me to the door."

Trevanion fumed and cursed him up hill and down, but finally yielded, and his weather-cock happening to point to pleasant weather, he welcomed the stranger to his fireside, when the everlasting bowl of punch made its appearance, and the two had a night of it. Poor George never joined Trevanion in his drinking bouts, so, with a sad heart, he left the revelers, feeling that no good would come of the stranger's introduction to Garfield Hall, and he was right. The him—and in return the new-comer detested George. He had scarcely left before George discovered that Edward was doing his best to supplant him in Trevanion's affections. The bold young fellow had a ready and dashing manner, had certainly made the old man like him; but he still stuck to his dear George," and would not hear a word against him. Edward, however, was not discouraged—he continued to drink with him, agree with him, ride with him, shoot with him, and, in fine, succeeded in flattering the old fool, while at the same time he instilled suspicion about George. For a long time Trevanion was incredulous. "George is my favorite," he said, bluntly, when Edward was trying to cozen him with his insinuations about him; "George's my favorite, and will be my heir. Curse any one who bites him behind his back!"

But Edward's plausible flummery smoothed the breach over, but he remembered the words, and muttered, "so, so; we shall see." And, as the constant dripping of water will make an impression on the hardest stone, so Edward's artful calumnies touched Trevanion at last. One night when the old fellow was ludicrously drunk, the young villain worked so skillfully on his feelings that, blinded by rage, and half-mad with the punch, he left the room, and made unusually strong: he brought forth the will bequeathing his fortune to George, and cursing and raving like a madman, destroyed it to pieces.

"See there," he said; "that's what I've done for him, and the hound hates me for it. He wants me to die, that he may get my money. Is his family have sent him to capture my money? Look how I serve him." And he threw the parchment into the fire. "Now, Ned," he added, "I'll make you my heir."

He was too drunk and stubborn to execute his promise that evening, but Edward would have endeavored to make him do so, but the next day, between grief and prostration, he kept his bed and refused to get up. Edward entered the room, message to the poor fellow, and added a clause that ordered by Trevanion, to the effect that George should leave the house, and never return. Outraged at such conduct from his uncle, and not suspecting it was a trap, George departed instantly, and Edward's machinations began to collect his scattered senses, and wished to see him. Edward read a forged letter from George, full of abuse and ingratitude, and Trevanion confirmed by his flight, and Trevanion's rage being in favor of Edward.

After this hasty act Trevanion became more morose and taciturn than ever. He would wander up and down the picture gallery where he had placed the portraits of his ancestors, shaking his fist at the dusky ladies in their satins and jewels, and the bewigged admirals in their scarlet coats, each bravely holding his sword. He had a contempt for all his predecessor. No one remembers who it was, but before the days of the Revolution, glass in hand, and with a strange chuckle at the idea he had conceived of course was very attentive, and plied Trevanion well with liquor, with an evident desire to rid him of life as soon as possible.

We can not stand still in this world; we must either go backward or forward; so Trevanion galloped on at the former pace as he could. He quarreled with Edward, and once even struck him; but, although the young man turned deadly pale, he did not return the blow, but endeavored to mollify Trevanion, who being generally in a half-maudlin state was easily managed. Trevanion had an iron constitution, and would not die, although he was, with Edward's assistance, doing his best to get into his grave.

In the midst of this dreadful life the unhappy man seemed sometimes to realize his degradation, and would pause with the glass half-raised to his lips, and then set it down like one in a dream, and remain motionless for some time, with his eyes fixed on vacancy and his breath coming convulsively. In these moments his thoughts would revert to George; and one day he said to Edward, in a voice he could not keep from trembling with suppressed emotion,

"Write to George, and tell him to come back. Do ye hear? Tell him to come back! He may have treated me ill, but I forgive the lad. I must see him once more."

The letter was written, and Trevanion put his scrawl to it; but Edward took care that it never reached George. Trevanion waited and waited. Day after day he looked for his George, but the sweet voice in Trevanion's room. And the master of Garfield House would sit in the twilight of the evening without speaking until the punch-bowl appeared, when he would grin like a bloodhound savagely, seeming to say to it, "Why don't you kill me?" He became more and more lowspirited, and quarreled more and more with Edward, who bore it like a saint, but who would rattle him heartily behind his back. Trevanion hunted more than usual, and generally at his mark; and, alas, his red face became purple as of yore, and his figure became bloated, from his trips to the punch-bowl. He appeared to grow weary of Edward's company, and when the young fellow was, as usual, ready to shoot with him, he turned on him.

"Stay where you be," he said, peritshly; "I won't have you dogging me, Ned. I'm going to shoot alone hereafter."

And he put his back to his lips, and after a long night-carouse fell. Edward ran after him to remonstrate, but got a blow on his palm; and Trevanion departed alone, and did not return for two days. Then it was that Edward began to hope he had broken his neck. But toward midnight he came back in a ferocious humor, and smashing in the window with his stay, staggered into the picture-gallery, locking the door behind him. He remained there a long time, and when he came out he found his uncle lying under Edward's nose with a stentorian laugh, at which Edward was about to get out of his presence that he might relieve himself by swearing in a manner that even Trevanion could not equal.

But confusion must come some time to the wrong-doer, and suddenly came it to Edward. One of the servants was taken ill, and Edward, who did not informed him his malady was mortal he sent for Trevanion's physician, informed him of Edward's schemes—how he had lied about George, never sent the letter, bribed the servants, etc., etc.

Trevanion sent up a howl like that of a damned spirit.

"My poor George!" he cried, "my poor dear; my good boy! And that young villain hasn't got me yet. Thank God I've done right!"

His words were mysterious. "Thank God I've done right!" sounded strangely coming from the lips of the man who had wrought the only revenge.

"Come!" he said to the servants who had entered, thinking their master had gone mad, "come all of you!" And, bursting with rage, he caught Edward by the shrunk, and, followed by every body, hastened to the picture-gallery.

Thereupon there was a great uproar.

"Shoot!" said Edward, "take your master to bed."

This was done, and the next day the doctor pronounced that Trevanion could not recover. The stroke had paralyzed the whole right side and deprived him of speech. It was a fearful visitation from God upon the wretched man. The tongue which had year after year blasphemed Maker's name in vain now hung speechless forever; the arm which had been so merciless to those around him was now a helpless mass of flesh and bone. Trevanion was not, however, deprived of hearing, for the left side was not affected by the paralysis, and when Edward told him, with forced exultation, that he could not live, the livid eyes of the sufferer wrathed themselves into a ghastly smile of mocking defiance. Edward was left alone with Trevanion at the time, and, with a muttered oath, he struck the fallen man upon the cheek, hissing into his ear:

"Remember the blows you gave me, old dotard."

Trevanion's eyes cursed him for the deed, and the drunkard was appalled. But he soon recovered, and at once assumed control of things, and in ransacking among his uncle's papers to his joy found the will which made him heir to the Garfield estates. He flaunted it before Trevanion's face.

"Now I am safe," he cried; "you will never live to make another. You may see George as often as you please."

So strong was he had been refused admittance many times, was now permitted to see Trevanion, and as his tears fell upon the convulsed face of his former benefactor the dying man uttered an inarticulate moan, so wild, so full of irrepressible anguish, that George drew back in terror. Trevanion's eyes moved not from his face, and he passed his left arm around the young man's neck, and drawing him close in a passionate embrace, kissed him with lips which were never again to utter his name, to call him to remorse, or tell him how he had always loved him. Weeping bitterly, George said:

"Oh, Trevanion! oh, my uncle! fully and freely do I pardon you for the wrong you did me!"

The hand of the sufferer clasped George's slightly, and could scarcely relinquish it. Then, breathing with difficulty, he closed his eyes, and lay so quiet that George thought he had fainted; but suddenly he seemed to awake from a perplexing reverie, and his eyes began to talk to George. The young man dimly understood that he wanted to be raised in bed. He was right. But this was not all. Trevanion pointed to an arm-chair. He was evident: he wished to be placed in it. George turned to the doctor, who had just entered.

"May I do as he wishes?" he asked, explaining Trevanion's desire.

"Certainly not," said Edward, who had followed the physician; "my uncle is dying, and it would be cruelty to move him."

Trevanion waved his hand with a gesture of contempt, and turned his imploring eyes to George and the servants, who had gathered around the bed. The mute entreaty could not be disregarded by George.

"He shall at least have his whim gratified," he said; "it may afford him some satisfaction."

An eager grasp of Trevanion's hand thanked George, and the sufferer was placed in the chair. He was so exhausted that for a few moments he became almost insensible with pain and weakness. However, he soon rallied, and made fearful efforts to speak. His powerless tongue refused its office, and his breath came thick and fast. George, trembling with agitation, could scarcely control the sense, but Edward looked on with a sneer.

"He had better be put back in bed," observed the doctor; "this excitement will only hasten his death."

Trevanion motioned him away, and pointed to the door which led to the picture-gallery. There was a movement of surprise. What could he want? George asked him, "Did he wish to go to the picture-gallery?" Trevanion's eyes answered "Yes."

"This is folly," said Edward, impatiently; but he could not meet Trevanion's terrible eyes, and turned away without further objection, and George, who could not resist his silent but acute appeals, slowly wheeled him into the gallery, followed by the rest. He motioned George to stop before a certain picture, and eagerly pointed to it, looking from George to the picture. It was a large, full-length portrait of his favorite ancestor, just as he used to drink to and talk to the first George thought Trevanion simply desired to see the painting before he died; but the look of anguish which came over the sufferer's face when he saw he was not understood, convinced George that there was some mystery which his uncle desired to explain.

"He has something on his mind connected with that picture which he wishes to communicate," he said to Edward. "Does any one know anything about it?"

Of course no one knew, and Edward laughed contemptuously. "The old drunkard is mad," he said.

"Be merciful," cried George; "remember he is dying."

"Stop!" said the doctor, "he still has the use of his left hand: give him paper and pencil, and let him write."

Alas, Trevanion could not write! His signature was the only mark he could make, and George dared not risk that.

"It is useless," he said, sadly, and Trevanion's clenched hand showed how his being unable to reveal his secret was writing infected him. The servants whispered among themselves;

"Master's lost his senses, and don't know what he wants."

George was the only one who watched his uncle's convulsed face closely. It bore a look of stony despair that would have moved a savage to tears. For a few moments there was no movement in the room. Trevanion seemed to be lifted deeply, suddenly,—he raised his arm and made a movement toward the picture. No one could understand him. He repeated it. George made nothing of it. Trevanion's hard eyes, which for years had been dry and bright as those of a serpent, were now filled with great tears, and the cold sweat of mortal agony stood upon his brow. He fainted.

"Take him back!" ordered Edward.

The chair was slowly rolled toward the door; but as it crossed the threshold a violent convulsion seized Trevanion, his eyes flared open, he writhed and rose in the chair, and with supernatural strength dragged himself back to the picture, uttering inarticulate moans of dreadful anguish. When he reached the picture, he pointed with fury to it, in a confused sort of way which showed his strength was fast failing.

"He is mad!" said the doctor. "Raise him, and put him in the chair."

This was done. Trevanion grasped George's hand like a vice. Again he made the motion. George wrung his hands in despair.

"Oh, if I could only understand him!" he said.

He knelt at the chair and strove to calm him, but it was useless. Trevanion still repeated the mysterious movement with his left arm.

Suddenly George uttered a cry.

"I know what he wishes!" he exclaimed.

"What is it?" asked every one.

"A pistol!"

"A pistol?"

"Yes."

"To blow his brains out," screamed the servants.

"No, no—it can not be," replied George.

"This mummery shall go no further," interrupted Edward, angrily; "take him back to the room."

Trevanion clung to George, and shook his head slowly at first, then more slowly. He was going fast: his livid face was becoming bloodless, his hand was damp and felt like that of a corpse.

"Stop!" said George, "touch him at your peril."

"I warn you not to give him a pistol," said Edward.

"By Heaven, he shall have one!" shouted George, glaring at the trembling people around him like a young lion, and drawing a pistol from his breast, he cocked it, and placed it in Trevanion's left hand.

A look of superhuman joy passed over the dying man's face. Edward shrank behind the servants, fearing Trevanion wished to kill him. Every one was breathless in expectation. The room was silent as the grave. Trevanion slowly raised his arm, and pointed it at the picture of his ancestor.

There was a dreadful pause of suspense.

Trevanion fired!

Merciful Heaven! What did they see? The picture slid aside, revealing a closet. Trevanion's shot had struck the secret spring, and the mystery was revealed.

George sprang forward, and discovered the closet contained nothing but a small box, in which was a piece of parchment. On his pocket-have learned its contents, when a whisper of horror attracted his attention. He turned—Trevanion lay dead in his chair, and the light of the dying sun, streaming in the window, seemed to shine on his face with a kiss of heavenly forgiveness.

"Now that this farce is over," said Edward, "I will thank you to leave the house. This will," he added, taking up the box with his pocket, "bearing the date of two months since, makes me master of the Garfield estates."

George glanced hastily at the document he had taken from the secret closet, and a change like lightning came over his face.

"This is a subsequent will," he said, calmly, "bearing the date of a week ago. Depart! In the name of my uncle, I forgive you—but let me see you no more."

A DOG STORY.

Tan dog of Montargis undoubtedly stands the first foremost on the list of canine accusers; but the story is too well known, too legendary, and too long, to allow of repetition here.

Another harrowing dog story, having the singular name of "Bristol," is recorded in the judicial annals of the south of France. It dates from the year 1774.

A Marseilles paper-merchant went to make purchases at Toulon. That done, he left Toulon to return to Marseilles. Four days after, his friend, arrived at his departure, awaited his coming. For four long days they waited in vain in a state of fearful and increasing anxiety. On the fifth morning of the fifth day their dog, who had accompanied his master in his journey, arrived alone. The dog was covered with mud and dirt. Every sound of his voice, every movement he made, announced the deepest grief. He licked his master's hands, he fell at his feet, he howled, he began to howl.

"Misfortune has come to the house," she said. A presentiment of evil chokes my breath. If your father should be dead! The Lord have pity on us!"

"If you wish, mother, I am ready to go in search of him."

"Go, my boy; go by all means. Take Bristol with you. He will be sure to lead you to his master, alive or dead."

Bristol, hearing what was said, rose to his feet and walked slowly toward the door. The young man saddled a good horse, and set off at once with his master. He did not spur on, content to be following dog. During the whole time of his absence his mother had prayed and wept.

"You are back, my son," she said, understand what that means. Your father is no more, and I am left a widow."

He knelt by her side, and Bristol licked their hands while they wept together.

"What information have you obtained?" she asked.

"My father has been murdered in the forest of Cognieux."

For a whole month the authorities on the one hand, and the widow and her son on the other, made every effort to discover the murderer; but it all was in vain. Justice can find out any individual on whom they could fix a reasonable suspicion. Six months elapsed. The attention of the officers of justice began to relax. At the recent crimes, they thought no more of the paper-merchant. But those he had left still mourned his loss. Bristol had lost all his spirits. He spent whole hours sorrowfully stretched on a little straw in the court-yard of the house.

One morning, the young man, speaking master about the town, he entered with him into a cafe in which several strangers were assembled. A young man was at a billiard table beside a couple of acquaintances, and Bristol, having nothing better to do, begulled the time by licking up what fell from the cues. Suddenly, while uttering a low growl, he furiously flew at a tall thin man who was amusing himself with the game of billiards.

The man, in alarm, called out for help. The guests rose from their seats and crowded round him. They tried to keep the dog back; they beat him severely about the head and loins; but all to no purpose. It only redoubled Bristol's fury. He paid no attention to the blows he was maltreated him; all his rage was directed against the man who was playing billiards. As soon as he was driven off he darted upon him again. He tore his clothes and bit his legs.

"This is insufferable, abominable!" shouted the by-standers, addressing their angry looks to the owner. "Call off your dog, and take him out of the room."

With some difficulty the young man succeeded in making the enraged animal loose his hold, and could find no other means of calming him except by carrying him quite out of the café. But before they had gone a hundred steps Bristol left his master, returned to the café, and again attacked the tall thin stranger. Once more the young man was obliged to employ force to separate the dog from his enemy.

Among the witnesses of this terrible scene there happened to be a commercial gentleman who had formerly been intimately acquainted with the paper-merchant. Pale and trembling with agitation, he approached the young man, and inquired in a whisper, "When your father took his unfortunate journey to Toulon had he this dog with him?"

"Yes," replied the paper-merchant's son. "Bristol returned to his master's house before the latter which has ruined us was known."

During this secret conversation Bristol, whom his master had called to his side by means of a rope round his neck, made extraordinary efforts to get loose.

"I may be mistaken," the other continued, "but it is just possible this man may be your father's murderer. Remain here while all these people are busy disposing themselves down as they has happened; I will run to the Commissaire de Police for a force sufficient to arrest the man."

In a quarter of an hour he came back with a posse of men, who surrounded and filled the public house. The suspected individual was at once arrested and conducted forthwith to prison. On searching him they found upon him the paper-merchant's watch and several other trinkets which were identified as having been in his property. The possession of these articles was a strong presumption of the prisoner's guilt; but it was also proved that, on the day of the murder, he had been met by a little girl as he came out of the forest of Cognieux. This circumstance evidence became up. He was found guilty and condemned to death. After strong and reiterated protestations of innocence, he confessed the crime to his confessor at the last moment as he was mounting the very steps of the scaffold.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

We always have felt a warm sympathy with the courageous inventor who, after having cried in vain to open a window in the car in which he was travelling, at length instantly dashed his elbow through the one adjacent to his own seat. Of course the outraged conductor was on hand instantly, with indignant reproaches. "Want to pay?" coolly inquired the offender. "One dollar," was the stern reply. A five-dollar bill was promptly produced. "No matter about the change," said the imperturbable man with pluck. "I'll pay for your pane instead;" and without further ceremony, he made a second breakage-hole.

If the unhappy mortals who are confined in the passenger-cars on some of our most frequented railroad routes should ever hope to enjoy the luxuries many a window would be rendered. Even in a short trip, as from New York to Philadelphia, it is almost fortunate—or unfortunate enough to be the possessor of a pair of lungs, requiring a certain amount of oxygen, suffers not a little discomfort, and is frequently driven to make his own private arrangements to obtain enough fresh air to sustain life. You enter a car-window—it is closed. A blast of hot air greets you, calling to mind the story of the "smoky fire" having been built "one seven times hotter than it was wont to be heated." A red-hot stove stands at either end of the car. Windows all closed. Some miserable ventilators and ventilators all closed. You find a seat—a nauseating faintness steals over you as you rap audibly at the window—it sticks fast—you try to open a ventilator with your umbrella—but there is some secret fastening, which you try your whole weight and at length force it up. Of course, you will take with you much draught entering in, and in a very few least perspiration. But what else is to be done? The heat is fearful, the close air insupportable, and suffocation is a matter which it approaches in such a way. And so you keep the window alternately open and closed, according to your sensations. Perhaps the doctor is compassionate enough by-and-by to let a breath in by the window in the other end of the car: but at every station a relentless creature enters the wood into the stove, without the slightest regard to the exclaiming temperature of the interior. Human, which with spirit vision we can discern, when railroad cars shall be constructed and regulated on physiological principles?

A startling phenomenon recently occurred at La Crosse, Wisconsin. An Artesian well had been sunk to the depth of 700 feet, and the boring was still going on, when suddenly the machinery was stopped, and a deafening explosion ensued, followed by a stream of boiling water, ejected with terrible force through the tube from the depths below. One of the workmen received a jet of scalding water in his arm and breast, which were severely burned. This unexpected discovery of a subterranean lake of boiling water occasioned much excitement in the vicinity, and has given rise to many strange theories. The singular spectacle of a perpetual column of steaming fresh water of the vast snow-clad plain in mid-winter is indeed wonderful, and bids fair to furnish a prolific theme for scientific investigation.

Do not give imagination too much freedom. A Massachusetts lady recently evinced symptoms of hydrophobia, on the supposition that he had been bitten by a dog. It was subsequently found that the dog was not bitten at all, and he is now perfectly cured.

A new style of skate has been patented, with which a person can walk as readily on a frozen or wet surface as with ordinary boots or shoes. This is good news, but it is not necessary to the skating any skill, and an abundant supply of cold weather, snow, and ice for this season.

From all parts of Europe the intelligence of the sufferings of the poor is most distressing. In Paris work ceases entirely on the days following the suppression of the Prince Imperial, and the other large cities of France are full of misery and want. At Algiers the French have driven the Arabs so numerous that the dead are buried in great trenches, like the dead after a battle. In Russia 500 have died in two months.

"Reconstruction" seems to be going on in a somewhat progressive line. Negroes slowly perhaps to suit the most progressive ideas. Several cases are recorded in a Virginia newspaper of negroes who are gradually turning white, and in accordance the first indication of a change in complexion was given by the appearance of a white spot about the eye. In another the phenomenon was heralded by a white patch on the chin. It is a remarkable fact that in most cases of the kind the subjects bear on their physiognomies all the features of the full-blooded African.

A Boston paper claims for that city "pre-eminence" in one branch of the art of stealing, and that is the stealing of newspapers. "It is not," remarks the journal referred to, "the abstraction of newspapers from the area and entrance-ways of private houses, by street boys, that merits particular reprobation; the boys know no better, and the law can deal with their misdeeds. But the habit indulged in by grown men, who occupy stores and offices, and do business in the markets, of slyly snapping up their neighbors' papers, left in entries and on stairways, and thus getting good reading gratis, seems to be the latest and most notable development of what is mildly called kleptomania. The extent to which this practice is carried in Boston entitles our city to rank among the first stealites of the age, in one department of the business at least."

Two interesting discoveries have been made in North Hamburg, Connecticut. Some time ago a lime-kiln was built with a dark reddish stone which abounds there, and on burning it to the temperature required the whole fabric melted as though it were lead. It has recently been discovered to be glass in a natural state. There have been specimens of it taken in glass manufactory, and fine goblets have been made from them. More recently a stratum of fine white sand has been found, which is ascertained to be disintegrated granite, and of great value in the manufacture of fine glass.

Those who dislike cheese should not travel in Switzerland, for this substance is every where forced under the traveler's nose. Seventeen thousand tons of cheese are annually manufactured in Switzerland, of which ten thousand are exported; and Swiss cheese is celebrated all over the Continent. For the purpose, to cheese the freshest milk, or that from which the cream has already been removed, is employed, according to the quantity to be manufactured. The cheese having been separated from the whey by means of rennet, is placed by in the manufactory, and it is turned daily, and moistened with cloths saturated with saltwater.

It seems to be inevitable—we shall have to come to it at last! London has given a great "Horse Dinner," with a most charming "Bill of fare." The guests were many; they went uncurbed, cynical, loose—a large, fierce, in the spirit of honest investigation. But they ate, and were satisfied with their repast; and the conclusion arrived at was "that horse-flesh is a delicate, nutritious, and easily digested."

A curious invention has been patented—according to report—to prevent a bad boy being carried off by another person than the owner, "by applying to it an indentation which should impede or prevent its wave excepting at the will of the person who has the said coward-lebeque," and the invention is described as consisting of "a flexible leaden tube, which may be applied to the hat as to restrain the latter from being worn till such time as the tube should be voluntarily displaced by unlocking it." This will be approved by the last-mentioned portion of humanity. Can not the patent be modified to suit unbridled?

Some years ago a certain professor somewhere got up a hair restorative that was universally lauded as being almost miraculous in restoring the hair to heads that had been bare for years. Among the testimonials was one signed by two hundred clergymen. In a certain city, as it happens, there is a druggist of the same name as the hair-restorative professor, and he also happens to keep the "restorative" for sale. One day an elderly lady entered his drug store in quest of the clerk if the professor was in. The clerk referred her to the proprietor, who was at that time busily approached him and said: "I have called to ask about the hair restorative." The proprietor took a large bottle down, and, unrolling it from its wrapper reverentially, called the lady's attention particularly to the signatures of the two hundred clergymen.

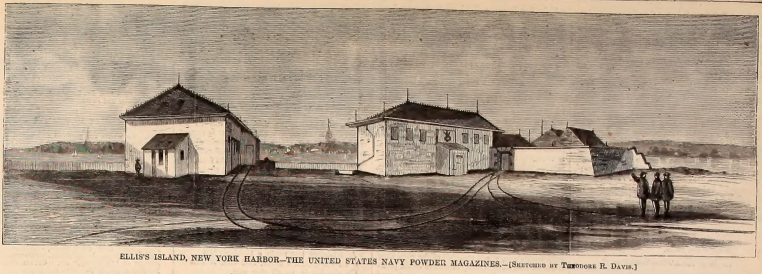
This decided the sale; but while the lady was rebag her purse and pay for the restorative she remarked, casually: "Professor, does then think it will bring the hair out?"

This was too much for the druggist. Raising his hat from his head, that is entirely bald, he replied: "Madam, you can see what it has done for me."

A burst of laughter involuntarily came from the parties at the counter, and the lady retired hastily with the hat in one hand and a three-dollar bottle of hair restorative in the other, and the old lady nowhere in sight.

There must be an opening for Mr. Bergh in Philadelphia, which notices as follows the cruelty we exhibited into "first-class," or indeed into any newspaper:

"THE WILL BE SLAUGHTERED AT THE TAVERN OF the Township of Moreland, on the Old Welsh Road, on Wednesday morning next, a fine, weighing, when dressed, 200 lbs. Also, a fine Shoat, weighing 150 lbs.



"SPORTS, LOOK OUT.—TWO LIVING BEARS WILL BE SHOT at the Tavern on the same premises. Also, a fine Gander, and several Ducquers wishing to secure a share of those Bears are invited. Come early, and avoid the rush."

THE STREETS OF NEW YORK.

The breaking up of winter each year leaves the streets of New York in the most horrible of conditions. The accumulated snows of the past winter, in many of the streets piled like mountains glacier four or five feet high, began to melt under the warm rays of a bright sun which appeared on the morning of February 20, and very soon the streets were well-nigh impassable. Our illustration on page 172 represents the difficulties and dangers and disasters of travel in the crowded and muddy thoroughfares of the city; and it is not exaggerated picture of a scene to be daily witnessed in almost any part of the city at the present time.

THE STREETS OF NEW YORK.—DRAWN BY CHARLES G. BUSH.—[SEE PAGE 171.]

ELLIS'S ISLAND, NEW YORK HARBOR—THE UNITED STATES NAVY POWDER MAGAZINES.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

ELLIS'S ISLAND POWDER MAGAZINES.

THE New York Sun lately called attention to the startling fact that New York, Brooklyn, Jersey City, and the numerous villages on Staten Island, are now, and have been for a long time, in imminent peril of being at once destroyed by the explosions of the magazines on Ellis's Island, which lies in New York Harbor, about half-way between the Battery and the New Jersey shore. We have had a sketch made of the Island, and after some inquiries into the facts in the case, find that the fears of the Sun are well-founded; the million and a half of people residing in the vicinity of the City Hall of New York are daily and hourly in imminent danger of being blown into atoms!

For more than forty years Ellis's Island has been a fortified post and magazine of the Government. Fort Gibson, which is situated on it, is one of the last of the chain of defenses of the harbor, and mounts twelve 42-pounder guns. The Magazine buildings, six in number, are built of solid masonry with slate roofs. The capacity of the buildings admits of the storage of 5000 barrels or at least 1000 tons of powder. There are at this time stored on the Island about 3000 barrels and a very large number of shells; while in the vicinity, and even nearer to Jersey City (in fact within a few rods of the Depôt of the Jersey Central Railroad), are the powder-boats of Messrs. SMITH & RAND, DUPONT, and HAZZARD, usually containing at least 5000 barrels, or more than 1000 tons. Thus, on the Island and in its immediate vicinity are stored at least 1500 tons of powder!

It has been clearly demonstrated by a simple arithmetical calculation, based on actual experiments, that the gas generated by the sudden combustion of 1500 tons of powder would exert, at a distance of eight miles, a pressure of 200 pounds to the square yard. Within eight miles of Ellis's Island lies all of Jersey City, all of Brooklyn, and all of the populous part of New York below Central Park. Every building in either of these cities has a frontage of at least 150 square yards, and would, therefore, in case of an explosion, receive a sudden shock of 30,000 pounds, before which the stoutest wall would instantly give way.

A great deal of precaution is taken to prevent any accidents on the Island; as will be seen by a glance at our engraving, the magazines are plentifully supplied with lightning-rods; great care is taken in handling the powder; the workmen wear canvas shoes, and are not allowed to carry pocket-knives or other steel or iron implements; and the metal-work used in the magazines is all of brass or copper. But still the greatest of precautions are sometimes in vain. There is not the slightest necessity for accumulating this amount of powder in such close proximity to the most populous city in the country; and safety imperatively demands that Mr. GIDEON WELLES, of the Navy Department, familiarly called "Father WELLES," by whose authority the powder is there, shall awake to the danger, and at once remove the combustible article from our doors. It is a subject which we should imagine might be of interest enough to the municipality of New York to prompt an emphatic protest.

BENJAMIN DISRAELI, THE NEW ENGLISH PREMIER.

THE NEW ENGLISH PREMIER.

IT is not often that a man without wealth or influence, reared to literature rather than politics, ridiculed and caricatured for his first book, defeated in his first political aspirations, and laughed down in his maiden oration, scorned as a fop and despised as an adventurer, has risen by the force of his own genius to the highest office of the most powerful kingdom of Europe as has BENJAMIN DISRAELI, the new Premier of England. There is no more remarkable romance in history or biography than the story of the man who, on the 25th of February, 1868, was "sent for" by Queen VICTORIA, and requested to form a new Cabinet for the Government of Great Britain. It is not the pleasantest of rumours: it is a story in which crime does not fully triumph, in which cunning, if not fraud, is for the time successful: yet it is the story of a remarkable man who has passed into history not less positively and prominently than more honest and less politic statesmen, and, therefore, it must be told.

BENJAMIN DISRAELI is the son of ISAAC DISRAELI, the author of the celebrated "Curiosities of Literature," and was born in London, December 21, 1805. His early tastes were for literature, and while he was a very young man he published several novels, among the most remarkable of which were "Vivian Grey," "Henrietta Temple," and "The Wondrous Tale of Alroy." The faults of these works attracted much attention, and brought upon the author's head much ridicule. Many years ago Fraser's Magazine published among the pupils of its contributors a caricature of DISRAELI, representing him as a dandy of the first water, following it with a young ostrich:

"The wondrous boy
Who wrote Alroy,
Which plainly shows,
In verse and prose,
How long ago
Victorious Judah's fun bemoor'ose."

He entered, or rather attempted to enter, public life in 1832, but was defeated in a contest for Parliament, and remained in private life until 1837, when he entered the House of Commons from Maidstone. He went in as an adherent of the PEEL party, and with a reputation as a master of satire and a finished orator, though he had as yet displayed no such qualities. "On the evening when he was to make his début," writes one who heard him, "there was a numerous muster of Conservatives, and the agitation of the Whigs was extreme, the impression being general that a formidable champion was about to appear, whose sword could put the falling veil while that of SIR ROBERT PEEL was clearing from hers. What was the joyful surprise on one side, and the rigid horror on the other, at the famous result of DISRAELI'S first speech! SIR ROBERT PEEL fairly shouted out his laughter as the speaker began, but in vain. The orator began by assuming the most ludicrously affected attitude, and his gestures and whole style of his language were in such contrast with the paucity of his ideas that the members began to titter, and as he went on from gross to gross such shouts of uncontainable laughter all over the House that DISRAELI began to stammer, and presently broke down completely. As he took his seat he said, in words which show the confusion and embarrassment under which he laboured, but also the power that was in him: 'I have been many things several times, and have often succeeded at last. I will sit down now, but the time will come when you will hear me.' Thereafter, for over two years DISRAELI sat in the House with no more sign of life in him than was exhibited by one of its carved griffins."

When he was heard again it was in opposition to the new and petty ultra-Toryism which he originally acted, and it was DISRAELI who, in the most memorable invectives known to Parliamentary eloquence, drove the great Tory PEEL, from power, and destroyed forever the influence of Lord JOHN RUSSELL.

MR. LEWIS GAYLORD, in old habitat of the Strangers' Gallery of the English House of Commons, wrote of DISRAELI: "We do not read this he was eloquent, argumentative, pathetic, or patriotic. You speak of him as you would of TOM SAYERS. His admirers tell you that he was 'in good condition' when he showed fight—that he was 'plucky as usual'—that he 'hit right and left'—that he was 'up to the mark,' etc. But how far more complimentary to our since his Reform Bill of 1859—the metaphors of the street concerning him have been historical. He does the 'country gentleman' act—he 'takes the benefit'—he 'came out in the third act'—he 'did the indignant well,' etc., etc. In his whole career he has been recognized only as a precocious actor, a consummate, finished politician, whom few trust and all feared.

MR. DISRAELI has thrice been Chancellor of the Exchequer—first in 1852, then in 1858–59, and lastly in 1866, each time serving under Lord DERBY. On the late resignation of Lord DERBY QUEEN VICTORIA, as already stated, solicited him to the vacant Premiership.

ECONOMY OF MATERIAL.

IN almost every productive business a part of the material used fails to appear in the result. It is lost in the process. The cost of this part of the material is, in fact, a diminution of the profits. In almost any process this wastage may be largely reduced by care. In some cases the difference between the cost of economical processes and one that is not sufficiently profitable is due to the fact that one reduces the wastage to the lowest possible degree, while the other disregards it.

The photographer's sensitive paper is prepared with a solution of silver. A certain amount of this paper is necessarily thrown out of the result, in the form of rejected pictures printed too dark or too light, and in the chippings made on cutting the perfect copies. These wasted pieces lie on the floor of the finishing-room, but if they were thrown away it would reduce the balance sheet by a considerable sum. They are carefully gathered up every day, and are burned to extract the silver they contain. Thus a part of the waste is saved.

The desire to turn out only first-class work inclines the photographer to allow liberal margins for trimming, and to reject freely all pictures that do not come up to a high standard of excellence. The desire to reduce the waste inclines him to pass those that are not quite perfect, and to be a little close in never allowing a customer to keep a proof or have an extra picture in the frame. The degree of good judgment which he uses in balancing such conflicting considerations as these will tell very materially upon his profits. It is plain that it is better to reduce the wastage by care in the printing so as to avoid producing imperfect copies than by merely endeavoring to rescue the silver from those that are unskillfully spoiled.

This is but an illustration of principles which apply to every business. One striking difference between the methods of artisans in Europe and those in this country is the superior economy of the former. In other respects the comparison is much to the advantage of our operatives: but it is probably true that American artisans are prone to be liberal with material and careless of waste. The employer often forgets that a reliable workman is the cheapest to hire, to perform his direct function, but must also be able and willing to do it with a proper economy of material and a due regard to the wastage.

In some processes the waste is very great. In the imperial carpet factory of the Emperor of France, where immense value is given nearly half an inch in thickness are made by hand for the palaces of Paris, about one-half of the yarn used is cut off and thrown away in the form of the process of trimming the threads down to the proper length and evenness. In some processes, on the other hand, almost every atom of stuff is utilized. Thus, in the great cutlery establishments of Sheffield, the immense heaps of bone handles are the chief article of manufacture, the ivory is carefully cleaned from set apart for the purpose. Pieces too small for handles are made into sets of dice; those too small for pocket-knives are shaped for little penknives; bits too small for penknives are made into thimbles; and even the dust of the bone, and even the chips and the white dust from the saws and lathes are sold at a good price, for making gelatine for the Bone Soup Societies which is lost. In this way, after the waste has been reduced to the lowest point, the residuum may sometimes be turned to account.

One of the most curious windows to be seen in the streets of Paris is that of the glove-maker. The beautiful kid gloves are displayed behind another, in a row running back from the window, each with its journeyman at work facing the light. The forenoon sun lights up the room as nowhere else, so that one passing by may stop and watch all his motions. Before him lies a slab of black marble or glass, on which he works, and from it he stretches and shaves with a broad, flat instrument which is neither a knife nor a chisel nor a scraper, but a mixture of each. Under his hands the skin shows a wonderful elasticity. Whatever form a piece is cut in is soon lost. A long piece becomes square, or a square piece becomes long and narrow. Exhausting the extensibility in one direction leaves it in the other. The "fit" of the glove depends upon the nicety with which this elasticity. The pieces must be so cut out that the glove shall give in breadth, but shall not grow longer, or shall not.

The hands are first cut out from a number of skins of the same hue; and every piece and shred that is left in doing the work is carefully saved in a jar that stands before him. The pieces thus saved are afterward taken in hand and stretched and shaped anew, and from the fragments and the sides of fingers are cut out. Pieces too short for this purpose afford the gores that are put in between the fingers, or at the wrist. The scraps that are not appropriate for these purposes are laid aside, and at the other window where goods are displayed even these are put to some utilized in the form of tiny kid gloves for dolls.

The feasibility of making use of refuse fragments depends upon the existence of a demand for such little articles as these. The immense demand for expensive dolls in Paris enables many trifles to be saved from the numerous articles for them, what would otherwise be lost. A correspondent writes that is used by human beings is made also for dolls. The manufacturer turns his scraps of colored kid into boots, gaiters, and slippers on the scale which are sold at from half a franc to three francs a pair. The tailor and milliner catches together her tags and shreds of lace, of velvet, and ribbon to trim doll hats. The umbrella-maker displays tiny umbrellas. Small fragments of sheet-tin and other metals are worked up into miniature utensils of every sort, some of which are for dolls and some for children. Even more for various little uses of real life; for French people like to use little for little purposes, and to have every vessel fit its function as snugly as a glove fits the hand.

Every time a girl or boy buys its own channels of economizing the surplus of material. The harness-maker and saddler produce little shawl-straps, only large enough to enable a lady to carry her water-proof or shawl, and little leather luggage labels, to be buckled to the handles of trunks, into which the owner's card may be inserted, to be changed from time to time without removing the label. The shreds from the curriers and the saddler's floor afford material for mending old cakes and sold with fuel, for the purpose of deadening and prolonging the fire in ranges and stoves. Some part of the material in the kitchen is used in France for the same purpose.

The Parisian joiner's shop affords a good illustration of ingenuity in this way. He exhibits a display of boxes and other wood-work in which it would seem as if every chip must have been used up. There are packing-boxes of every size, jointed brackets for shelves or bird-cages, foot-stools, change-tills for shop drawers, trunks for dolls, and mouse-traps are piled in the open window. And in a glass case are protected the more ornamental little pieces: tiny boxes for postage stamps, toy and puzzle boxes, and other little articles of wood: while in the door, perhaps, hang in search of buttons of pictures and drawings for kindling, with a ticket indicating the price.

It is to be observed that, even where a demand exists for such incidental articles, there will be a loss of time in turning the hand to their production which may counterbalance the economy of material. And many, if not most persons, will succeed better in producing a few articles in large quantity, than by dividing the attention among a number, some of which are of minor importance.

But, notwithstanding this, there can be no doubt that a vast value is annually lost in wasted material. The problem is, while maintaining the advantages of concentration, and avoiding the loss consequent on transferring skill from one process to another, to introduce such economies of material and such methods of utilizing the wastage as shall enhance the profits of the business.

ROUNDELAY.

THE dew is pearl'd upon the grass,
The bending ferns are tipp'd with it,
And heaven has made a locking-glass
Of the deep waters that God is wit
On all that is, on all that was.

Rathe flowers hang upon the hedge—
The tapestry of Nature's looms,
And on the narrow footway path edge
The violet lives, the primrose blooms,
The lily rises from the sedge.

A while upon this orbit shown,
Across the cloudy curtain of forms,
And lovers vows there seem to lie,
Like shallops on their restless home,
And seem to smile on you and me.

Queen Night has never deck'd her brow
With softer coronal of light,
Nor ever shone so as below
The purple mantle of her might,
That we may see sweet heaven through.

Join hands, while through the finger-tips
Our hearts are met in faith and love,
And in the eyes and on the lips
Hosanna rise: look, sweet, above,
One night, and night's a Apocalypse.

Come, lay thy beauty's length upon
The couch of moss, and hear the words
The stream, loved of the silent moon,
Is singing to the prayer birds:
Come, sweet, the dawn will catch us soon.

THE POPE'S PARADISE.

POPE PIUS IX. has made the Papal States of Italy truly the "paradise of fools." He has succeeded in effecting in that beautiful land such a miracle as could have been accomplished by a human—he has there abolished the primeval curse—made labor therein to cease. The blessed dwellers in the papal paradise no longer endure the uncomfortable sweat in which it was foretold that man should eat his bread. Labor is there accompanied by one little inconvenience, there is no bread to eat. Summer and winter, all the year round, the virgins unbroken idleness in the dominions of Pope Pio Nono. The subjects of his happy sceptre may sing and play the live-long day, for the earth is rich in loam and the plow never tax their strength nor occupy their time. Free as the lilies of the field, they toil not, neither do they spin, but like the birds of the air, they neither sow nor gather into barns.

We started out to tell something of the agriculture of the Papal States, but there is a difficulty in handling the subject; and it is precisely this—that there is no subject to handle. A soil that is more than fertile, a climate never but a country in which seed-time and harvest have ceased, furnish but slender materials—and one should think that starvation—for an article on agriculture. We are shut up to descant, not on plows, and oxen, and carts pressed down under a load of golden sheaves, but on marshy pools, bituminous heaps, swine, foxes, and bare earth. The husbandry of the Papal States is truly deplorable. The methods of cultivation are antiquated; capital is lacking, skill is lacking, and the very tools of labor are lacking; and solis which, in the days of the old Romans, were richly dressed, and waved with golden grain, have now fallen out of cultivation, and reverted into a desert.

For this scene of neglect and desolation the Papal Government is strictly responsible. It gives no encouragement to industry. On the contrary, by oppressive tariffs, and by absurd and preposterous legislation, it does all in its power to crush the very implements of labor be it denies to its people. The price of iron in the Papal States is actually four times that in England; and is so heavily taxed that the Government has placed upon its importation a duty that is prohibitive. Iron may be beyond the reach of the cultivator: and even were it abundant, there are no mechanics in the Roman States to make the instruments that are used in tilling the soil. What, in that case, does the Government do? Why, it completes the ruin of agriculture by forbidding the introduction of iron implements. Such cultivation as wooden implements can give at the land receives: but that is of the poorest and most slovenly kind; and the best part of the country is left to nature, which, more kindly than the Government, covers it at certain seasons with a mild herbage. The Roman farmer gives his land neither seed nor culture nor compost. The true foster-parent of the idleness and vagabondism which abound in the Papal States is the Papal Government; and yet it is to preserve this Government that Louis Napoleon moves all France and Europe to go to war!

NO DRUGS FOR ME.

Let those who cling to drugs,
The poison swallow down,
Blister with Spanish bugs,
Bleed, purge, and vomit round.

Death beasts disgusted turn
Their noses high in air:
Brute instinct makes them spurn,
Refuse it every where.

Shall man be lower still—
Core, force the nostrums down
Between the teeth, and kill
A child in every town?

A mother holds the nose
And cries the jaws apart:
Her child, compelled by blows,
Will drink to save more smart.

FAREWELL TO THE TRADE.

No drug-stores in future will be supplied with PAIN PAINT or Pain Annihilator except at retail prices. Therefore, after druggists have disposed of their present stock on hand, my connection with the trade virtually ends forever. Druggists make their profits on prescriptions and drugs. It would be inconsistent for me to divide my profits with those who deal in drugs or commence to deal in one. I am, and have been for a long period, opposed to the absurd custom of swallowing medicine. The practice is certainly a relic of the darkest and most barbarous ages, and it is utterly at variance with the enlightenment of the nineteenth century; and what little influence I may have shall be thrown in the line of humanity. Offices will be opened at all important points, where the rich or poor alike can feel the benefit derived from the application of PAIN PAINT or Pain Annihilator, free of cost, and every new remedies if satisfied of such results. In the mean time, those who live at a distance, who can not avail themselves of the privilege of practically testing their merits, will be furnished at the following prices, free of express charges: Fint bottle of Paint, 25; quart bottles, $3—for removing all pain of every constitutional nature; or half a dollar per bottle of Annihilator for $6; one dozen, $12—for curing catarrh and colds in the head. PAIN PAINT cures and removes all pain, and Annihilator cures catarrh. If a dozen is ordered, the purchaser pays express charges. All orders sent on receipt of the money. Any of the following free offices will furnish: 119 Cinathan Square, New York, General Depot; or 622 Arch Street, Philadelphia, S. B. Hastings, Agent; or 70 Cornhill, Boston; or 23 South Pearl Street, Albany; or 126 Superior Street, Cleveland; or 166 Vine Street, Cincinnati. Prices range from 25 cents per bottle upward. No quack can be met by us.

Very truly, R. L. WOLCOTT,
Inventor and Sole Proprietor.

EVERY MAN HIS OWN PRINTER.

With one of our presses, and the material accompanying it, every man can do his own printing, thus saving much time and expense. Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.
THE OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

OROIDE CASES, a newly discov'ed composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color so long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold cases. These watches are in hunting cases made at our own Factory, from the best materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are jeweled and well finished, with a view to the best results in regard to wear and time. For appearance, durability, and time they have never been equaled by watches costing five times as much. Each one warranted by special certificate to keep correct time. Price $15. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this small sum any one can have an excellent watch, equal in appearance, and a good for time, as a gold one costing $150. Also Oroide Chains, to suit watches as those of gold, from $2 to $6. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent in advance. Goods can be sent C.O.D., and subject to examination at express office. Express charges must pay all the express charges.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Grocers, Coffee-Dealers, Hotel-keepers, Boarding-House Keepers, and Families wanting large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our Fresh Breakfast and Dinner Coffee, which we sell at the low price of 30c. per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50c. to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Tea of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St. (Post-Office Box, No. 5643), New York City.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

Through our system of supplying Clubs, Hotels, Restaurants, and consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouse in the city.

Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a club send his name to us, state how much tea or coffee he wants, and the kind and price from our Price List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete we shall be to no loss to put up the different parties' goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost, so there need be no confusion in their distribution —each party getting exactly what he ordered, and paying for it. The cost of transportation to members of the club can divide equitably among themselves.

The funds to pay for the goods ordered can be sent by drafts on New York, by post-office money orders, or by express, as may suit the convenience of the club. Or, if the amount ordered exceed $20, we will, if desired, send the goods by express to collect on delivery.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary packages of less than $30.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-third by sending directly to "The Great American Tea Company."

BEWARE of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our Establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are bogus or imitations. We have no branches, and do not, in any case, authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office orders and drafts make payable to the order of the Great American Tea Company. Direct letters and orders to the

IMPROVED BRONZE ALUMINIUM HUNTING-CASED WATCHES
(The qualities and resemblance of this new metal are such, compared to gold, that even judges are deceived) and "ROSKOPF'S Patent PEOPLE'S WATCH."
The Improved Bronze Aluminium of which my watches are made is a metal obtained entirely from any ever offered to the public. It has captivity occupied the attention of Scientific men, and has not only called forth the eulogisms of the Parisian press in consequence of its particular properties, but has also received a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition, and even been favorably noticed by the Emperor Napoleon III., authorizing the adoption of Church goods.
The qualities of this metal are equal to that it surpassed by none except gold itself, and that only on account of the intrinsic value of the latter. Further details will be found in my circular, which will be sent postpaid on demand.
My watches are made of three sizes, all hunting-cased—one small for ladies or lads, and two for gents. The movements are well finished, carefully put together by skilful workmen, and perfectly regulated, and therefore warrant them excellent time-keepers. These goods being manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to sell many of the above sizes at the extremely low price of $20. None genuine unless bearing my trade-mark as above. A full assortment of all kinds of chains always on hand.
Goods sent by express, C.O.D., with charges.

HARPER'S BAZAR, NEW YORK,
Have just Ready:
SOONER OR LATER. A Novel. By SHIRLEY BROOKS, Author of "The Silver Cord," &c., &c. With Illustrations by GEORGE DU MAURIER. 8vo, Cloth, $2 00; Paper, $1 00.
We are enabled to congratulate Mr. Shirley Brooks on the many admirers he will gain by which his permanent place among English novelists will be in a great measure decided. In more senses than one "Sooner or Later" is his magnum opus so far as prose fiction is concerned.—Athenæum.
It is not often that we meet with a novel of which we can say that the plot is highly ingenious, the style is singularly brilliant, and the whole is thoroughly good; but these merits are united in the case of the book now before us.—London Review.
Mr. Brooks has produced his most powerful and most artistic work. "Sooner or Later" is a picture of remarkable power, and one which will become, in every eye.—Illustrated London News.
There is a healthy, vigorous tone about all he writes, which our modern satirists, with their venom, . . . His dialogue is occasionally very sparkling.—Examiner.
Mr. Brooks's literary faculty of "Sooner or Later" is the perfection of character-painting which it displays. Some of the personages who figure in it are—such as that glorious creation Magdalen Dormer, the heroine, and her sweetness, purity, astute, worldly wife, Mrs. Sergeant Penguin—are simply admirable.—Illustrated Times.
Every reader who can appreciate the sparkling style of the dear old days of animal spirits, the artistic effects, the smart sayings, the fine character sketches, and the delicate touches of clear, analytic double enjoyment from its perusal. . . . We will reap a grace now and then, and there ultimately, as a story, which is very great. The mystery of the opening chapter is kept up to the last, and the interest is absorbing all along. Besides which there are several distinct side stories, full of life and fun and cleverness, that run parallel to, and touch and mingle with, the main stream.—Scotsman.
For Mr. Shirley Brooks, though claiming full scope in conversations and descriptions for the display of his rare epigrammatic skill and power of clear, bright narration, lodges himself and his readers with a tremendous, harrowing plot, whose mystery is most dexterously maintained throughout.—Daily Telegraph.

A LOOK ABOUT US.

No one who is in the habit of reading the newspapers printed in the Southern States can fail to perceive how incalculable is the mischief wrought by the treachery of the President, and the hopes which he has aroused of a universal reaction under the auspices of the Democratic party. that will virtually give the victory in the long struggle to the enemies of the Union and of popular government. The fierceness, passion, extravagance, and folly of much of the Southern press ought to be made more fully known to the people of the rest of the country, not to excite animosity but to enable us to act intelligently. The spirit and tone of the papers of which we speak, and they are not exceptional, are not in the least changed since the darkest days of the old slavery despotism when it was a crime to assert the truth of the Declaration of Independence in the slave States, and when, under the dominance of slavery and the Democratic party, an American citizen had less protection of the ordinary rights of life and liberty in a large part of his own country than in Turkey. Slavery made it the chief crime to declare the equal rights of men, while the "Democracy," intrenched in ignorance, prejudice, superstition, and hatred of race, was the abject slave of the slave-masters. The mingled insolence and ignorance of the Southern newspapers in those days is familiar to every man. They published, for instance, lists of merchants in New York of whom Southern traders were to buy goods at their peril, while Northern merchants traveling in the South, whose politics were not agreeable to the vigilance committees of the corner groceries, were incontinently driven away, happy if they escaped with life and limb.

Slavery has been overthrown by the war; but the horrible demoralization which so vast a wrong must always produce in the society which encourages it still remains. We refer to it not to taunt any body, but to remind every body of the fact, and to insist that it is absolutely necessary not to forget it, if we would correctly estimate the situation and provide for national reorganization. Nothing is so easy as a doctrinaire solution of the difficulty. Nothing is so easy as to say that the Southern brethren, thinking slavery right and secession constitutional, tried to secede in order to perpetuate slavery, and that having failed they are now to be tenderly entreated; their equal heroism in the field is to be acknowledged and extolled; the political power of their States is to be put into their hands, and, in general, we are to beg their pardon as much as possible for having beaten them. Such a view of the situation is simply stupid, and a policy founded upon it is criminal. What slavery was we know. What the war was we have not forgotten. It was a tremendous struggle of fatally antagonistic principles: on the one hand that of privilege, caste, and aristocracy—the old spirit of Feudalism and of European civilization, represented by slavery, of which the political organization was the Democratic party—and on the other, that of civil and political equality represented by the Republican party. State sovereignty, the right of secession, all questions of the nature of the national bond, were merely dogmas, excuses, and theories to serve the great and real purpose. Mr. Alexander H. Stephens, in the prospectus to his new book, says that this is not the true view. But does Mr. Stephens suppose that we should ever have heard of the right of secession if the country had acquiesced in the truth of his assertion, when he retired from Congress in 1858, that slavery was nationalized?

The defeated party, therefore, are not merely a faction baffled in an attempt to change the administrators of government—they are men whose political faith is bitterly hostile to the principle of the American Government, and whose habits are incompatible with its customs. The defeated party, as a party, and excepting, of course, individuals, does not accept the American doctrine of the whole people as the source of political power; and it does not hesitate to pursue with all the hateful and intolerable methods of the most unscrupulous and tyrannical aristocracy all who differ. The conventions and speeches of those who are called "Southern Conservatives," which is simply a name for the old chiefs of the slavery interest, the preachers of secession, and the leaders of rebellion; the resolutions and speeches of their allies at the North—the Democratic conventions and orators; the efforts of the President, and the fierce and bitter tone of the "Conservative" press every where in the country, are all in the interest of the power which took up arms against the Union because of the evident fact that the popular sentiment of the Union was pronouncing against slavery.

This is the situation with which we have to and what we need most of all is to deal frankly and firmly. There need not be ungenerous or revengeful feeling. We may be as charitable as our means will allow to every worthy project in the disturbed States. We may warmly recognize the sympathy and aid of every man who was conspicuous in the rebellion, and who now co-operates with loyal men to restore the Union upon the impregnable foundation of equal rights. But we must not expect a sudden Millennium, nor think that blarney is statemanship. We talk of peace and conciliation; but we must understand that there is no peace possible upon the "Conservative" theory of political inequality, and that justice is the only conciliation. If the reaction could restore every State to Democratic control; repudiate the debt; subject the freedmen entirely to the will of the late masters, and send Jefferson Davis, James M. Mason, Louis Wigfall, and Judah Benjamin back to their old seats in the Senate, the country would be no nearer peace than it was when the compromises of 1850 were adopted; the real difficulty would be no more settled than it was in England when Charles II. came back again and the bones of Oliver Cromwell were dishonored. The "Conservative" view of the situation and the policy that bears that name are wholly opposed to the deepest and most enlightened convictions of the American people. Those convictions prevailed in the war, and any settlement which is not controlled by them will be temporary and futile. For the permanent peace and progress of the country the people might as wisely have insisted that Grant should be defeated in the field as that the political allies of his opponents should succeed at the polls.

THE NEW CONSTITUTION OF NEW YORK.

The proposed new Constitution of the State of New York does not provide for any really radical change in the present system, but is intended to secure less friction in the practical operation of the government. Experience has disclosed weaknesses and imperfections in the Constitution of 1846, which, after more than twenty years, it is plainly possible to remove or to correct. The new instrument, therefore, contains nothing which should alarm by its novelty. It is really the Constitution of 1846 made more practical, adapted to the changed condition of the State and to the differing necessities of the time. The principles are substantially the same. There is nothing, therefore, in the proposed Constitution which should excite party opposition, and the only distinctively political provision is to be submitted to a separate vote. We propose from week to week to consider the chief points of the instrument.

The new Constitution makes every male inhabitant a voter who is twenty-one years old, who has been a citizen for ten days, a resident of the State for one year next preceding an election, for four months a resident of the county, for thirty days of the town or ward, and for ten days of the election district. He must also be registered, the registry to be uniform in cities, and completed four days before each general and special State election and charter election in cities. The provisions against bribery are very stringent. The chief proposed changes in this article are the abolition of the property qualification for a class of voters, the registry, and the anti-bribery section. The abolition of the property qualification is the only provision of the Constitution which is to be submitted separately, and it was the form of the submission which was stigmatized by some of the Democrats as a fraud.

The present Constitution requires that a colored citizen must own property to the amount of two hundred and fifty dollars before he can vote. The exact question, therefore, which the people are to answer is, shall there be a property qualification for men of color? And this is the exact wording of the ballot, which upon the outside is labeled "Property qualification." What kind of property qualification, and for whom, the voter naturally looks within his ballot to ascertain. But because the whole substance of the ballot was not printed upon the outside it was denounced as a fraud. In other words, because the word "colored" was not upon the label of the ballot the Democrats insisted that it was a deception. We do not believe that they will seriously try to maintain such a declaration. Should this provision be rejected by the people, the property qualification will still be required of colored voters. It is the simple truth to say that not a solitary reason or pretense was urged in the Convention for the retention of this outrage upon common-sense. Mr. Henry C. Murphy and Mr. William Cassidy took the ground that the negro is of an inferior race and capacity, and reasoned that therefore "colored men" should not vote without a property qualification. The argument was this: the negro is a kind of higher ape; he has not the intellectual competency to vote intelligibly; but, if somebody will give him two hundred and fifty dollars he ought to vote. And that, indeed, is the whole argument possible upon the question. There is an essential intellectual incompetence which is removed by the possession of two hundred and fifty dollars. Mr. Murphy and Mr. Cassidy are both accomplished scholars, but the necessities of party are tyrannical.

This clause is submitted separately, because there seemed to be no good reason why any one popular and desirable change should depend upon the unpopularity of another. No sensible and practical man is blind to the hostility to the colored population which is carefully fostered by the Democratic party, and which is more general than its cruel folly should allow it to be. But no good result could be gained by insisting that the State should not have a better Judiciary system, or relief in the Legislature, unless the people would overcome this degrading prejudice. Such a course would have exposed every improvement to the force of the prejudice; and the Convention would have been justly reproached with a want of the first element of true statesmanship, common-sense.

It was hoped by many that the election of Judges might be changed to appointment, and that the tenure of a short term of years might be altered to a tenure of life or of good behavior. But this was a desire which was strongest among intelligent men in the city. The feeling of the rural districts was strongly in favor of popular elections to the bench, and their experience of the result was satisfactory to them. The delegates declared that they had generally elected good men; and that the short term, while it did not deter such men from accepting a seat upon the bench, secured activity, industry, and promptitude. The Judges, in fact, were not made a separate class, but felt, like all other officers, their responsibility to the people. Very warm and very able speeches were made upon both sides, and the Convention was very nearly divided. Finally a modification of the present system was adopted. The Court of Appeals is to consist of seven Judges elected for fourteen years, no elector to vote for more than five candidates; and in 1873 the question is to be submitted to the popular vote whether the Judges of the higher courts of record shall be appointed by the Governor or elected by the people. A commission is also to be appointed to dispose of the causes that have accumulated in the present Court of Appeals. The term of the Judges of the Supreme Court is to be fourteen years, and there are to be fewer general terms in order to secure less diversity of decision. No Judge is to sit in review of his own decision; and no Judge of the Court of Appeals or of the Supreme Court or of the Courts of Record in the cities of New York, Brooklyn, or Buffalo may practice as an attorney in any court or act as a referee.

It was rather amusing to hear the New York and Buffalo Judges, in obedience to party dictation, voting against a Constitution in which their courts were recognized and they continued in office. At present the Superior and Common Pleas Courts of the city of New York, the Superior Court of Buffalo, and the City Court of Brooklyn are not "constitutional" courts. It happened that many gentlemen connected with those courts were members of the Convention, all, without exception, Democrats, and the Convention "constitutionalized" them. It was a judicious policy, but apparently it did not affect partisan action. The whole Judiciary article, however, is declared by the lawyers of both parties and from all sections of the State to be a very great improvement upon the present system. No one was more strenuously of this opinion than Judge Comstock of Syracuse, who especially interested himself in the article, and whose opinion upon all purely legal questions, when not complicated with politics, was justly of great weight in the Convention. The article was adopted after a remarkably able and thorough discussion, and is well worthy the most careful study of the people.

THE REMOVABILITY OF PUBLIC OFFICERS.

President Johnson, in deciding to remove Mr. Stanton, accepted the construction put upon the Constitution by the first Congress, that the power of removal is an Executive power, and rejected that of the last Congress that it shall be exercised only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. He did this with his eyes open, in clear view of the fact that the House which impeaches, and the Senate which tries, had, as legislators under the solemnity of an oath to support the Constitution, asserted the policy in the Tenure-of-Office Act which he deliberately spurned and contemned. He knew full well that the Court of Impeachment were judges of the law and of the fact—no higher tribunal having been created by the people—and that it was improbable that they would reject as members of the Court what as Senators they had solemnly avowed. He can not complain, therefore, of the situation, as he chose it voluntarily and defiantly—acting in conjunction with those who seek to defeat the general policy of Congress. He was the head of the Government; he had sworn to see the laws faithfully executed, but he placed himself in direct opposition to their execution. Congress could not retain the support of the people, or secure respect for the laws in any quarter, if an instance so signal and flagrant of contempt for their authority, involving a threat of repetition, were overlooked.

The First Congress was undoubtedly influenced in its decision by the exalted character of the President, and the probability that the succession for a long course of years would devolve on the revolutionary patriots who constituted the supports of Washington. Mr. Madison said, in the debate on the motion to strike out the words "to be removable by the President" in the act creating the Secretary of Foreign Affairs, that "If the Constitution is silent, and it is a power the Legislature have a right to confer, it will appear to the world, if we strike out the clause, as if we doubted the propriety of vesting it in the President of the United States." Mr. Smith, member from South Carolina, observed, "Perhaps gentlemen are so much dazzled with the splendor of the virtues of the President as not to be able to see into futurity. The framers of the Constitution did not confine their views to the first person who was looked up to, to fill the Presidential chair."

The prudence of the several incumbents of the Presidency to, and including, John Quincy Adams, in exercising the power of removal, satisfied the country with the decision thus made. The instance during the administration of Mr. Adams, of the attempted removal of Jonathan Thompson, Collector of this port, is well remembered. A Committee consisting of important citizens of New York, headed by Charles King, went to Washington for that object. Mr. Adams expressed his willingness to gratify them, and they were about leaving. "But, gentlemen," said he, "you have not mentioned the objections you have to Mr. Thompson." "Why," said Mr. King, "he is against your Administration." Mr. Adams, finding there was no other objection, answered, that Mr. Thompson had a perfect right to his own opinion; and if there were no other reasons he should not be removed.

On the inauguration of General Jackson the doctrine that to the victors belong the spoils was announced, and in one year from his inauguration on the 4th of March, 1829, the removals amounted to eight in the diplomatic corps, thirty-six in the Executive departments, and one hundred and ninety-nine in important civil posts, whereas during the eight years of Washington's administration only nine officers in the whole had been displaced. "This extraordinary change," said Judge Story, "has awakened general attention and brought back the whole controversy with regard to the Executive power of removal to a severe scrutiny. Many of the most eminent statesmen in the country," he continues, "have expressed a deliberate opinion that it is utterly indefensible, and that the only sound interpretation of the Constitution is that avowed upon its adoption; that is to say, that the power of removal belongs to the appointing power"—meaning the Senate conjointly with the President.

The Constitution expressly provides that the appointment of all inferior officers may be devolved upon the President alone, the Heads of Departments, or the Supreme Court. The appointment of all officers below the grade of the Heads of Departments may thus be provided for by Congress, which might confer the authority on the Heads of Departments and the Supreme Court alone as to all officers respectively under them. This constitutional provision could not be satisfied if the President might remove such appointees at his pleasure. As to all such appointments, the power of removal would follow the appointing power, for otherwise perpetual conflict might exist between the two authorities, one insisting upon appointing, the other upon removing. Here, then, it must be admitted, is an exception which Congress may make to the universality of the rule authorizing removals, claimed as appertaining to the Presidential office. The character of this power, to be exercised by the Heads of Departments under the Constitution, furnishes a strong argument against the position that they themselves may be displaced by the President. The power of the President over them expressed in the Constitution is that "he may require the opinion in writing of the principal officer in each of the Executive Departments upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices." The expression of this power would be wholly unnecessary if the Constitution, by necessary implication, gave the President alone power to remove these very officers, for this would have embraced entire control over their action. The Heads of Departments have duties to perform most intimately connected with Congress. Treaties are to be made by and with the advice, and subsequently by and with the consent of the Senate, provided two-thirds of those present concur. The Secretary of State, whose duties relate chiefly to foreign affairs, represents both the President and the Senate in this duty. The Secretary of the Treasury makes his report directly to Congress, not to the President. This is done to enable Congress to employ the proper means to meet the public expenditure. The Secretary of War is equally the representative of the Legislative and of the Executive Department. The power to declare war is wholly Legislative under our Constitution, differing in that respect from the British, under which it is wholly Executive. The controversy between Congress and the President with respect to the mode of tying up the ends of the war, in which he seeks to defeat their will constitutionally expressed—for in a civil war the terms of peace are fixed by Congress in its discretion—proves the necessity of exempting the Secretary of War from the President's power of removal, except with the advice and consent of the Senate. If Congress may fix the tenure of any of these executive offices in a way to prevent the exercise by the President of the power of removal, it puts an end to the implication claimed in his behalf.

The power claimed for the President would enable him to defeat the action of the Senate in the matter of appointments, and thus in effect destroy the constitutional provision by which it is required. On the adjournment of the Senate the President, by removing the person appointed on their advice and consent, might substitute another and an unsuitable person—one to whose appointment such advice and consent had been refused. If to this it is answered, that the President would subject himself to impeachment, then we say that the offense committed more certainly deserves this remedy.

The theory that removal follows the appointing power, or if it do not, that Congress which creates may fix the precise tenure of office when not otherwise provided in the Constitution, encroaches provisions which on the opposite doctrine must be deemed utterly inconsistent. The power conferred on the President in terms to issue commissions in case of vacancies happening during the recess of the Senate, is not in harmony with the power claimed as implied that he may make and fill a vacancy at any time. The power conferred on Congress to devolve the appointment of inferior officers on the President alone, or the Supreme Court, or the Heads of Departments, can not be reconciled consistently with the broad ground claimed for the President, that he, independently of Congress, may remove all executive officers—even if their appointment and removal be devolved by Congress on the Heads of Departments alone.

The removability of executive officers by the Chief Executive derives its authority from the culminating point in the British Constitution. It has been transplanted here not by express grant but by implication against the popular branch of our Government, and in favor of one against which our jealousies were aroused. In England the Queen has an inheritable estate in her office, which she needs to support by virtue of dinary power, but this power is allowed to her only on the condition that the great offices in the realm shall be filled in complete subservience to the principles of the Parliamentary majority. When in a minority, the ministry resign. The President expects to have the benefit of the Queen's prerogative, without submitting to the obligation which the Queen is obliged to concede of a ministry harmonious with Parliament. The denial of this obligation in England would produce a revolution. We can accept the position that a bold defiance of the clearly and legally expressed will of Congress can go unredressed under our Government.

RIBALDRY AS AN IMPEACHABLE OFFENSE.

THE House of Representatives did not strengthen in public opinion the indictment against the President by adopting the article offered by General BUTLER, and reciting the indecencies of speech of which the President was guilty during his disgraceful tour to the grave of DOUGLAS. It is unspeakably shameful and humiliating that a President of the United States should be so far lost to all sense of common propriety as to denounce Senators and Representatives by name, to declare that Congress was an unconstitutional body hanging upon the verge of the Government, and to ask whether if he were Judas Iscariot Mr. SEWARD was ever his Christ. These are indecencies so revolting that they seem incredible. They are a disgrace deeper than has ever befallen the Presidential office; and it is common charity to suppose them to have been the result of mingled intoxication and rage. Indeed, could habitual intoxication be proved against the President, it would be ample reason for his impeachment and removal.

But this is not proposed. These remarks are charges of high misdemeanor, but are they of a kind for which a President should be impeached? We think not. Ribaldry, if the result of ill-temper, is shameful; and if the consequence of habitual drunkenness, as we said, the offender should be removed for the drunkenness. Congress has hitherto acted with great good-sense in the matter. While Mr. JOHNSON as a stump-orator denounced it as an illegal body, but continued as President to recognize its authority, it merely shared the profound humiliation of all good citizens. But when he proceeded not only to denounce it, but to treat it as an illegal body, by defiantly violating the law, Congress instantly impeached him. It does not strengthen the charge against him of violating the law to urge that he said that Congress had no right to pass laws.

The managers have the right of dropping any article, and we hope that they will see the propriety of dropping one which is not substantial, and which may tend seriously to prolong the trial. If a deliberate, intentional violation of the law is proved, when no public emergency exists and no immediate essential purpose can be pleaded which would not brook delay, it is not necessary to show such violation to be part of a conspiracy to defeat the law. An executive officer who violates his oath to see that the laws are faithfully administered, even if his excuse be plausible, is guilty of a crime which can be wisely trusted with the execution of laws. But if every significant action of a long career reveals bad faith, the important point to prove, in the simplest and speediest manner, is the violation of law. It was the universal expectation and wish that this should be the method with the President, and we trust it will yet be adopted.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE AND THE SENATE.

THE conduct of the Chief Justice of the United States in regard to the proceedings for impeachment has excited a great deal of comment upon the part of his friends, and it has been generally unfavorable to him. This was the natural consequence of the delay, and difference with the Senate, which the Chief Justice's conduct seemed to suggest. But it was surely not extraordinary that so dignified an officer, made by the Constitution the president of the Senate when sitting as a Court of Impeachment, should be unwilling to be set aside as a mere decorative cipher, not to be consulted or considered in the organization of the tribunal over which he was to preside in judgment. The case is unprecedented. There is no letter to guide to a conclusion. The presumption is, at least, not intolerable that the Chief Justice was not ignorant of what he said it is a court, and that it is not a court until, according to the Constitution, the Chief Justice is seated as its presiding officer. The precedent is now made, and the Chief Justice properly desires that it shall be carefully and firmly made, and he therefore interposes a suggestion, but in the most courteous manner. "I am informed," he says, "that the Senate has proceeded upon other views, and it is not my purpose to contest what its superior wisdom may have decided. But as the Chief Justice is made an important part of the Court of Impeachment, it seemed to him "fitting and obligatory, when he is unable to concur in the views of the Senate, to express those views essential to the trial, that his respectful dissent should appear."

There is certainly nothing unreasonable in this. For why is the Chief Justice made the President of the Court? Doubtless for two reasons: first, that the Vice-President, who is to be promoted by the conviction of his chief, and in conviction, should not preside over the trial; and secondly, that in so grave a matter as the summary change of the Chief Executive without a vote of the people, the two other branches of the Government should unite, the Judiciary Department being present in the person of its chief. If he, then, is to be moved by ceremonial or substantive part of the Court; Judge CHASE evidently thinks that he is not to be promoted by the conviction of the President wholly a ceremony; but Senator SUMNER quoted various English authorities which he thought proved the immemorial understanding to be that the President of such a Court has no vote or decision; he is only to keep order and dispatch business. If that be so, there would seem to be no reason for uniting the Supreme Court with the Senate in the manner indicated, and with the views of Mr. HAMILTON expressed by MADISON in the Number of the Federalist from which the Chief Justice quotes. The Constitution could have empowered the Senate to elect a President from their own number. It can hardly be supposed that it would have taken the Chief Justice of the United States to make him a member of the highest tribunal for a specific purpose known to the law.

But whatever the correct view, the motives of Judge CHASE, it seems to us, should be quite above suspicion. Certainly we certainly do not see the force of the Chief Justice's opinion that the Senate should be organized as a Court of Impeachment before the articles against the President is made from the House. For until the impeachment is announced how can the Senate be formally notified? And that when the Senate proceeds to organize as a court it should adopt its rules under the presidency of its constitutional chief does not seem a very rash or disorganizing proposition.

DIPLOMATIC DISCIPLINE

ANOTHER M'CRACKEN has appeared. Mr. RICHARD ROTHWELL writes to the Secretary of State that the United States Consul at Rome, Mr. CUSHMAN, has been dragging the good name of America in the mire by fighting with the Papal troops against GARIBALDI. Mr. SEWARD sends a copy of the letter to Consul CUSHMAN, who replies that ROTHWELL is of English artist of very eccentric habits and of very little reputation, and adds that he went out with the Papal troops, not to fight with them, but to be upon the ground and ascertain the truth for himself. We know nothing of Consul CUSHMAN. He may be as much of a reactionaire as his official superior in the State Department; but there is nothing essentially improbable in his story. We have known other Americans who went upon the staffs of French Generals in their African campaigns, but who are not therefore to be supposed in favor of the French policy in Algiers. They were not consuls, however, and Mr. CUSHMAN may have forgotten his official character—although if any such functionary may be pardoned for such forgetfulness it is the United States Consul in Rome.

But the extraordinary tenor of the correspondence is not the letter of Mr. ROTHWELL nor of Consul CUSHMAN, but of Mr. SEWARD. With the air of a schoolmaster threatening a small pupil, or of a Prussian drill-sergeant shaking his cane at a raw recruit, Mr. SEWARD, as Secretary of State, writes to an agent of this Government in Rome that if his conduct is for these reasons entirely disapproved. It will depend in part upon your own better conduct hereafter, and in some part on circumstances not yet fully understood, whether the Department can be content to leave the case with a reprimand." The discipline of an American agent or minister exposed to the letters of Mr. CRACKEN, ROTHWELL, and SEWARD is certainly severe.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

The transactions in Congress outside of impeachment are not of general importance. The progress of the impeachment measures are fully reported elsewhere.

Mr. John A. Logan, in the House, on March 9, astonished the members by announcing that three officers had certified to the destruction of $18,446,000 of current bonds, when in fact no such bonds had been destroyed. The Committee on Retrenchment at once began inquiries into the matter.

NEWS ITEMS.

In the Louisiana Reconstruction Convention, on March 9, a resolution was offered by a colored delegate, declaring the Governor of Jefferson Davis of the State was detrimental to peace and good order, and that he be requested to leave the State within twenty-four hours; but after debate the resolution was ordered to be tabled by a majority of more than 60 emasated.

General George R. Vickers, of Kent County, Maryland, was elected United States Senator on March 9, vice Thomas, who was declared ineligible.

The national debt was decreased over $7,000,000 in February last.

The Louisiana Constitutional Convention concluded its labors on March 7, and signed the new constitution.

The great snows of the past winter threaten to flood the rivers of the whole country. In the Valley of Virginia the streams have risen to a fearful height, and numerous railroad bridges have been swept away.

California has a chain of regular Alpine avalanches five or six miles in extent, by which a town was destroyed and several Chinamen killed.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE subject of Alabama claims lately agitated the British House of Commons for several days. The champion of America in the debate was Mr. Shaw Lefevre. Mr. Gladstone said that both parties had done wrong, and thought arbitration was needed.

Disraeli, the new Premier of England, has already introduced a Reform bill for Ireland, in which the abuses of the landlord system and of the churches are to be corrected.

Prussia has obliterated the last vestige of the late Kingdom of Hanover by confiscating the estates of the late king.

They are on the eve of a revolution in Portugal. Lately the queen's effigy was burned at Lisbon by a mob.

Reverend Josiee King, D.D., American missionary at Athens, Greece, has been cited for the 4th time to appear before the "Most Holy Synod" of Greece, to answer charges of having "revised the Christian Scriptures, blasphemed against the Holy Mother of God and the Ever-virgin Mary, the worship of the holy Images, the ever-virgin Mary, the worship of the holy Images, the invocation of saints, the sacrament of the holy Eucharist, the Confession, the prayers of the dead, the Sacrament of Unction, and the Sacrament of Baptism." The offense (?) was committed by the publication of a book which Mr. King had written and published in Greek, entitled, "Answer of Josiah King to a pamphlet entitled, 'The Bible Conspiracy,' by the Bishop of Caryatis Macarios Kalliurchon."

The New Dominion of Canada is not prospering. The tax-oppressed blue-noses are already emigrating to the United States. Numerous inquiries are made as to the best of the Western States to fly to. Nova Scotia has resolved to withdraw from the Confederation. Even the Provinces have to admit that the expenditures of the Dominion for the year will be nearly $20,000 more than the revenue for the same time.

INCIDENTS OF THE IMPEACHMENT.

AFTER the anger and indignation which were first kindled at the usurpation of all the President in removing from office Mr. STANTON without the consent of the Senate had subsided, Congress appears to have been inspired by a firm but quiet determination to restore to the Government him. After resolving to impeach him, the House has, without passion, and with little evidence and no expense, collected a mass of testimony with the preliminary steps to impeachment, and the Senate, with cool deliberation and imposing, though simple, ceremonies, has attended to the trial.

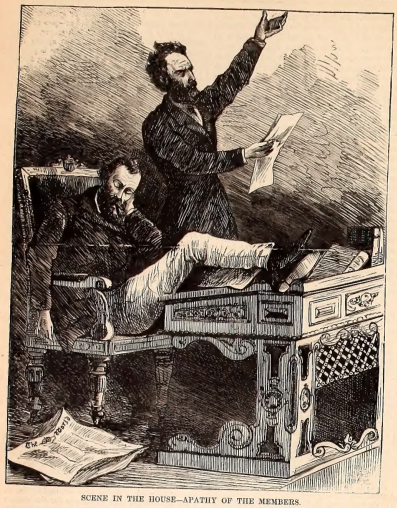
APATHY OF CONGRESS.

Our correspondents and artists at Washington unite in describing the serious and earnest composure of both Houses in acting upon the subject of impeachment, and the notable absence, whenever impeachment is discussed, of all the apathy and levity which is usual on other occasions. Almost all other questions, even that of Reconstruction, the House displays its want of interest; the halls become deserted or grow noisy; but when Impeachment is talked of—pro or con —it is only the lobbies which are empty. An amusing scene which illustrates the apathy of members on other and minor questions is given by our artist on page 180. It occurred on February 28, while the House of Representatives was discussing the Indian Appropriation Bill. Mr. JOHN W. CHANLER, of New York, had the floor, and, standing at one of the desks in the front row, spoke for half an hour as interestingly as one can speak on such a dry subject. Mr. A. G. BURR, of Illinois, sat in the rear reclined, in the adjacent seat, and so near that the sweep of Mr. CHANLER's hand, in gesticulating, would very close to Mr. BURR's face. One would naturally suppose that a loud, shrill voice, such as Mr. CHANLER possesses, would at least have startled Mr. BURR awake. But the very reverse was the case. Mr. CHANLER had been speaking and gesticulating very earnestly for more than five minutes, when Mr. BURR stretched both legs upon his desk, slid down in his chair until his head rested on the middle of the back, and very quietly and unobtrusively went off into the unexpired business, when he instantly awoke, as the Reporters' Gallery has it, with "Mr. Chairman" on his lips!

THE RACE FOR THE WIRES.

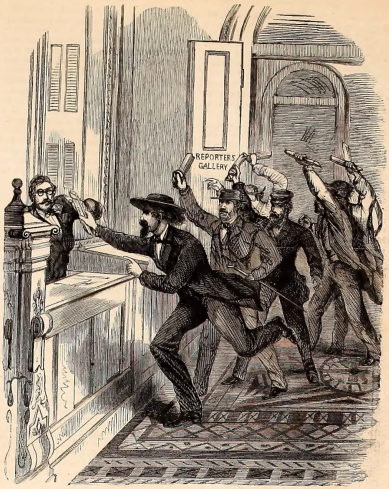
The excitement in regard to Impeachment in Washington appears, indeed, to be confined almost entirely to the newspaper men; and they display it only when something very important is on the tapis. On the morning on which the public prayer was to deliver the impeachment articles to the Senate the whole corps of newspaper correspondents, to the number of fifteen or twenty, assembled in the lobby to await the arrival of the report. As soon as entered the door next to the "third house" the crowd of correspondents rushed at him, regardless alike of the feelings of the door-keepers, all policemen and the entreaties of the public printer. They pushed him and his bundles violently through the doors leading into a committee-room where a House committee was discussing some weighty subject; violently disturbed the committee for the time without getting rid of the report in display; grasped the bundles from the hands of the printer, cut them open, and rifled them of their contents. Then they took their seats or the officers could interfere. The precious documents having been secured by the rival reporters, a race began for the nearest telegraph office. The whole force rushed through the lobbies regardless of the persons whom they knew encountered and whom they rudely jostled aside, past LEUTZE's "Course of Empire" without stopping to point out its beauties or absurdities, and down the long hall of office in the reporters' gallery of the House. Our artist has given this scene as illustrative of the energy of the reporters, and of the quickness of intelligence that industrious class as the scene on the floor is of most of the occupants of the House.

MR. STEVENS'S LAST SPEECH ON IMPEACHMENT.



Since our previous issue the most interesting events which have transpired have been the closing up of the Impeachment trial, and the "Last Levee of the President." Both of these occurred on March 2; and are illustrated by scenes on page 189 and 184. March 2 was set aside for the consideration of impeachment; it had been duly announced that THADDEUS STEVENS would close the debate at three o'clock, and that a vote would be taken promptly on his conclusion. Our illustration of the "Last Speech on Impeachment" shows this scene, which was one of the most interesting ever witnessed in the House. Mr. STEVENS sat, as he frequently does, near the Clerk's desk and on the left of the Speaker. When he rose from his seat and pronounced, in a clear and emphatic voice, "Mr. Speaker was a gentleman gently treated as ANDREW JOHNSON," even the noisy gallery became quiet, and a deathlike stillness fell throughout the House. It was broken a moment afterward, but for a moment only, by the movement of persons in the crowded part of the gallery from the front forward that they might see as well as hear the speaker, and by the general movement of the crowd in the House of the members, who, walking on tip-toe, approached the speaker and gazed up in his face while he spoke. Even the pages ceased their countless errands about the room, and gathered near the old man, perhaps more to gaze upon than to hear him. Mr. STEVENS, too, felt the solemnity, and stood before the clerk's desk to hear and watch the old "leader of the House." This speech, the last on impeachment in the House, will probably also be the last great effort of Mr. STEVENS, as he is very weak and aged, and has been watched by his friends of an early end to his earthly career.

THE PRESIDENT'S LAST LEVEE.



The levee of Mr. JOHNSON, held on the same evening as that on which this speech was made and the impeachment articles were adopted, was artificially announced as "the last levee of the President." Of course the last one of the season was meant, but it may prove to be his last in reality. It was not numerously attended, nor were the persons present particularly noted, or the dresses worn particularly brilliant.

THE IMPEACHMENT MANAGERS.

We give on the front page of this issue the portraits of the seven "Managers of the Impeachment," as the members who were elected by the House of Representatives to conduct the trial on the part of the people are called. JOHN A. BINGHAM, of Ohio, the chairman, is noted for his prominence in various great criminal trials, including that of the assassins of President LINCOLN, and he was also the Chairman of the House Managers who prosecuted WIRZ for MASSIMEEVS.

impeached a few years since on charges of uttering secession sentiments, preferred by ANDREW JOHNSON, then Military Governor of Tennessee. He is a native of Pennsylvania, and is now fifty-three years of age. GEORGE S. BOUTWELL, of Massachusetts, is among the most positive and unflinching as well as one of the ablest of the impenchers, and was originally elected chairman of the managers, but resigned in favor of Mr. BINGHAM. With Generals JOHN A. LOGAN and BENJAMIN BUTLER the whole country is familiar, their military and legal abilities having in times past been made clearly manifest. JAMES F. WILSON, of Iowa, is now but forty years of age, but as a leading senator of his State, and as its representative in three several Congresses, he has displayed marked abilities, which entirle him to take high rank as a lawyer even among those with whom he is associated in the great trial of the age. THOMAS WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania, is a native of Pennsylvania, and sixty-two years of age. His legal career has been a very successful one, and he has served as a legislator in the three last Congresses with great credit.

THE first words, when we had taken our seats, were spoken by my lady.

"Sergeant Cuff," she said, "there was perhaps some excuse for the inconsiderate manner in which I spoke to you half an hour since. I have no wish, however, to claim that excuse. I say, with perfect sincerity, that I regret it, if I wronged you."

The grace of voice and manner with which she made this amende abasht all its due effect on the Sergeant. He requested permission to justify himself—putting his justification as an act of respect to my lady. It was impossible, he said, that he could be in any way responsible for the calamity which had shocked us all; for this sufficient reason, that his success in bringing the inquiry to its proper end depended on his neither saying nor doing any thing that could alarm Rosanna Spearman. He appealed to me to certify whether he had, or had not, carried that object out. I could, and did, bear witness that he had. And then, as I thought, the matter might have been judiciously left to come to an end.

Sergeant Cuff, however, took it a step further, evidently (as you shall now judge) with the purpose of forcing the most painful of all possible explanations to take place between her ladyship and himself.

"I have heard a motive assigned for the young woman's suicide," said the Sergeant, "which may possibly be the right one. It is a motive quite unconnected with the case which I am conducting here. I am bound to add, however, that my own opinion points the other way. Some unbearable anxiety, in connection with the missing Diamond, has, as I believe, driven the poor creature to her own destruction. I don't pretend to know what that unbearable anxiety may have been. But I think (with your ladyship's permission) I can lay my hand on a person who is capable of deciding whether I am right or wrong."

"Is the person now in the house?" my mistress asked, after waiting a little.

"The person has left the house, my lady."

That answer pointed as straight to Miss Rachel as straight could be. A silence dropped on us which I thought would never come to an end. Lord! how the wind howled, and how the rain drove at the window, as I sat there waiting for one or other of them to speak again!

"Be so good as to express yourself plainly," said my lady. "Do you refer to my daughter?"

"I do," said Sergeant Cuff, in so many words.

My mistress had her check-book on the table when we entered the room—no doubt to pay the Sergeant his fee. She now put it back in the drawer. It went to my heart to see how her poor hand trembled—the hand that had loaded her old servant with benefits; the hand that, I pray God, may take mine, when my time comes, and I leave my place forever!

"I had hoped," said my lady, very slowly and quietly, "to have recompensed your services, and to have parted with you without Miss Verinder's name having been openly mentioned between us as it has been mentioned now. My nephew has probably said something of this before you came into my room?"

"Mr. Blake gave his message, my lady. And I gave Mr. Blake a reason—"

"I is needless to tell me your reason. After what you have just said you know as well as I do that you have gone too far to go back. I owe it to myself, and I owe it to my child, to insist on your remaining here, and to insist on your speaking out."

The Sergeant looked at his watch.

"If there had been time, my lady," he answered, "I should have preferred writing my report, instead of communicating it by word of mouth. But, if this inquiry is to go on, time is of too much importance to be wasted in writing. I am ready to go into the matter at once. It is a very painful matter for me to speak of, and for you to hear—"

There my mistress stopped him once more.

"I may possibly make it less painful to you, and to my good servant and friend here," she said, "if I set the example of speaking boldly on my side. You suspect Miss Verinder of deceiving us all by secreting the Diamond for some purpose of her own? Is that true?"

"Quite true, my lady."

"Very well. Now, before you begin, I have to tell you, as Miss Verinder's mother, that she is absolutely incapable of doing what in my opinion her to have done. Your knowledge of her character dates from a day or two since. My knowledge of her character dates from the beginning of her life. State your suspicion of her as strongly as you please—it is impossible that you can offend me by doing so. I am sure, beforehand, that (with all your experience) the circumstances have fatally misled you in this case. Mind! I am in possession of no private information. I am as absolutely shut out of my daughter's confidence as you are. My one reason for speaking positively is the reason you have heard already—I know my child."

She turned to me, and gave me her hand. I kissed it in silence. "You may go on," she said, facing the Sergeant again as steadily as ever.

Sergeant Cuff bowed. My mistress had produced but one effect on him. His hatchet-face softened for a moment, as if he was sorry for her. As to shaking him in his own conviction, it was plain to see that she had not moved him by a single inch. He settled himself in his chair, and he began his vile attack on Miss Rachel's character in these words:

"I must ask your ladyship," he said, "to look this matter in the face, from the point of view as well as from yours. Will you please to suppose yourself coming down here, in my place, and with my experience? and will you allow me the permission very briefly what that experience has been?"

My mistress signed to him that she would do this. The Sergeant went on:

"For the last twenty years," he said, "I have been largely employed in cases of family scandal, acting in the capacity of confidential agent. The one result of my domestic practice which has any bearing on the matter now in hand is a result which I may state in two words. I have found in my experience that young ladies of rank and position do occasionally have private debts which they dare not communicate to their nearest relatives and friends. Sometimes the milliner and jeweler are at the bottom of it. Sometimes the money is wanted for gambling. Of the motive I suspect in this case, and which I won't shock you by mentioning. Bear in mind what I have said, my lady—and then let us see how events in this house have forced me back on my own experience, whether I liked it or not!"

He considered with himself for a moment, and went on—with a horrid clearness that forced you to understand him; with an abominable justice that favored nobody.

"My first information relating to the loss of the Moonstone," said the Sergeant, "came to me in the Superintendent Seegrave. He proved to my complete satisfaction that he was perfectly incapable of managing the case. The one thing he said which struck me as worth listening to was this—that Miss Verinder had declined to be questioned by him, and had spoken to him with a perfectly incomprehensible rudeness and contempt. I thought this curious—but I attributed it mainly to some clumsiness on the Superintendent's part which might have offended the young lady. After that I put it by in my mind, and applied myself, single-handed, to the case. It looked, as you are aware, in the discovery of the smear on the door, and in Mr. Franklin Blake's evidence satisfying me that this same smear, and the loss of the Diamond, were pieces of the same puzzle. So far, if I suspected any thing, I suspected that the Moonstone had been stolen, and that one of the servants might prove to be the thief. Very good. In this state of things, what happens? Miss Verinder suddenly comes out of her room, and speaks to me. I observe three suspicious appearances in that young lady. She is still violently agitated, though more than four-and-twenty hours have passed since the Diamond was lost. She treats me as she has already treated Superintendent Seegrave. And she is mortally offended with Mr. Franklin Blake. Very good again. Here (I say to myself) is a young lady who has lost a valuable jewel—a young lady, also, as my own eyes and ears inform me, who is of an impetuous temperament. Under these circumstances, and with that character, what does she do? She betrays an incomprehensible resentment against Mr. Blake, Mr. Superintendent, and myself—consequently, all the three people who have all, in their different ways, been trying to help her to recover her lost jewel. Having brought my inquiry to that point—then, my lady, and not till then, I begin to look back into my own mind for my own experience. My own experience explains Miss Verinder's otherwise incomprehensible conduct. It associates her with those other young ladies that I know of. It tells me she has debts she daren't acknowledge, that must be paid. And it sets me asking myself, whether the loss of the Diamond may not mean—that the Diamond must be secretly pledged to pay them. That is the conclusion which my experience draws from plain facts. What does your ladyship's experience say against it?"

"What I have said already," answered my mistress. "The circumstances have misled you."

I said nothing on my side. Robinson Crusoe could know how—into my muddled old head. If Sergeant Cuff had found himself, at that moment, transported to a desert island, without a man Friday to keep him company, or a ship to take him off, he would have found himself exactly where I wished him to be! (Vote here—I am an average good Christian, when you don't push my Christianity too far. And all the rest of you—which is a great comfort—are, in this respect, much the same as I am.)

Sergeant Cuff went on:

"Right or wrong, my lady," he said, "having drawn my conclusion, the next thing for me was to put it to the test. I suggested to your ladyship the examination of all the wardrobes in the house. It was a matter of finding the article of dress which had, in all probability, made the smear; and it was a means of putting my conclusion to the test. How did it turn out? Your ladyship consented; Mr. Blake consented; Mr. Ablewhite consented. Miss Verinder alone stopped the whole proceeding by refusing point-blank. That result satisfied me that my view was the right one. If your ladyship and Mr. Betteredge persist in not agreeing with me, you must be blind to what happened before you this very day. In your hearing, I told the young lady that her leaving the house (as things were then) would put an obstacle in the way of my recovering her jewel. You saw yourselves that she drove off in the face of that statement. You saw yourselves that, so far from forgiving Mr. Blake for having done more than all the rest of you to put the clew into my hands, she publicly insulted Mr. Blake, on the steps of her mother's house. What do these things mean? If Miss Verinder is not privy to the suppression of the Diamond, what do these things mean?"

This time he looked on my way. It was downright frightful to hear him piling up proof after proof against Miss Rachel, and to know, while one was longing to defend her, that there was no disputing the truth of what he said. I am (thank God!) constitutionally superior to reason. This enabled me to hold firm to my lady's view, which was my view also. This roused my spirit, and made me put a bold face on it before Sergeant Cuff. Profit, good friends, I beseech you, by my example. It will save you from many troubles of the vexing sort. Cultivate a superiority to reason, and see how you pare the claws of all the sensible people when they try to scratch you for your own good!

Finding that I made no remark, and that my mistress made no remark, Sergeant Cuff proceeded. Lord! how it did enrage me to notice that he was not in the least put out by our silence!

"There is the case, my lady, as it stands against Miss Verinder alone," he said. "The next thing is to put the case as it stands against Miss Verinder and the deceased Rosanna Spearman, taken together. We will go back for a moment, if you please, to your daughter's refusal to let her wardrobe be examined. My mind being made up, after that circumstance, I had two questions to consider next. First, as to the right method of conducting my inquiry. Second, as to whether Miss Verinder had an accomplice among the female servants in the house. After carefully thinking it over I determined to conduct the inquiry in, what we should call at our office, a highly irregular manner. For this reason: I had a family scandal to deal with, which it was my business to keep within the family limits. The less noise made, and the fewer strangers employed to help me, the better. As to the usual course of taking people in custody on suspicion, going before the magistrate, and all the rest of it—nothing of the sort was to be thought of, when your ladyship's daughter was (as I believed) at the bottom of the whole business. In this case, I felt that a person of Mr. Betteredge's character and position in the house—knowing the servants as he did, and having the honor of the family at heart—would be safer to take as an assistant than any other person whom I could lay my hand on. I should have tried Mr. Blake as well—but for one obstacle in the way. He saw the drift of my proceedings at a very early date; and, with his interest in Miss Verinder, any mutual understanding was impossible between him and me. I trouble your ladyship with these particulars to show you that I have kept the family secret within the family circle. I am the only outsider who knows it—and my professional existence depends on holding my tongue."

Here I felt that my professional existence depended on not holding my tongue. To be held up before my mistress, in my old age, as a sort of deputy-policeman was, once again, more than my Christianity was strong enough to bear.

"I beg to inform your ladyship," I said, "that I never, to my knowledge, helped this abominable detective business, in any way, from first to last; and I unmanson Sergeant Cuff to contradict me, if he dares!"

Having given vent in those words, I felt greatly relieved. Her ladyship honored me by a little friendly pat on the shoulder. I looked with righteous indignation at the Sergeant to see what he thought of such a testimony as that? The Sergeant looked back like a lamb, and seemed to like me better than ever.

My lady informed him that he might continue his statement. "I understand," she said, "that you have honestly done your best, in what you believed to be my interest. I am ready to hear what you have to say next."

"What I have to say next," answered Sergeant Cuff, "relates to Rosanna Spearman. I recognized the young woman, as your ladyship may remember, when she brought the washing-book into this room. Up to that time I was inclined to doubt whether Miss Verinder had trusted her secret to any one. When I saw Rosanna I altered my mind. I suspected her at once of being privy to the suppression of the Diamond. The poor creature has met her death by a dreadful end, and I don't want your ladyship to think, now she's gone, that I was unduly hard on her. If this had been a common case of thieving, I should have given Rosanna the benefit of the doubt just as freely as I should have given it to any of the other servants in the house. Our experience of the reformatory women is, that when tried in service—and when kindly and judiciously treated—they prove themselves in the majority of cases to be honestly penitent, and honestly worthy of the pains taken with them. But this was not a common case of thieving. It was a case—in my mind—of a deeply planned fraud, with the owner of the Diamond at the bottom of it. Holding this view, the first consideration which naturally presented itself to me, in connection with Rosanna, was this. Would Miss Verinder be satisfied (begging your ladyship's pardon) with leading us all to think that the Moonstone was merely lost? Or would she go a step further, and delude us into believing that the Moonstone was stolen? In the latter event, there was Rosanna Spearman—with the character of a thief—ready to her hand; the person of all others to lead your ladyship off, and to lead me off, on a false scent."

"FOR ONCE IN HIS LIFE THE GREAT CUFF STOOD SPEECHLESS WITH AMAZEMENT, LIKE AN ORDINARY MAN."

Was it possible (I asked myself) that he could put his case against Miss Rachel and Rosanna in a more horrid point of view than this? It was possible, as you shall now see.

"I had another reason for suspecting the deceased woman," he said, "which appears to me to have been stronger still. Who would be the very person to help Miss Verinder in raising money privately on the Diamond? Rosanna Spearman. No young lady in Miss Verinder's position could manage such a risky matter as that by herself. A go-between she must have, and who so fit, I ask again, as Rosanna Spearman? Your ladyship's deceased house-maid was at the top of her profession when she was a thief. She had relations, to my certain knowledge, with one of the few men in London (in the money-lending line) who would advance a large sum on such a notable jewel as the Moonstone, without asking awkward questions, or insisting on awkward conditions. Bear this in mind, my lady; and now let me show you how my suspicions have been justified by Rosanna's own acts, and by the plain inferences to be drawn from them."

He thereupon passed the whole of Rosanna's proceedings under review. You are already as well acquainted with those proceedings as I am; and you will understand how unanswerably this part of his report fixed the guilt of being concerned in the disappearance of the Moonstone on the memory of the poor dead girl. Even my mistress was daunted by what he said now. She made him no answer when he had done. It didn't seem to matter to the Sergeant whether he was answered or not. On he went (devil take him!), just as steady as ever.

"Having stated the whole case as I understand it," he said, "I have only to tell your ladyship, now, what I propose to do next. I see two ways of bringing this inquiry successfully to an end. One of those ways I look upon as a certainty. The other, I admit, is a bold experiment, and nothing more. Your ladyship shall decide. Shall we take the certainty first?"

My mistress made him a sign to take his own way, and choose for himself.

"Thank you," said the Sergeant. "We'll begin with the certainty, as your ladyship is so good as to leave it to me. Whether Miss Verinder remains at Frizinghall, or whether she returns here, I propose, in either case, to keep a careful watch on all her proceedings—on the people she sees, on the rides or walks she may take, and on the letters she may write or receive."

"What next?" asked my mistress.

"I shall next," answered the Sergeant, "request your ladyship's leave to introduce into the house, as a servant in the place of Rosanna Spearman, a woman accustomed to private inquiries of this sort, for whose discretion I can answer."

"What next?" repeated my mistress.

"Next," proceeded the Sergeant, "and last, I propose to send one of my brother-officers to make an arrangement with that money-lender in London, whom I mentioned just now as formerly acquainted with Rosanna Spearman—and whose name and address, your ladyship may rely on it, have been communicated by Rosanna to Miss Verinder. I don't deny that the course of action I am now suggesting will cost money and consume time. But the result is certain. We run a line round the Moonstone, and we draw that line closer and closer till we find it in Miss Verinder's possession, supposing she decides to keep it. If her debts press, and she decides on sending it away, then we have our man ready, and we meet the Moonstone on its arrival in London."

To hear her own daughter made the subject of such a proposal as this stung my mistress into speaking angrily for the first time.

"Consider your proposal declined, in every particular," she said. "And go on to your other way of bringing the inquiry to an end."

"My other way," said the Sergeant, going on as easy as ever, "is to try that bold experiment to which I have alluded. I think I have formed a pretty correct estimate of Miss Verinder's temperament. She is quite capable (according to my belief) of committing a daring fraud. But she is too hot and impetuous in temper, and too little accustomed to deceit as a habit, to act the hypocrite in small things, and to restrain herself under all provocations. Her feelings, in this case, have repeatedly got beyond her control, at the very time when it was plainly her interest to conceal them. It is on this peculiarity in her character that I now propose to act. I want to give her a great shock suddenly, under circumstances which will touch her to the quick. In plain English, I want to tell Miss Verinder, without a word of warning, of Rosanna's death, on the chance that her own better feelings will hurry her into making a clean breast of it. Does your ladyship accept that alternative?"

My mistress astonished me beyond all power of expression. She answered him on the instant:

"Yes; I do."

"The pony-chaise is ready," said the Sergeant. "I wish your ladyship good-morning."

My lady held up her hand, and stopped him at the door.

"My daughter's better feelings shall be appealed to, as you propose," she said. "But I claim the right, as her mother, of putting her to the test myself. You will remain here if you please; and I will go to Frizinghall."

For once in his life the great Cuff stood speechless with amazement, like an ordinary man.

My mistress rang the bell and ordered her water-proof things. It was still pouring with rain; and the close carriage had gone, as you know, with Miss Rachel to Frizinghall. I tried to dissuade her ladyship from facing the severity of the weather. Quite useless! I asked leave to go with her, and hold the umbrella. She wouldn't hear of it. The pony-chaise came round, with the groom in charge. "You may rely on two things," she said to Sergeant Cuff, in the hall. "I will try the experiment on Miss Verinder as boldly as you could try it yourself. And I will inform you of the result, either personally or by letter, before the last train leaves for London to-night."

With that she stepped into the chaise, and, taking the reins herself, drove off to Frizinghall.

CHAPTER XXI.

My mistress having left us I had leisure to think of Sergeant Cuff. I found him sitting in a snug corner of the hall consulting his memorandum book, and curling up viciously at the corners of the lips.

"Making notes of the case?" I asked.

"No," said the Sergeant. "Looking to see what my next professional engagement is."

"Oh!" I said. "You think it's all over, then, here?"

"I think," answered Sergeant Cuff, "that Lady Verinder is one of the cleverest women in England. I also think a rose much better worth looking at than a diamond. Where is the gardener, Mr. Betteredge?"

There was no getting a word more out of him on the matter of the Moonstone. He had lost all interest in his own inquiry; and he would persist in looking for the gardener. An hour afterward I heard them at high words in the conservatory, with the dog-rose once more at the bottom of the dispute.

In the mean time it was my business to find out whether Mr. Franklin persisted in his resolution to leave us by the afternoon train. After having been informed of the conference in my lady's room, and of how it had ended, he immediately decided on waiting to hear the news from Frizinghall. This very natural alteration in his plans—which, with ordinary people, would have led to nothing in particular—proved, in Mr. Franklin's case, to have one objectionable result. It left him unsettled, with a legacy of idle time on his hands, and in so doing it let out all the foreign sides of his character, one on the top of another, like rats out of a bag.

Now as an Italian-Englishman, now as a German-Englishman, and now as a French-Englishman, he drifted in and out of all the sitting-rooms in the house, with nothing to talk of but Miss Rachel's treatment of him; and with nobody to address himself to but me. I found him (for example) in the library, sitting under the map of Modern Italy, and quite unaware of any other method of meeting his troubles except the method of talking about them. "I have several worthy aspirations, Betteredge; but what am I to do with them now? I am full of dormant good qualities, if Rachel would only have helped me to bring them out!" He was so eloquent in drawing the picture of his own neglected merits, and so pathetic in lamenting over it when it was done, that I felt quite at my wit's end how to console him, when it suddenly occurred to me that here was a case for the wholesome application of a bit of Robinson Crusoe. I hobbled out to my own room and hobbled back with that immortal book. Nobody in the library! The map of Modern Italy stared at me; and I stared at the map of Modern Italy.

I tried the drawing-room. There was his handkerchief on the floor, to prove that he had drifted in. And there was the empty room, to prove that he had drifted out again.

I tried the dining-room, and discovered Samuel with a biscuit and a glass of sherry, silently investigating the empty air. A minute since Mr. Franklin had rung furiously for a little light refreshment. On its production, in a violent hurry, by Samuel, Mr. Franklin had vanished before the bell down stairs had quite done ringing with the pull he had given to it.

I tried the morning-room and found him at last. There he was at the window, drawing hieroglyphics with his finger in the damp on the glass.

"Your sherry is waiting for you, Sir," I said to him. I might as well have addressed myself to one of the four walls of the room; he was down in the bottomless deep of his own meditations, past all pulling up. "How do you explain Rachel's conduct, Betteredge?" was the only answer I received. Not being ready with the needful reply I produced Robinson Crusoe, in which I am firmly persuaded some explanation might have been found, if we had only searched long enough for it. Mr. Franklin shut up Robinson Crusoe and floundered into his German-English gibberish on the spot. "Why not look into it?" he said, as if I had personally objected to looking into it. "Why the devil lose your patience, Betteredge, when patience is all that's wanted to arrive at the truth? Don't interrupt me. Rachel's conduct is perfectly intelligible, if you will only do her the common justice to take the Objective view first, and the Subjective view next, and the Objective-Subjective view to wind up with. What do we know? We know that the loss of the Moonstone, on Thursday morning last, threw her into a state of nervous excitement from which she has not recovered yet. Do you mean to deny the Objective view, so far? Very well, then—don't interrupt me. Now, being in a state of nervous excitement, how are we to expect that she should behave as she might otherwise have behaved to any of the people about her? Arguing in this way, from within-outward, what do we reach? We reach the Subjective view. I defy you to controvert the Subjective view. Very well, then—what follows? Good Heavens! the Objective-Subjective explanation follows, of course! Rachel, properly speaking, is not Rachel, but Somebody Else. Do I mind being cruelly treated by Somebody Else? You are unreasonable enough, Betteredge; but you can hardly accuse me of that. Then how does it end? It ends, in spite of your confounded English narrowness and prejudice, in my being perfectly happy and comfortable. Where's the sherry?"

My head was by this time in such a condition that I was not quite sure whether it was my own head or Mr. Franklin's. In this deplorable state I contrived to do, what I take to have been, three Objective things. I got Mr. Franklin his sherry; I retired to my own room; and I solaced myself with the most composing pipe of tobacco I ever remember to have smoked in my life.

Don't suppose, however, that I was quit of Mr. Franklin on such easy terms as these. Drifting again out of the morning-room into the hall he found his way to the offices next, smelt my pipe, and was instantly reminded that he had been simple enough to give up smoking for Miss Rachel's sake. In the twinkling of an eye he burst in on me with his cigar-case, and came out strong on the one everlasting subject in his neat, witty, unbelieving, French way. "Give me a light, Betteredge. Is it conceivable that a man can have smoked as long as I have, without discovering that there is a complete system for the treatment of women at the bottom of his cigar-case? Follow me carefully, and I'll prove it in two words. You choose a cigar, you try it, and it disappoints you. What do you do upon that? You throw it away and try another. Now observe the application! You choose a woman, you try her, and she breaks your heart. Fool! take a lesson from your cigar-case. Throw her away and try another!"

I shook my head at that. Wonderfully clever, I dare say, but my own experience was dead against it. "In the time of the late Mrs. Betteredge," I said, "I felt pretty often inclined to try your philosophy, Mr. Franklin. But the law insists on your smoking your cigar, Sir, when you have once chosen it." I pointed that observation with a wink. Mr. Franklin burst out laughing—and we were as merry as crickets, until the next new side of his character turned up in due course. So things went on with my young master and me; and so (while the Sergeant and the gardener were wrangling over the roses) we two spent the interval before the news came back from Frizinghall.

The pony-chaise returned a good half hour before I had ventured to expect it. My lady had decided to remain, for the present, at her sister's house. The groom brought two letters from his mistress; one addressed to Mr. Franklin, and the other to me.

Mr. Franklin's letter I sent to him in the library—into which refuge his driftings had now taken him for the second time. My own letter I read in my own room. A check, which dropped out when I opened it, informed me (before I had mastered the contents) that Sergeant Cuff's dismissal from the inquiry after the Moonstone was now a settled thing.

I sent to the conservatory to say that I wished to speak to the Sergeant directly. He appeared, with his mind full of the gardener and the dog-rose, declaring that the equal of Mr. Begbie for obstinacy never had existed yet, and never would exist again. I requested him to dismiss such wretched trifling as this from our conversation, and to give his best attention to a really serious matter. Upon that he exerted himself sufficiently to notice the letter in my hand. "Ah!" he said in a weary way, "you have heard from her ladyship. Have I any thing to do with it, Mr. Betteredge?"

"You shall judge for yourself, Sergeant." I thereupon read him the letter (with my best emphasis and discretion), in the following words:

"My good Gabriel,—I request you will inform Sergeant Cuff that I have performed the promise I made to him; with this result, so far as Rosanna Spearman is concerned. Miss Verinder solemnly declares that she has never spoken a word in private to Rosanna, since that unhappy woman first entered my house. They never met, even accidentally, on the night when the Diamond was lost; and no communication of any sort whatever took place between them, from the Thursday morning when the alarm was first raised in the house, to this present Saturday afternoon, when Miss Verinder left us. After telling my daughter, suddenly and in so many words, of Rosanna Spearman's suicide—this is what come of it."

Having reached that point I looked up and asked Sergeant Cuff what he thought of the letter, so far?

"I should only offend you if I expressed my opinion," answered the Sergeant. "Go on, Mr. Betteredge," he said, with the most exasperating resignation; "go on."

When I remembered that this man had had the audacity to complain of our gardener's obstinacy my tongue itched to "go on" in other words than my mistress's. This time, however, my Christianity held firm. I proceeded steadily with her ladyship's letter:

"Having appealed to Miss Verinder in the manner which the officer thought most desirable, I spoke to her next in the manner which I myself thought most likely to impress her. On two different occasions, before my daughter left my roof, I privately warned her that she was exposing herself to suspicion of the most unendurable and most degrading kind. I have now told her, in the plainest terms, that my apprehensions have been realized.

"Her answer to this, on her own solemn affirmation, is as plain as words can be. In the first place, she owes no money privately to any living creature. In the second place, the Diamond is not now, and never has been, in her possession, since she put it into her cabinet on Wednesday night.

"The confidence which my daughter has placed in me goes no farther than this. She maintains an obstinate silence when I ask her if she can explain the disappearance of the Diamond. She refuses, with tears, when I appeal to her to speak out for my sake. 'The day will come when you will know why I am careless about being suspected, and why I am silent even to you. I have done much to make my mother pity me—nothing to make my mother blush for me.' Those are my daughter's own words.

"After what has passed between the officer and me, I think—stranger as he is—that he should be made acquainted with what Miss Verinder has said as well as you. Read my letter to him, and then place in his hands the check which I inclose. In resigning all further claim on his services, I have only to say that I am convinced of his honesty and his intelligence; but I am more firmly persuaded than ever that the circumstances, in this case, have fatally misled him."

There the letter ended. Before presenting the check, I asked Sergeant Cuff if he had any remark to make.

"It's no part of my duty, Mr. Betteredge," he answered, "to make remarks on a case when I have done with it."

I tossed the check across the table to him. "Do you believe in that part of her ladyship's letter?" I said, indignantly.

The Sergeant looked at the check, and lifted his dismal eyebrows in acknowledgment of her ladyship's liberality.

"This is such a generous estimate of the value of my time," he said, "that I feel bound to make some return for it. I'll bear in mind the amount in this check, Mr. Betteredge, when the time comes round for remembering it."

"What do you mean?" I asked.

"Her ladyship has smoothed matters over for the present very cleverly," said the Sergeant. "But this family scandal is of the sort that bursts up again when you least expect it. We shall have more detective business on our hands, Sir, before the Moonstone is many months older."

If those words meant any thing, and if the manner in which he spoke them meant any thing—it came to this. My mistress's letter had proved, to his mind, that Miss Rachel was hardened enough to resist the strongest appeal that could be addressed to her, and that she had deceived her own mother (good God, under what circumstances!) by a series of abominable lies. How other people, in my place, might have replied to the Sergeant I don't know. I answered what he had said in these plain terms:

"Sergeant Cuff, I consider your last observation as an insult to my lady and her daughter!"

"Mr. Betteredge, consider it as a warning to yourself, and you will be nearer the mark."

Hot and angry as I was, the infernal confidence with which he gave me that answer closed my lips.

THE DOCTOR'S NEW SETTLEMENT.

When old Doctor Smith died he left his young partner, Doctor Stryker, with twice as much on his hands as one man could well attend to—not that he would have ever acknowledged as much—and so nobody at the village was surprised when one morning we were told that a new medical practitioner had settled among us. He had taken a very neat little office in a good location; and there was his sign, as clear as black and gold could make it, "Dr. Alfred Lowry."

Where he came from or who he was nobody seemed to know. He seemed, however, to make acquaintances easily, and certainly his appearance was in his favor. He was a tall, fine-looking elderly gentleman, as straight as a post, with a tremendous gray beard, and a bushy head of iron-gray hair. His face was not wrinkled much, what you could see of it; and when his spectacles were off he exhibited a fine pair of piercing black eyes. He seemed a very nice sort of a man, only he had a great faculty for parrying questions, and we couldn't pump him at all. He attended church regularly, and was so liberal and appeared to care so little about practice that we soon made our minds up that he was not poor.

Plenty of business came to him whether he wanted it or not—a man like the Doctor can always do well in the country.

He made great friends with the young folks, for he was a very accomplished man. He wrote verses, and he was quite a musician; but he did all that sort of thing in such a fatherly sort of way that it did not look at all out of place.

"Any thing to amuse the children!" was a phrase he was never tired of repeating.

I took to him from the first; but our next neighbors, Deacon Senter's people, stuck to Dr. Stryker. I told them that they did so because Dr. Stryker stuck so close to Fanny. Not that Fanny disliked our new friend—indeed, if Dr. Lowry had been a younger man he would have had all the girls by the ears about him.

It was not long before we thought that nothing we got up was complete, from a picnic to a mite society, unless Dr. Lowry would give us his pleasant, grave face, and his quiet and gentlemanly but most skilful assistance.

After a while he came to board at our house, and then I liked him better than ever. In fact, I almost caught myself once or twice wishing that he was not so old.

So things went on until last summer, and then he had been there a year; but we knew no more about him than at first, except that we had a vague idea that he had lived South and been driven away by the war. It was about June that Fanny Senter told me they were to have a lady-boarder for the summer. They had put an advertisement in a city paper and received an answer from—oh such a nice lady! Her name was Mrs. Loring, a widow lady from the city; and in a few days she came with a great deal of baggage, but all alone.

She was a handsome little woman, not over twenty-five years old, I thought, with a head of dark eyes, but her face had a very sad expression, though her widow's cap was explanation enough for that.

When she came it happened that Dr. Lowry was absent for a few days. He had a way of making visits, now and then, no one knew where, unless it was to the city after books.

I was always running in to see Fanny in those days, and I soon got well acquainted with Mrs. Loring. She was not in good health, but hoped that the country air would do her good. We were making our arrangements for a picnic a day or two after her arrival, but we were neither of us good at planning.

"Oh, dear me!" said Fanny at last, "how provoking it is that Dr. Lowry is not here! I can't get along without him!"

Mrs. Loring looked up from her book, and asked,

"And who is Dr. Lowry?"

"Oh, he is just the dearest old gentleman in the world, and we want him just now."

"I declare, Fanny," said I, "I do believe you are in love with Dr. Lowry."

"And so I am," said she; "he is worth all the silly young men in the village."

"Dr. Stryker included?"

"Yes. Dr. Stryker included."

But Fanny blushed a little as she said this, for we were always teasing her about the young physician. He was not a very handsome fellow; but he certainly had pursued Fanny Senter long enough to have made some impression on almost any woman.

She rattled on, however: "I don't care if he is a little grave; he sings, and plays the piano, and he writes the most beautiful verses."

"Quite a wonderful old Doctor," said Mrs. Loring; "you let me see some of his verses? Of course he has dedicated some to you."

"Of course he has," said Fanny, and I am proud of them."

I could not tell whether she said this in bravado or not, but off she ran after the verses, and when she came back she read them aloud herself. They were not very wonderful, one way or the other, but they evidently displayed a good deal. What on earth Mrs. Loring could admire in them I could not imagine, but she asked,

"Let me see them, please;" and Fanny handed them to her. The widow was quite unwell that day, and while she was reading the verses she turned so pale that Fanny and I were almost scared. She read them through slowly, as if she was trying to get them by heart, and then she said, "I think I must go and lie down a little, I am a little unwell. Which is the best physician, Dr. Stryker or Dr. Lowry?"

"Oh, they are both good," said I.

"Well, I shall not want them both, I hope, and if I send for any it will be the young one. I hate old fogies."

"Dr. Lowry is not an old fogy," said Fanny, indignantly.

"Oh, I forgot what a favorite he was!" said Mrs. Loring, and there was something strange in her voice as she said it; but she was very good voice for a man of his age, and he fairly astonished us this time, for he struck up in German instead of English. It was a student song, and after he had sung it he told us that he had learned it when he was studying medicine in Europe. It was a loud and spirited thing, and his voice seemed to fill the whole house while he was singing.

We were talking about music and the picnic, and all sorts of things, when Dr. Stryker came in. We had expected him, and Fanny jumped up at once, saying,

"Dr. Stryker, I believe Mrs. Loring wants to see you; I will run in and ask her."

She was only gone a couple of minutes when she came back in an excited sort of way.

"Oh, Doctor," said she, "you must come in right away. Mrs. Loring is very ill indeed. I am really scared, and it is quite sudden."

Dr. Lowry bowed himself out very quietly, and the rest of us went into Mrs. Loring's room. She had evidently been trying to write some letters, for her writing-desk stood by the bed, but she lay there now in a high fever, and quite delirious.

Dr. Stryker asked a great many questions, but we could not tell him much, and he seemed more than a little put out and puzzled. It was an unusual case, he said, and he hardly knew what to do.

When he went out I felt pretty sure that he was going to consult with old Dr. Lowry, for it was very good friends in spite of their proand rivalry; but we got on to work and undressed Mrs. Loring and put her to bed. Fanny then said she would stay with her, and I went home after some work, intending to come back again. I found that Dr. Stryker had not been there, but he soon came in, and interrupted me while I was telling my old friend about the sick lady.

"Dr. Lowry," said he, "I must ask you to go over this evening and take a look at my new patient. I think likely you can aid me in understanding the case."

"Well," said the Doctor, "I'll come over now, if you say so."

"I wish you would, at once, for I fear that it is a dangerous case."

No sooner said than done, and we all went over together.

We found Fanny sitting by the bedside, and it seemed to me that Mrs. Loring was getting worse. She did not recognize any of us. Dr. Lowry felt of her pulse, and looked grave than I had ever seen him. The expression of his face was indeed almost painfully anxious, and he muttered something about "nerves" that I did not half hear. Then he turned to Fanny Senter, and asked her,

"Has she been here long?"

"Only a few days."

"Where are her friends? They ought to be telegraphed to at once."

"I'm sure I don't know. She was just writing a letter, I think, when she was taken sick. Here it is on the desk."

I must say it looked like an odd thing to do, but then he was a physician, for he took it up and looked it over carefully.

"It may give us some information, and we must not stand upon ceremony in a case like this."

He stood by the window as he read it, and he did not turn around for over a minute.

"There is no address on it," he said; "but there is enough in this letter to show that she is suffering from some mental shock, and we can guide our treatment accordingly."

Then the two doctors went out for a consultation, and Fanny and I sat down by the bed. She suffered seemed to be talking to somebody, and now and then we could understand what she said.

"It was all false! Oh, how cruel! It was a slander!"

And she kept repeating this with a sort of low, moaning voice.

Presently Dr. Stryker came back again alone.

"We have concluded," said he, "that one of us had better stay here and watch the indications. I will remain until evening, and then Dr. Lowry will come. He is very kind, for I have some other cases that I must attend to."

I went home to look after supper, and when that was over Dr. Lowry had not good evening and returned to Deacon Senter's, telling me I might look in, if I wanted to, before I went to bed.

I was impatient to do so, but I did not want to intrude, and so I waited until about nine o'clock. Then I stole in as still as a ghost. The room was dimly lighted, and Fanny and the Doctor were conversing in whispers by the window.

"I think Dr. Stryker would fancy that," I thought, for to my eyes the young doctor was not half so good-looking as the old one. There was something comfortable about that they were saying, for Fanny started suddenly as she saw me coming in, and the Doctor kept looking out of the window. Fanny was quite delirious, but she seems to be better now. You must take a good long sleep to-night, for we may want you to watch to-morrow night."

This was hint enough, and I did not stay long; but it took me a long time to get to sleep after I got home. There was something so odd about the whole affair, and I was so sorry for poor Mrs. Loring.

The next day, however, Dr. Lowry informed me that the patient was much better; in fact, quite in her right mind, and I was to sleep and go to the care of Dr. Stryker. And so I found matters when I went over. Poor Mrs. Loring was dreadfully pale and weak, and the least noise seemed to disturb her painfully. She would not or could not talk, but lay there looking sadly about her as however her eyes were to sleep.

There was a strange expression on Fanny's face, I thought, but then she had been up all night.

We sat there a good while together, but of course we had no chance for conversation. So I thought we had not seen each other for several days, only that Mrs. Loring slowly got better, and talked of going home the moment she was strong enough.

Fanny refused to send for any body or allow us to. Dr. Lowry seemed quite interested in the case, and one morning I saw him and Fanny walking up toward the house, through the shrubbery, in the most confidential manner in the world. They were so busy with each other that they did not see me, and I had time to draw back into the house. I did not mean to do any eavesdropping, but I heard him say, "God bless you, my dear! You will be my good angel!" and then I do believe he kissed her. He turned off toward his office then, and Fanny came running into the house. She looked a little flushed and excited, no wonder, and I could not help saying,

"Well, Fanny, and so it is all arranged between you and Dr. Lowry?"

"Of course it is," said she, with a queer little laugh; "we have made up our minds about it."

"But what will Dr. Stryker say?"

"Oh, I think he will be satisfied; and if he isn't we don't care."

"How cool you are! But then Dr. Lowry is handsome if he is old," said I, a little pettishly.

"Oh, I've made him promise to shave off that great white beard of his, and cut his hair, the very first thing. You have no idea what a difference that will make," said Fanny.

And no more I had, for when Dr. Lowry came back, in an hour or so, I hardly knew him. His hair was cut in a good shape, his beard pared close, and he wore no spectacles. He was a different looking man altogether, and almost looked young, but for the deep lines on his face.

Fanny was still with me, and she jumped up and ran to meet him. I declare she actually kissed him right before me, and she took his arm as she said:

"Come now, Alfred, we will go right over to the house." And then she insisted on my coming with them; though I hardly knew what for, I went.

I learned afterward that matters had been planned differently; but, as we came into the parlor, whom should we meet but Mrs. Loring, coming on the arm of Dr. Stryker. It was the first time she had ventured so far since her attack, and she was very pale indeed. We came upon them quite suddenly, and Mrs. Loring gave a little scream.

"Oh, Alfred! Alfred!" and then she fainted clean away.

Dr. Stryker seemed wonderfully puzzled, and Fanny looked quite pale; but Dr. Lowry picked her up in his arms and carried her into her own room.

Perhaps we should have followed, but Fanny held us back.

"Not now—not now!" she said. "Leave them alone for a while."

"But, Fanny," said I, "what does it all mean? Does Mrs. Loring know Dr. Lowry?"

"I'm not sure," said she, "but I suspect, it is Dr. Alfred Lowry Loring, and she is his wife."

"His wife!" exclaimed we both.

"Yes; I found it out the night he and I watched with her, and I've been at work ever since to bring them together. He was a surgeon in the army, and in the absence they slandered her to him. He thought she had run away, when she was only hunting for him. So he came here under the name of Lowry, to get away from the sight of every one who had ever known him before. She did not know he was here until she saw the verses, and they made her jealous, and then she heard him sing. That was what put her into the fever."

"But she is so young, and he is old enough for her father."

"No he isn't; he was gray at twenty, and he told me he married her for that great beard. He is not more than ten years older than she is," said Fanny.

"You don't say! But Fanny, I thought—"

"Oh yes, I know what you thought, and I thought I would tease you nicely, you was so smart and once again it—"

"But how did you manage?"

"Oh! the letter she was writing when she was taken sick was to me, and explained a good many things. He was terribly to blame, but she forgave him at last; and if the meeting don't kill her it is all right."

And the meeting didn't kill her.

THE ANSWER.

You wrote they wanted to wed,
And proved that you were not a man, Sir;
Only half of the letter I read,
And gave you "No" for an answer;
Why hide from me the question you ask
Behind the fool's screen of a letter?
Why is being a woman a task
If you wanted so truly to get her?

A woman is worthy her price,
At least while her chances are plenty,
And you know she has many a choice
Before she arrives at sweet twenty.
True lovers are tender to woo,
And 'tis seldom they fail in their wooing;
But a bachelor's shame be on you
To shrink from the deed you are doing!
If I was so dear in your sight
You needn't have come up like a man, Sir,
With a few honest words and I might
Have given you a different answer.

WHAT IS GENIUS?

Talent, lying in the understanding, is often inherited; genius, being the union of reason and imagination, rarely or never.—Coleridge.

What is Genius? 'Tis a gem
In a favored few enshrined;
By its brightness, showing them
Things beyond the common mind.

'Tis a planet, grand, but strange,
With a motion unexplained,
And an elevated range,
Only by itself attained.

'Tis a clear, perceptive tact,
With a power which patience earns,
To elaborate into act
What the intellect discerns.

'Tis a flash that comes unsought;
Vivid, self-revealed, intense;
'Tis the ethereal glance of thought—
A divine intelligence.

'Tis an intellectual dower,
Which the mind for years may hold,
Ere the genial quickening hour
Bid its energies unfold.

But, while all the gift admire,
To the breast wherein it glows,
'Tis a fierce volcanic fire,
That allows of rare repose.

Feelings keenly sensitive,
Oft to very anguish stung,
Still a sad distinction give
To the soul by Genius strung.

KITTY'S HEART.

Say what you will of human independence, we are all to a great extent flies in the cobweb of circumstance. Names and places have a large influence over character and destinies. Perhaps, if I had been brought up by the pious Pagan parents of Hafiz, or scratched my grammar exercises on the same wax tablets with Saadi and Ferdousi, a rose would have smelled as sweet to me as it does now; but as I am and have been how can I be expected even to associate any fragrance with a "Gul?" The fact that I am a Knickerbocker of the Knickerbockers has always been to me a solace and a strength. That last volume of poems, in its eleventh thousand and every young lady's boudoir, sweetly pretty as it is, would never have been struggled up to through long days of labor and nights devoid of ease but for the thought that if Allibone ever got me at all, I should appear as a native of the Western World's metropolis. It was the pride of being a New Yorker which carried me through youth's severest episode without imparting more than a gentle tone of melancholy to my future life and lyre. I can hope, but not be sure, that with the weight of a nativity in Potsdam I might have failed to be left a Blighted Being; in Painted Post or Pen Yan I should certainly never have risen superior to mortification and Mary Jane.

I am never introduced to a person named Gunn, Spiffles, Snodgrass, or the like without a devout cheerfulness (out of pity for the unfortunate wholly repressed, I trust, in my outward manner) at the thought that I am Lionel Clifton. A good and graceful, but not grandiloquent name; a piece of property like that which Agur prayed for, equally removed from poverty and riches; its possessor is in no danger of "getting full" and "denying" his Maker, like highfalutin St. Elmo, nor "stealing," as I should think a man named "Muggins" would be likely to do, wherever he found a Classical Dictionary. Oh, what is to be thought of the man who calls his son Jehoiakim or Epaminondas? How terrible in after-years must be the retribution of her who looks back to the day when she tagged on to the unconscious, unresisting babe that smiled on her maternal breast the inseparable label of a Semantha Roumelia—a Pecunia Financia—or a Betsy Ann! Wretched parents! Hapless children! For the blameless victims I have often indulged so deep, so tender a compassion that there was nothing I would not have done for them save to change places with them, and go staggering through life under a George Washington which the wildest agonies of patriotism could never illustrate by my own example, even as a Father of New Jersey; or sink the frenzied struggles of my blighted genius in an early tomb, perishing with all my unrealized poems and sculptures in me, after a few delirious years of effort to rise to glory with the name of M'Cracken Vanderboggs.

Standing in the secure serenity of Lionel Clifton, and casting grateful wreaths upon my ancestral graves, I have mused out a Plan of Salvation for these hapless ones, and here I throw out the hint; there may be some to heed it: our Legislature is in session, so is our Constitutional Convention—the twenty years which will assemble another one not having quite elapsed. Perhaps I am not arrogant in hoping that the latter dignified body may take hold of it—even incorporate it in their second article, when that is reached in regular order. It is this: Let every new-born babe be named provisionally! Call the irresponsive, irresponsible nursling any thing pro tem. Be it enacted that till his first pantaloons with pockets—nay, even till a jury of twelve of his female fellow-citizens pronounce a verdict establishing his mustache (in detail the matter may be left as extensible as suffrage), the boy be relegated to the entitular mercy of his parents and guardians, coming and going as they list to the call of Jack, Jehoshaphat, or Michael Angelo; but after that be Lemprière and the back part of Webster all before him where to choose; and let the harmless, necessary girl, whenever she occurs, under equivalent conditions, have the power to decide by what prænomen she shall be wafted down to posterity.

I have said I am a poet—but what poet could ever have existed in New Pugham? It is one of the smallest and newest of small new manufacturing villages. Here dwelt my Kitty—the Kitty of whose heart is my story. In New Pugham she was fair as a star when only one is shining in the sky, but a violet under a mossy stone my Kitty could not be in New Pugham—a place where they had no mossy stones, or where if any of the new selectmen of that new village had by searching found one out he would straightway at the expense of the corporation have had it scraped, scrubbed, and whitewashed. Pugham, "situated," says the newest of the new geographies, "on the east bank of that romantic Indian stream the Lumbago River," gets all the water-power out of that river that Nature put there—and hangs the romance. Pugham cares as little for the Indian—except the kind which goes to the recipe for making Boston brown bread—and of that a sufficient grist is ground the whole year long by the two rival flouring mills of Jinks and Dummitt. Between these, towering above them to ten stories, with a great stupid granite face full of expressionless windows, M'Cubb's cotton-factory stands holding them apart, as it were, by the scruff of their eaves, like a phlegmatic big policeman keeping two jerky, hoppy boys from pitching into each other. Above Dummit, whom Jinks can never forgive for being newer than he is, and having got several rods nearer the dam than he foresaw any need of building, stretches an irregular quadrangle of print works, whose waste water in a dirty blur along the once innocent Lumbago looks like the blood of all the calicoes which are forever being sacrificed on city counters returning on the head of the guilty stream which haled them to the altar.

These are the works of Grubble & Potts, who might well have gone into partnership if only to keep each other in countenance, so sternly are they regarded, both by Dummitt and Jinks, as the only subject on which they both agree—a subject suspected, whether rightly or wrongfully, of imparting premature gingerbread hues to their flour through the waste aforesaid; by M'Cubb, for anticipating the conversion of his unbleached in the same way, and by all but one of the Lumbago magnates for being still newer and nearer the dam than they. That one is the superlatively new and near Crabb, who, with a soul undeniably not above buttons, but eighteen moons ere my Kitty beamed upon me, established himself in the manufacture of those useful and remunerative disks as near the dam as any one could get without becoming a maker of watered silks and sitting down on it. Being newest he is mentioned last, as in Latin the rear is always "novissimum agmen." Squatting there in that flaring brick box, red as the flat which, with verdigris door and gamboge knocker, stands eternal symbol for the despotic guardian's house in all the minor theatres, making, as he squats, some ten thousand per annum more than if he stood up straight to ten stories like M'Cubb, he is the focus of commercial rancor for all the positive and comparative degrees of newness further down the water-privilege. To be sure there is something expansive in the mere facts of making ten thousand per annum more than other people, of being nearer the dam, and newer in New Pugham (the world regarding those good things to be); but to do Crabb justice, let me hasten my testimony that they were not sufficient to account for the entire lack of reciprocity with which he met his neighbors' bile. Whatever position he had occupied with relation to the dam (and, metaphorically speaking, he had known what it was to go quite over it during the crisis of '57), he would have been just the same good-natured, mellow-hearted old fellow, forever minding his own business, never ashamed to be on a level with it, even were it only buttons; easy going, but weightily going too, like the City Hall clock or the Great Eastern. I'm not even sure that he knew how Jinks had to gulp his conscience like a hasty brandy-ball when he prayed in the next pew on Sunday mornings about envy, hatred, malice, and the cognate commercial virtues; that M'Cubb, like the man in Æsop, would gladly have had Jupiter punch the few dozen superfluous lights out of his own two top stories to see his squat little factory knocked out of time by the destruction of an equal number; or that he was the object of an evil eye to any person in New Pugham whomsoever. It is not an age of the world in which we kick every body we dislike—and in New Pugham relations must indeed become terribly embittered before we go even to the heroic length of manfully not asking each other to tea. The only way of resenting an impudent fellow's squatting close by the dam and swooping into his newest of new nets that odd ten thousand per annum was one on which I rejoice to feel we New Pughamites had a patent—the original and peculiar way of making faces behind his back, which with Mr. Crabb's eccentric habit of always keeping his back behind him, and his business, buttons and all, straight in front, tended to preserve his sleep untroubled by any suspicions of neighborly ill-will.

I have already betrayed myself as at least a whilom New Pughamite by my employment of the first person plural. My acquisition of a right to we it in New Pugham came about after the following fashion: I had become tired of doing all the hard work of a city evening journal for fifteen dollars a week under pretense, on the proprietor's part, that my training and my connection with such an influential sheet were worth an annual bagatelle of some odd thousands more. Unexpectedly, about the same time, a maternal relative had got tired of his own earthly speculation and ceased to issue the Weakly Uncle's Life, leaving me sole heir to assets summing about twenty-five hundred dollars in cash. Concluding, after mature reflection, that I would not buy the Sun, I cast around for some other paying investment, and discovered that a new newspaper was the newest want of that newest of new towns, New Pugham. It struck me instantly that if any where on earth independent journalism was possible, there that passionate idea of my youth might be realized. Upon consultation with the editor (who sold out only on account of his doctor's ascribing to the newspaper business a certain periodical goneness which he experienced in his chest) I became convinced that the New Pugham Planet might have been moved to San Juan Fernandez, Memphis Avalanche fashion, and been edited by Robinson Crusoe, prior to the arrival of Friday, without overstraining his constitution or compelling him to neglect his goats.

I asked to see the editor's foreman. In a sepulchral voice which showed how well taken was the advice to sell out in time, Mr. Lobman said, "He stands before you." Furthermore, he proved to be night and day compositors and general job journeymen, concluding his exhibition of the Planet pay-roll with the frank avowal that he, too, was the devil himself. I told him I thought he must be—but bought him out; and after going to the reckless extravagance, excusable only in newness and enthusiasm, of appointing a small boy to the presidency of the paste-pot, and a brother three sizes larger to the revolutionary bureau of the press-crank on publication-days, at a total salary of fourteen shillings per week, I entered upon the light and entertaining work for which I had palpitated through a lifetime. By reading up all my predecessor's files I got as nearly as I could to an intelligence of the stripe which he had advocated for the largest number of weeks at a time, and immediately changed our politics to a diametrically opposite one, issuing a prospectus in red ink which promised the citizens of New Pugham that I should appear twice as often as had ever previously been attempted, to say nothing binding about a series of regular extras which would be constantly coming out when they least expected them. To show my devotion to the manufacturing interests I adopted as my motto "Lumbago aut Nihil"—most happy thought! by the majority of my new fellow-citizens received as a highly complimentary parallelism between their sacred river and that of the Egyptians. Last, with my already mentioned conviction of the importance of calling names, I changed ours from Pugham Planet to Monday Morning Manufacturing Meteor. Then, thanks to an early apprenticeship in a San Francisco composing-room, I cheerfully rolled up my sleeves and put my thunderers in type. Ink would fail me to tell of the sensation with which my first issue shook the banks of the Lumbago. Three hundred papers were sold in the first ten hours. By noon of the next day the pressure for another edition became so great that I was compelled to discharge my Revolutionary-sized boy and hire him over again at a two shillings raise of wages, he having taken advantage of my prosperity to become a necessity of existence, and threatening to run away and carry his brother with him. Before the week was over I had in my back-yard enough cord-wood, representative of new subscribers, to have stoked three Pacific railroad locomotives from here to Washoe and back again. When the edge of the furor was sufficiently taken off to leave me alone with my first quiet cigar in the inside office I counted thirty-five dollars net cash, and patted myself on the back in congratulation over an unequivocal success. It is much easier to become a popular favorite than to keep one, especially in this country, where a man is belauded to death before he gets his position, and forever after sits in a pillory for the mob to pelt at. I have often wished that we might adopt a custom from the Mpongwe tribe—a set of unreconstructed Africans, whom Du Chaillu describes as doing all their kicking and mud-flinging upon a new king before he is crowned, and treating him with immense respect for the rest of his period.

Still we can not alter existing institutions, and I cast about me for means to sustain that immense enthusiasm with which I had inaugurated the Meteor.

To be new was the great thing in New Pugham. I had already introduced several revolutionary changes which entitled me to consideration, and their success having been abundant, I came to the conclusion that it was essential in my career that nobody should ever know what I was going to do next. My hotel and my washer-woman were the only elements in that career which I preserved as constants, and those only because a change might indicate that I was unable to pay my bills. Especially did I repair on successive Sundays to different churches, so that the singular spectacle might be seen upon one Monday morning of the new favorite being approached to join an association for the relief of the poor, in charge of the Episcopal organization; on the next, to become a trustee of the Second Seceding Anabaptists; and on the third, to deliver a lecture for the benefit of the Independent Sandemanians. On the plea of that extreme modesty common to all editors, I refused elevation in all directions. Nolui Episcopari. I kept to myself the inestimable privilege of traveling about every where, and leaving the various societies (so far as they thought of my humble self at all) in a perpetual titter as to where I should finally anchor.

At last, however, I was nailed before I knew it. I had always possessed a great taste for music, and the music was better at the Second Seceding Anabaptists than it was any where else in New Pugham. I had sat in the pews of that denomination but two Sundays, a month apart, when I became sufficiently fascinated to break my rule. I went to the S. S. A. two Sundays in succession. There was a lovely contralto voice in their choir. Since my early experience with Mary Jane (it has been pain enough to refer to it already) I had abjured the society of that which in irony is sometimes called the gentler sex. Nevertheless, I always love that sweetest thing in a woman, a low, soft voice, and would never, if I could, have freed myself from its attraction. In the choir of the S. S. A. there existed one of the best uncultivated contralto voices I ever heard. I own that I myself love to join in the worship of the sanctuary—think that singing is a large part of it—am not satisfied at having it done for me by the very best quartette of operatic performers—and have a tolerably good baritone of my own. Accordingly, when the first deacon, into whose pew I had got by chance, had heard me join in the hymns, and on the Monday after my second attendance asked me if I would not enter the S. S. A. choir, I weakly yielded. From that moment liberty of locomotion was denied me. Naturally in a choir the baritone stands next to the contralto, and reading, when "Solemn Psalmodists" were short, off the same music-book with Miss Kitty Crabb, I got nailed. Nailed—naturally nailed.

My paper fell off a little, but not discouragingly, when the New Pughamites discovered that I was a Seceding Anabaptist, though they discovered wrong; for I was not that, but a Kitty Crabb-ist if I was any thing. The next week, however, I restored my circulation by altering the local complexion of the Meteor to Second Dam-ite, coming over from the vigorous opposition of the Monday before to advocate, as one of the most brilliant and beneficent enterprises of an enlightened century, an additional improvement of the Lumbago water-power by a structure across Flepinaguilder Falls, two miles below New Pugham, in whose erection numerous citizens, including Mr. Crabb, were largely interested.

During the entire winter Sunday and our meetings for choir practice necessarily brought me into contact with Miss Kitty Crabb as often, on the average, as thrice a week. For the first two months our intercourse was limited to flats and sharps, almost as strictly as if we had been reading alternate paragraphs aloud out of the elementary treatise, to which, in common with all ecclesiastical tune-books, the "Solemn Psalmodist" devoted its first forty or fifty pages. This reticence arose not merely from my own past experience of Miss Crabb's sisterhood, but from a degree of modesty on her part surpassing any thing it has ever been my fortune to observe in a young lady—modesty which, in a girl not yet out of long dresses, angular, or lacking in any womanly grace of figure, face, and spirit, would have been bashfulness of the most painful kind. Only when she sang did every trace of restraint vanish from her manner. With the first note of her glorious contralto she seemed lifted like a lark upon his free, unconscious wings into the serene glad atmosphere which was his birth-right. Melody poured from her throat without an effort; she gave no more token of feeling an admiring, a critical, or even a listening presence, than if she had been the bird she seemed, palpitating with "some embodied joy whose race was just begun" all alone between the sun and a cloud island. The instant her music ceased and she dropped down into the coarser world again she was another being. If her eye caught another's, and saw in it the involuntary admiration won by her lovely flight—if her ear heard even a whisper of praise, her lashes drooped at once; her cheeks were suffused as with the inner flush of some delicate sea-shell, and she bent over her music-book as if she would fain shrink out of notice behind some corpulent clef, or lose herself from human sight in a wilderness of quavers.

On such occasions both the experience of a misogynist and the sympathy of a gentleman kept me quite silent and undemonstrative. Often I would not increase her embarrassment by even so much as a glance at her, and I never uttered a syllable to set her fluttering at my appreciation of her delicious gift; but when my eyes did stray from the music and the little, trembling, rosy fingers which helped my own hand hold the book, I was fain to make a silent confidant of my own bosom, and confess that of all lovely little creatures to whom nomenclature had been most criminally abusive, that little Crabb was the very loveliest. Her complexion was that spotless, translucent olive over which the shelly suffusion I have mentioned throws its tenderest dawn; her eyes were black to the world, at whose bold stare she veiled them too quickly for the sweet, deep violet truth of them to be fathomed; but sitting close beside her, as I did, I learned their actual color, and their incomparable, liquid tenderness, before I had advanced into her acquaintance beyond the outposts of the Solemn Psalmodist. Her beautifully-shaped and finely-poised head was adorned with a clustering wealth of raven curls, through which her little, delicate, pink ears and her lovely white neck scarce disclosed themselves in furtive gleams of coral and alabaster. When Mr. Crabb came one night to fetch her home from choir meeting, I heard him say, as he passed his great, broad palm over that precious head, "All through, my little Astracan?" But the Shah might have hunted in vain through the uttermost corners of Persia before he could have found a lamb to match against the glossy, silky, jetty spirals which made Mr. Crabb so justly proud. When I say that Kitty's features were such a satisfying harmony of pleasant, delicate lines that the sight of them might gladden the most critical eyes for months before one ever dreamed of questioning whether they were quite classically regular; that, although her retiring manner gave the impression of a little woman, she was slightly above her sex's middle height; and that life had just opened for her into the perfect blossom of five-and-twenty—I have given you the benefit of many months' observation, and a description to which nobody who at this time knew her in New Pugham would have been adequate, though she had revealed enough of herself to secure that town's unanimous male verdict, in the general statement that she was by far its prettiest girl.

I may damage my credibility by asserting that, in spite of all which has gone before, Kitty Crabb occupied the position of a girl without beaux. Not only without a beau—which would indicate a mere absence of monopoly and prospective marital appropriation—but without the plural—without that miscellaneous attendance of retainers which denotes rivalry, obsequious service, and admiration. She was no queen of sleigh-rides; no goddess of picnics; no aim of magnificent country tailoring; no source of expense in kid gloves a couple of sizes too small; of throbbing hearts a number of sizes too large for their unfortunate wearers. She was not the girl for whom Fubsy, the newest of the New Pugham stationers, was compelled to keep up to the mark in the newest thing by way of valentines, and send twice in February to New York for a fresh supply. For her no swain pined in the Spartan seclusion of tight boots; she got no anonymous bouquets; the moon was bothered with no subpœnas to testify against her cruelty on the side of any youthful New Pughamite in a case of unreturned fire. The Argand-lamp that cheered Mr. Crabb's hospitable parlor never needed extra filling in the morning by reason of any impassioned young man holding vigil with it and Kitty, in a distraught frame of mind and his best clothes. No, literally as a Scotchman, I asseverate that Kitty had no beaux.

The reason may seem as incredible as the assertion meant to be explained by it. All the young men in New Pugham were afraid of Kitty Crabb. She might have been as pretty as she was, and still some youth not have feared his fate too much, or had deserts too small, to dare and put it to the touch to win or lose it all. Her beauty was the farthest possible from that Junonesque kind which I know often does deter men from wooing it, like a statue, and keeps its possessor a maid to the end of her days. Her bashfulness was, indeed, an obstacle to any attainment of intimacy through the free-and-easy approaches in which the "Killing Fellow" of a small manufacturing town finds his strategy most formidable; the bravest of that class turned away discouraged from the mysterious front of her modest masked battery, owning that they could make nothing out of her. But more impregnable than any defenses of beauty or reserve was the reputation which, every month since the Lumbago began turning the crank of the button-factory, wove itself into a more impenetrable stockade around her—the reputation of "knowing a tremendous lot." Yes, Kitty Crabb—little, shrinking, blushing, timorous Kitty—had the name of being a literary woman. She felt herself above them all, the New Pughamites said. She was too splendidly educated to associate with common folk. She not only had all the classical composers at her fingers' ends and on those ruby lips of hers—but she read and spoke, Mezzofanti only knew how many languages, and young Fubsy told me, with an expression such as one would expect from the fellow-townsman of the Bearded Woman or a neighbor to the farm where originated the calf with two heads, that she wrote Greek. Moreover, she was constantly supposed to be preparing a novel for immediate publication, and when Rutledge or Adam Bede came out anonymously there were a dozen people in New Pugham ready to convict her of the authorship on circumstantial evidence which would have hung her if the offense had been piracy.

No wonder, then, that Kitty had no beaux! The boldest youth, in the habit of airing odd scraps of French as part of his artillery of female fascination, would have turned pale to the line of his pomatum at the thought that behind that blushing little face lurked a brain which was laughing at his wrong emphasis and provincial accent. Who, too, that had sprawled himself by the furlong in rhythmical nothings over every other young lady's album in New Pugham could have felt other than an icy perspiration bedewing every square foot of his own surface at the merely imagined hardihood of subjecting to a literary woman's knife the kind of stanza which lay in sweetly-pretty languor palpitating on the altars of so many an Arabella Ann? So the young men of New Pugham stood afar off and wondered—or only visited Kitty in the presence of Mr. and Mrs. Crabb—retreating precipitately if papa and mamma showed signs of retiring for the night after nuts and cider, as you or I would if a pair of elderly and influential Van Amburghs talked of going to bed and leaving us to sit up with a first-class animal of the royal Bengal persuasion.

Perhaps because ignorance is always fearless and I did not know my danger, I was not afraid of Kitty Crabb from the beginning. In ladies' society nowadays I was almost as retiring as Kitty herself—painfully bashful, even—but knew no terror on the New Pughamite grounds. To an editor whose business it had been for years to receive and give audience to all the poetesses who wanted reviewing, or room for their last little piece of fifty stanzas in a New York evening paper, the Literary Woman had necessarily, to a large extent, been robbed of her terrors; for his resigned and fortified spirit the Female Novelist had no sting, the Lady Lecturer no victory. I accordingly permitted myself, after repeated interviews with all the Crabbs in a musical and Second Seceding Anabaptist capacity, to become a visitor at their house. Still further, I was about to add that at the same time I permitted myself to fall over head and ears in love with Kitty Crabb herself, and refrain only because that statement would misrepresent the fact. After my experience with Mary Jane, so frenzied a state of mind must have occurred not only without my permission, but even without my knowledge; and, instead of falling in love, I entered that maelstrom by such subtly-unconscious gyrations that I found myself in the hopeless vortex before I could sell out of New Pugham for my life, and swim on the last plank of my dismantled Monday Meteor to the serene though solitary shore of a confirmed celibacy.

I must do myself the justice to say that when I discovered my plight I fought to remedy it bravely. I was determined that never again should any woman give me the mortification of a refusal, and resolved that, even though I might love Kitty Crabb to the limits of heartbreak, I would never betray that fact until I knew that she loved me. To arrive at such knowledge daily seemed more impossible. Of late days Kitty had become more reticent than ever, returning from the degree of freedom with which we talked of our agreeing, likes and dislikes, to the flats and sharps which had bounded our intimacy during my first few months in New Pugham. Her bearing had sometimes such an extra chill of distance in it, that I questioned whether I was not absolutely repellent to her, and pitched into my professional work on the Meteor, after the manner of men, with a single-mindedness intended to hide from myself the pain I must have derived from such a conclusion. I had plenty to do, if merely in the matter of reading the communications. All parts of the county addressed me upon various subjects, from lumber to lyrics, and had I enjoyed the income of the Tribune it would have paid me to employ a special assistant to edit my "Letters from the People." When I read in the Nation disquisitions upon the possibility of a genuine American poet, I wish that I could show the writer of those essays certain MSS. which I am sure that the effete feudal countries have never paralleled. On the last Thursday in June an avalanche of such seemed to come upon me. Most of them I cast into my Balaam-basket (with a note to answer their senders kindly); but there was one which I kept for future reading, half because its first few lines arrested me, and half because its handwriting was more delicately, grammatically legible than the rest. This was entitled "The Panting Hart."

I had scarcely time to examine whether this production was a paraphrase of the psalm in which the hart pants after the water brooks, or an imitation of the White Doe of Rylestone, when I was met in the street by Mr. Crabb, who invited my attendance at his house. There was to be a little company there that evening, and the ladies would be pleased to see me.

Mr. Crabb's house was always a pleasant one to go to—at least for any man who had not in it an element of uncertainty concerning his whole future life, and I was not surprised to find, when I arrived there, a sufficiently large party to make me glad that I had interpreted his informal invitation de rigueur, and bought a pair of white kid gloves.

After receiving the last-comer at the head of the parlors, Mrs. Crabb took an early opportunity to draw me aside into a small room at the side of the hall (in deference to a Family Bible and "Pollock's Course of Time" lying on the centre-table called "the library"), where Mr. Crabb presently joined us.

"Perhaps you've noticed," Mrs. Crabb began, "how abstracted Kitty looks to-night?"

"She certainly looks the prettiest young lady in the room," I answered.

"Well, well," said Mr. Crabb, rubbing his hands with only partially-concealed pleasure, "we've always taught her looks was nothing—behavior was all. And we've tried to give her (what there wasn't in our day) a good education."

"I think," resumed Mrs. Crabb, "that she's deeply interested in a subject she never talks about. Mr. Clifton, in a sense, the destiny of that child is in your hands!"

"Bless my soul!" said I, deeply affected, "do you think so? This is, indeed, a solemn responsibility!"

I was about to add that I would do my best to prove adequate to it, when, in a garnet silk and a wreath of natural lilies of the valley, Kitty made her perfectly lovely apparition at the door.

Mrs. Crabb laughed airily, to make-believe that she had been talking of nothing in particular, and whispered, "Speak to her yourself!" Both she and Mr. Crabb wrung my hand warmly in the folds of her moire antique, and excusing themselves, retired hastily.

When I found myself alone in the library with Kitty I asked her if the warmth was not rather oppressive, and what she thought of a little breath of fresh air under the front maples. Her exquisite color came in an instant; but she tucked a garnet fold under her dimpled elbow, and with her little pink fingers trembling on my coat-sleeve, went out with me under the starlight, where I could spare her blushes and speak plainly.

"Kitty," said I, pausing at the gate to take her hand in mine, "I have to-night learned for the first time that I might openly say to you all that was in my mind."

"Yes," murmured Kitty, with drooping head; "Mamma told me that you might soon speak to me—to-night, perhaps; she was my first confidante; but it was long before I dared hope."

"And oh tell me—tell me, Kitty—dare I hope! Am I—am I really so happy, then?"

"Does it make you happy? Oh, how glad I am! Oh, Mr. Clifton, have you read my Hart?"

"Read it? Through and through, sweetest one! It has been my passionate study since first I dreamed it might be mine. And is it—oh, is it mine?"

"Yours? You know it's yours—freely yours; do you accept it? Is there any tenderness, any poetic fire in it? Oh, is there, Mr. Clifton?"

"All fire! All tenderness! Accept it? With what rapture! How have I deserved this happiness? How shall I be worthy of it?"

"I never thought of giving it to any body but you. And to think you take it so kindly, with all its imperfections!"

"Darling!" I murmured, too overcome for further words, and drawing her close to my bosom.

"What!" exclaimed I, as with a timid little cry she half shrunk away from me. "What! Has this bliss been a dream? Do you not love me?"

"I meant," whispered Kitty, hiding her face in my lapel, "I meant—the—little poem I sent to you to have published—I meant—to be—an authoress. I—did not—suppose any body could love—me."

But she did not take away her face again.

I published the "Panting Hart," and a very pretty poem it was too, but not half so pretty as a much shorter one in another column of the Meteor, relating in a single stanza how the Editor was married to Miss Kitty Crabb, and turned a very ugly name into that of Mrs. Clifton.

WHAT IS STEEL?

Many people may deem the question easy of answer, but it is really not so. It was long accepted as a truism in the art or science of metallurgy that steel is simply a carbide of iron, that is, a compound of carbon and iron, the former element being present in the compound to the extent of from one to one and a half per cent. This chemical definition is now quite superseded. Steel has become a generic term, and of the genus steel there are various species. Ordinary steel is carbon steel; but steely compounds of iron have been produced which have the same general properties as ordinary steel, the carbon of which is replaced, either in whole or in part, by other chemical elements. Thus, we now have tungsten steel, in which the metal tungsten is combined with the iron; manganese steel containing the metal manganese; and other steels containing chromium and titanium. In the cases just mentioned the steel is invariably a compound of iron with another metal; it is, in short, an alloy. Other species or varieties, however, contain non-metallic bodies as the steel-generating materials. Carbon is one of these elements; and, therefore, it is but natural to suppose that such elements as closely resemble it in their chemical properties will be the most likely to serve in its stead. Silicon, or, as some modern chemists call it, silicium, the basis of silica or flint, is one of the nearest chemical relatives of carbon. The French chemist, Caron, has made silicon steel. Then there is the element boron, full cousin, as it were, to carbon and silicon, the basis of ordinary borax. Steel has recently been made in Glasgow of most extraordinary hardness and cutting power, when used for tools in turning operations. In one instance, the tool did thirteen times the amount of cutting work of an ordinary tool of carbon steel. The process of making this new steel is at present kept secret; but there is reason to believe that it is boron steel. Other varieties of steel besides exist. The material of which the celebrated Berlin castings are made is phosphorus steel, and many Swedish cannons are made of sulphur steel.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

Spring this year came with snow, and frost, and biting cold; the Ice King with frozen breath and piercing gales lingered, reluctant to resign his rigorous sway; Nature put on fresh, cheerless robes of white, and the keen northwest wind whistled through the streets, when we were fondly expecting the "smiling verdure," the "grateful warmth," and "gentle breezes," which are supposed—is it only by "poetic license?"—to be the harbingers of spring-time. One may well feel a fresh inspiration to write a stinging parody on and declare, with new emphasis,

"Come, gentle Spring! ethereal mildness come!"

"There's no such season!"

when March brings days more severe than winter gave us, with heavy drifting snow-storms, ice-blockades, frozen hydrants, and a second edition of all the discomforts of an uncommonly frigid winter. We were the more impatient under the infliction because there have been so many cold snaps, and we have fancied every one would be the last. Somebody reckoned that we had been blessed with thirty snow-storms before winter—nominally—ended. March opened very prosperously with two or three more—to be accurate in the counting—and doubtless there are others in store.

In the midst of this fearfully "cold snap," at midnight of March 2, when Broadway was blockaded by snow, when hydrants were frozen, and the howling blasts swept through the silent streets, occurred the terrible conflagration of Barnum's Museum, with the greater part of its numerous and world-renowned curiosities. While no human life was lost, many valuable animals met a terrible death. The helpless terror of some of the mighty brutes, as when first smelling the fire, they roared in fury, and then shrunk back into the corners of their cages, cowering and shuddering, with smothered howls and groans, was fearful. The great Asiatic lion is said to have broken two iron bars of his cage, and thrust his head through the opening just before the flames closed round him. A Bengal tiger burst his bars and sprang into the street. He was badly burned, and was soon put out of suffering by the pistol of a policeman. Toward night of the day succeeding the fire a black bear made his appearance at a second-story window, and signaled his distress. A fireman mounted a ladder, and attempted to cast a noose over the animal's head to guide him to a place of safety. But he resisted all friendly attempts, and presently disappeared among the ruins. Early the next morning, however, Bruin came out from some temporary den he had found amidst the débris, and sauntered along Broadway as if to seek more comfortable quarters. Finding himself the object of some interest, and thinking it would not pay to exhibit himself for nothing, he turned into sundry side-streets for greater privacy. But being still pursued he dashed into a provision store, where, like other offenders, he was arrested and taken to the station-house. A giraffe of great size and beauty, valued at over twenty thousand dollars, was, with infinite difficulty, rescued from the building, only to die a day or two afterward from his injuries. A young elephant, who suffered seriously, though more from the cold than the heat, will probably recover. Quite a number of animals and birds were saved, but those burned were among the most rare and costly of the collection. The fire is supposed to have originated in a defective flue.

It is in contemplation to erect a bridge over the Hudson River in the vicinity of Buttermilk Falls, to enable the Western Railway trains to reach New York with more facility.

Earthquakes are of everyday occurrence. One was recently experienced in Maine, and another in Vancouver's Island. It has been predicted that many strange things were to happen this year.

A new style of bonnet may soon be expected to be in vogue. The manufacture of them has already commenced. They are made from Manilla pulp, moulded on a block, then spread with dissolved shells, and covered with woolen flock or clothier's waste, and pressed till it has a velvet appearance. There is only one objection to them, and that will be fatal to their popularity unless dealers are cunning enough to devise ways and means of removing it. They don't cost enough! The expense of manufacture does not exceed ten cents each.

The entire amount of gold in the world at the present time is estimated at about $5,950,000,000 in value. That part of the "world" which is underground is probably not included in this estimate.

Before the recent snow-storm we saw, one day, a rare sight in Broadway. Six stalwart men, armed with axes, were attacking the snow and ice blocking up the street, evidently with intent to remove a portion! Courage! we said to ourself. Patientia et perseverantia vincunt omnes! We paused in our downward—we mean down town—career to watch the interesting process. Note the slow, but sure—gradual—uniform—upward movement of the axes, securely clasped by twelve huge hands! Up—up—u-p! Now they have reached the highest limit, and pause to rest. The downward motion begins—d-o-w-n—d-o-w-n—with an unflinching moderation and resolute steadiness worthy of remark—still lower, lower—ugh! Six blows in the gutter which absolutely make the chips fly. Long pause for rest after the effort. Then a second upward movement commences. The modus operandi was very interesting and instructive but we had only ten minutes to spare for the show, and reluctantly departed, leaving the laborers we had been watching, with arms and axes in mid air, taking their third upward rest! The entire scene was encouraging and inspiring. Two or three days after we noticed that the entire length of Broadway had been Whitened, and looked very clean. The same was true of the avenues, so also of all the cross-streets. Surprising, very!

About seven miles from Lexington, Kentucky, there is a remarkable crow-roost, where, according to a recent visitor, not less than a million of crows nightly sleep. About four o'clock in the afternoon they begin to arrive from all directions, entering the woods in long lines. Each flock has its leader, who flies over the tree-tops until he finds his roost, when the head of the column alights, the rest circling round and round and winding themselves about their chief. Only a few crows light on the same tree with the leader, which indicates that he is a sort of aristocratic personage who does not associate with the common herd, and that the persons who sleep on his tree are his royal family and crows high in authority in the flock. Hundreds roost on the ground for want of a limb; so they do not seem likely to abandon their ancient home, for this roost is so old that the oldest inhabitant remembers not its establishment. The crows do not appear to fear human visitors, but the explosion of a gun produces the greatest confusion and distress. If startled out of their sleep they fly from tree to tree, and seem quite helpless, losing in the night-time all that cunning which characterizes them in daylight. When the firing continues for any time they fly into the open fields and there sleep until daylight. As soon as the day begins to break they quit their roost and go no one knows where. It has been estimated that a crow will fly a hundred miles for his breakfast, and return after supper; and doubtless many of the crows who sleep in Kentucky are citizens of Ohio and Illinois. About the last of March they will leave their roost, and scatter over the Northern States to spend the summer.

A Vermont editor announces that he is "not at home" in the following style: "The man who left his name as M'Ginnis O'Flatherty, was about seven feet in length, and drunk accordingly, and who called at our office on Friday, accompanied by a hoe-handle, to ask if the editor was in, is respectfully informed that the editor is not in town, and is not expected to return."

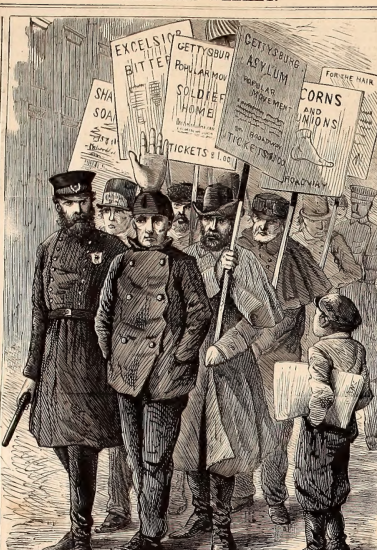
A man at Auburn, Maine, has put his 200 hens into a hot-house, and the unsuspecting fowls have been deluded into the belief that it was warm weather and the season for business.

A patent fuel of good quality is said to be obtained by mixing small coal with an equal quantity of soft clay, river mud, or any similar material. The finer the coal and the more thorough the mixing, the better the quality of the fuel. Water may be used with clay to make it of a good consistency for working; and when well mixed it should be made into lumps and dried in the air. In some parts of Belgium this kind of fuel is largely made and used, and is thought to give more heat than ordinary coal.

A very remarkable case of preservation from death occurred in Wisconsin. A German farmer had been for some time engaged in digging a well upon his premises. By some unfortunate loosening or misplacing of certain planks the farmer, in the midst of his work, was suddenly buried 75 feet underground. The workman at work at the top of the shaft was horror-stricken and paralyzed. The idea of rescue does not seem to have entered his mind, and during all that day not a spade was driven into the ground, not an effort made to exhume the buried man. But some energetic neighbors at length undertook to recover the body. On the third day the diggers discovered that the man was alive, and could speak. But it was not thought possible to release him alive. So, between the crevices of planks he sent his last messages to his family, and some refreshment was forced down to him. At length, after being entombed seventy-six hours, he was rescued. He was found partly sitting, with one foot nearly under him, the knee bent outward, and the whole leg pinioned by a stout plank resting on it with both ends imbedded in the sides of the well. He had heard every thing that transpired above him, and had passed the first twenty-four hours of his horrid imprisonment in alternate wonder, anxiety, and despair, that no effort was made to release him. Yet, strange to say, he was not seriously injured.

The peculiar effects of conversing upon matters and things beyond one's comprehension is illustrated by the Berkshire country gentleman who went the other evening to visit the lady of his affections. Wishing to be agreeable and social, he observed: "The thermomokron is twenty degrees below zelon this evenin'." "Yes," innocently replied the maiden, "such kind of birds do fly higher some seasons of the year than others."

ARREST OF PLACARD-BEARERS.



ONE of the greatest nuisances of New York has been, it is hoped, permanently suppressed by the arrest lately of several of the numerous individuals who are employed by a certain class of advertisers to carry their placards about the streets. These men, dressed in fantastic robes, on which appeared the announcement of the wares and the place of business of the advertiser, perambulated Broadway from morn to night, carrying banners, umbrellas, etc., on which the announcement was repeated. The men not only obstructed the sidewalk by their slow-moving persons, but also the vision, by the large placards they carried, and were a decidedly offensive set of street characters.

THE BARNUM'S MUSEUM FIRE.

THE destruction by fire of Barnum's American Museum, an event which we illustrate here and on page 185, occurred on the night of March 2, fortunately at an hour when the crowd of visitors had left the building. The conflagration began in the third story, and before being discovered had attained such headway that all efforts of the firemen to extinguish it proved in vain. Several persons who lived in the building, including several monstrosities of the show, were rescued, as were also a few of the wild animals belonging to the menagerie; but the most of these, and all the minor curiosities of the Museum were lost.

Several of the persons who slept in the building were roused from their slumbers and awakened to their danger by the roaring of the frightened animals of the menagerie, which appear to have been the first to detect the fire. The terror of these animals has been described by several eyewitnesses as of the most piteous and frightful character, and has been well illustrated on page 185. During the progress of the flames the roaring of the pent-up lions, leopards, and bears was distinctly heard above the shouts of the populace and the fierce crackling of the flames. After the fire had been in progress for an hour or more a large tiger made its appearance from the flaming building, but was so burned and weakened that it fell to the pavement and was soon shot by the policemen to save it from further misery. Subsequently a bear, after living for two days in the burnt building, escaped to the streets, and was taken to the Spring Street Station-house until claimed by his keeper.

Our illustration on this page shows the ruins of the Museum, and is a representation of a truly beautiful Arctic scene. The only portion left standing is the front wall, which, from its base to its summit, was flecked, and hung, and festooned with ice, moulded into the most fantastic forms. At night, when the moon shone down upon the ruins, the scene from Broadway was one of exquisite beauty. Great icicles depended from every projection of the wall, and reflected the light of the moon with a weird ghastliness. The two large lamps which once illuminated the pathway of those who entered in at the broad portal were completely covered, each with an immense mass of ice, that shone in the light like a gigantic Koh-i-noor under a cloud.

STUDENTS' FEUDS.

THE student at college seems to be, universally, the enemy of all good and peaceable citizens. William Hepworth Dixon, writing in his "Spiritual Wives" of a riot of students in the city of Königsberg, uses this language:

"In the Amber City, as in every other University, from Oxford to Moscow, there is a latent feud between town and gown; less hot here, perhaps, than in most places; still warm enough: hatred on one side, scorn on the other; just that sort of feeling which nature cut most freely into tiff and strife. In Königsberg this feud is not merely a war of youth against years, of class against class, as in Oxford and Cambridge, but of science against commerce, of liberalism against conservatism. The students of Königsberg represent the new German ideas, while the citizens represent, more or less closely, the old Prussian spirit. The students laugh at the town-folk as a bony, stupid, slavish people, who know nothing about art and philosophy, who care for little beyond toiling for their daily mess, and fighting for their king. What is seen among ourselves in Oxford is here found existing in reverse. With us learning is mostly feudal, commerce mostly liberal: in Königsberg learning is mostly radical, while commerce is very often feudal. Here the University is far more democratic than the city.

"Each section of this society has a tale of scorn which it tells against the other. Here, under his portico in the Altstadt, you will hear from some Herr Professor, in the midst of gibes and sneers, that when Graf von Bismarck, in the summer of last year, made his great appeal to the country, giving every lout in the province a vote, the rabble of Old Prussen refused to accept his gift, on the ground that they had never had votes under their good old kings. Or being told by the Prefect that their lord desired them to make use of these votes and send some one, possessing their confidence, to speak for them in the Parliament at Berlin, they wrote the King's name on their ballot-ing-papers, and then tossed them into the box. Or being further told by the Prefect that they could not vote for the King, since his Majesty was not a candidate for election in their city, they asked for fresh papers and wrote on them the Crown Prince's name. Nobody, you will be assured under the portico, could induce these loyal people to put their trust in a common man. Under the smoky roof of Wolff's Wine-stube in the Lang Gasse—the high street of traffic—you will see how quickly the tables can be turned against these sneerers. There you would hear of Jewish students who, in the bad old days, were ready to give up Moses and the synagogue for a Professor's chair; to change their names, and to deny their circumcision, for three hundred thalers a year. The need for these acts of sacrifice has been done away; but the old sentiment remains in part. When a burgher is vexed, you may still hear him deride a Jew—most of all a reformed Jew—as a rascal, only a little less vile than a Pole. Pious people in Germany usually speak of students as sons of Belial; as young men who mock at loyalty and disparage valor, and whose Satanic creed may be summed up in their own scandalous motto: No King and no God."

LUDLOW STREET JAIL.—THE OFFICE.

INTERIOR OF CELL.

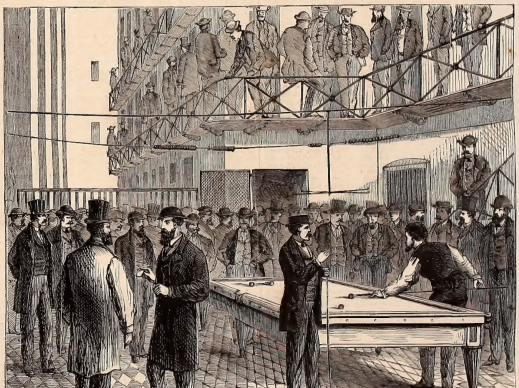
GROCERY STORE.

LUDLOW STREET JAIL.

THERE is an idea existing in the minds of all those persons who have never been in prison that a jail is a very horrible place to be confined in; that the exterior is repulsive and dismal in appearance, while the interior is dark and dirty beyond imagination; that the fare is small in quantity and bad in quality; and that, in accordance with Scripture, the way of the transgressor who gets put into prison for his crimes is decidedly hard. But this idea it appears is altogether a mistaken one. Mr. STANLEY FOX, one of our artists, was lately sent to the Ludlow Street Jail (entirely in a professional capacity, be it remembered), and has given us on this page a series of drawings which will at once explode the false notion we have of jails, and give the public an idea of the character and style of a modern prison-house for "respectable" criminals—that is, those who do not condescend to "pig" tribes, but who "steal largely."

The last of our sketches ought to be considered first in describing the prison. Ludlow Street Jail is situated at the corner of Ludlow Street and Essex Market Place, New York city, and was finished in June, 1862. It is built of Philadelphia brick ornamented with New Jersey free-stone trimmings. It is 90 feet square, and about 60 feet high, and is lighted by means of two horizontal rows of ten windows each. The upper windows are probably 30 feet in height, of proportionate width, and were it not for the presence of formidable iron bars before the sashes the stranger, in passing by, would be apt to conclude that the structure was a Friends' meeting-house, or an old-fashioned Methodist church. The engraving illustrating the exterior of the jail will give the reader an idea of its appearance.

Crossing the threshold the visitor is conducted through a diminutive hallway, and into a spacious apartment divided by a low iron railing into a business-office on one hand and a reception-room for visitors on the other. This room is illustrated in the first cut of our series. Extending from this room to the rear wall of the building is a narrow hallway, leading to the laundry and kitchen on the same floor, and by means of a small stairway to the cellar below, where a portable engine is made to supply steam throughout the establishment for heating, culinary, and other purposes.

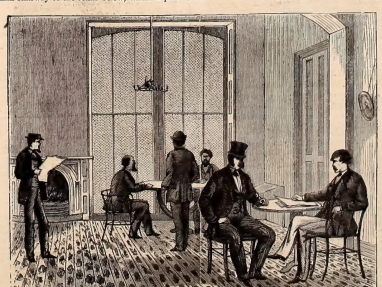


The jail contains 87 cells of the character of that which we illustrate in the second drawing. The floors of the cells are ten feet square, and the walls are 12 feet high. Each cell bears a cleanly appearance, and is comparatively free from the musty odor so common to prison apartments. This is due to frequent whitewashing, scrubbing, and free ventilation. Stoves are not used at all, the heating of the building being accomplished by means of steam. Each cell is furnished with two iron bedsteads and spring mattresses, with comfortable pillows and an abundance of bed-clothing. A table, looking-glass, and chairs are also found in each apartment, and in some instances other articles of comfort furnished by the occupant. For the sake of companionship two persons generally occupy a cell.

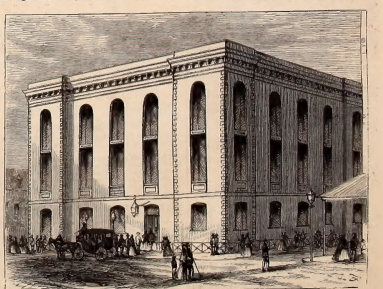
The fare of the prisoners of Ludlow Street Jail is not less wholesome and pleasant than their rooms are healthy and comfortable. The "official fare," according to the prison regulations, consists of bread and tea and coffee for breakfast, meats for dinner, except on Friday, when fish is served, and bread and milk for supper. Vegetables are also occasionally allowed. But many of the prisoners who are not without friends or ready money avail themselves of the privilege of receiving their meals from their own or their friends' homes, or from the neighboring restaurants. One of the more enterprising of the prisoners has established a grocery store in the prison, where the prisoners can purchase a great many necessaries, and even some delicacies. Another feature of the jail, strongly resembling a custom of our best boarding-houses, is the serving of "private tables," the meals being served to the occupants in the cells.

The prisoners are not without several sources of amusement. They have the privilege of playing cards, checkers, dominoes, and billiards, and the reading-room is always open to them during the day. The principal amusement, however, is that found in "handling the cue," and the billiard-table is continually in demand, a charge being made for its use. At almost every hour of the day numerous elegant-looking burglars, counterfeiters, forgers, and other "operators" can be found looking on while some noble bond thief plays with some embezzling bank clerk.

The hour for shutting the prisoners in their cells is 6 o'clock P.M.; they are released at 7.30 A.M., when the feasting and playing and pleasure of the day begin again.



Most of the prisoners usually confined in this prison are those of the Sheriff of New York County, detained under charges of intended or consummated acts of fraud upon their creditors, and the jail is really the county jail for New York County.



BILLIARD-ROOM IN LUDLOW STREET JAIL.—[SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.]

THE EARLY GIPSIES.

AN air of romance has always hung about the gipsies from the beginning of the fifteenth century, when, starting from Hungary, and provided with documents in their favor by some of the potentates of that country, they made their way to Constance at the time when the celebrated council was sitting. Finding the Emperor Sigismund, of supra-grammarian memory, amusing himself at Lindau, they addressed themselves to him, and told him such a pitiful tale about their captivity among the Turks that he received them kindly, and gave them letters of imperial recommendation. Armed with these they betook themselves to the free cities of the Baltic, favoring Luneburg and Hamburg especially with their presence. At that time they numbered five hundred, including women and children, and must have presented a very picturesque appearance. The chiefs, say the old chroniclers, were nobly dressed and rode on horseback with bands by their side. Some of the men walked, the others rode, their families being conveyed in carts resembling those of the ancient Scythians. But they did not create an agreeable impression on the Teutonic mind. They were terribly dirty, we are told, hideously ugly, and as black as coals. At that time they gave themselves out as a Christian people who had relapsed into heathenism amongst the Turks, and had been ordered by their bishops to do penance by wandering about without settling down any where during the space of seven years. During this account of themselves, they rambled through Germany into Switzerland, and in their capacity of penitents a party of them arrived, in 1422, at Bologna, on their way to Rome. The Bolognese, however, objecting to their "economy" tendencies, complained so much of them that the magistrates gave the inhabitants leave to retaliate by stealing from the strangers as much as would cover their losses. Disgusted at this evidently inequitable proceeding, the gipsies soon left the inhospitable city and pursued their journey to Rome, where it seems they succeeded in seeing the Pope and in obtaining credentials from him. Meanwhile, in 1418, some of their number appeared at Constance, in Provence, and in 1427, at a period when the fortunes of France were at their lowest ebb, a small band reached Paris, where they created a genuine sensation. By this time they had somewhat changed their account of their origin. Some of them claimed to be the descendants of those Christian Egyptians who refused hospitality to Mary and Joseph on the occasion of the flight into Egypt. A general impression has always prevailed that these strange wanderers originally came from the east country, and one of their own stories is that their ancestors were obliged to flee thence, pursued by the hostile Mahometans, from which they escaped only by means of a bridge of rushes, in memory of which some of them are said to wear a piece of rush as an amulet to this day. Up to the time of their appearance in Paris their number did not exceed fourteen hundred at most, but soon afterward fresh importations took place, and their ranks increased rapidly. Whence they sprang, and how they traveled has always been a mystery. Their very name, for instance, by which into England has always remained an unanswered problem. Strangely enough, some twenty years ago a few Spanish papers contained an account of the sudden apparition of a band of gipsies at one of the sea-ports of Spain, nobody knowing from what part of the world they had suddenly sprung into sight, or where they had obtained the horses they offered for sale. And again in the autumn of 1866 a band of about a hundred individuals, with thirty horses, suddenly appeared in what Ireland, traveling in quaint, rude carriages, which very little, swift-footed horses drew. Only a few of the immigrants could speak German, for they came from the plains of Hungary, and they were as wild, and dark, and savage-looking as if they had been the inhabitants of some untrodden inland island in the Southern seas. Thus, from time to time, in the midst of Europe's western civilization, there suddenly appears a living representative of the wandering tribes which, hundreds of years ago, led a wild life in the distant East.

Barnes's History of the 39th Congress

HISTORY OF THE Thirty-ninth Congress
OF THE United States.
By WILLIAM H. BARNES.
Portraits.
8vo, Cloth, $5 00.

A volume of 616 royal octavo pages, and 18 portraits on steel by the best engravers in the country.

The book contains an accurate history of the great measures of the most important Congress that ever assembled, and a graphic sketch or sketches of its members, together with characteristic and pertinent extracts from their speeches. The narrative portion of the work is written in clear and concise style, while the extracts, being chronologically brief, are directly to the point, and present the views of our wisest statesmen on the great subjects of recent legislation.

The book should be read by every Voter who wishes to keep up with the times and form a correct estimate of public men. It forms a useful Manual for the Senators and the Representatives, since it gives them in a form convenient for reference all the important facts relating to the great legislation which now occupy the public mind. Being supplied with a copious index, the work forms an extended Political Text-book, or Cyclopædia.

"I A Man Wanted"—but he was not seen in the New York Depot, purchasing a ticket for Boston. In about twenty-five years old, and intelligent, and the person who originated the publications going the rounds of the press in the city and elsewhere in opposition to Dr Wolcott's Pain Paint and Pain Annihilator, saying that said Wolcott would furnish in future his remedies to the druggists. I am supplying all druggists at the same prices as myself, and as fast as I can manufacture. R. L. WOLCOTT, Sole Proprietor, 176 Chatham Square, New York.

What causes bald heads? Simply an unnatural heat and consequent inflammation of the head, which dries up the scalp, depriving the hair of nutrition and moisture. It is of vital importance that the head should be kept free of all unnecessary heat. It can be done; heedless never exist; which is known when the hair would not fall. If you can not buy PAIN PAINT, apply cold water to the head four or five times each day; keep the fect warm at all hazard—"An ounce prevention is worth a pound of cure"—use PAIN PAINT freely, and not wait until a racking pain from a bursting blood-vessel, or some one mishearing; keep the head constantly at its proper temperature, and if your hair is not restored you will grow chicken up. Heads that resemble bald eagles, utterly destitute of feathers, I do not encouragement, but they will be respired a hundredfold in general health, by feeding their brain from unnecessary heat and inflammation.

Directions: Pour the Paint in a dish, and with a large soft brush or sponge, or hand, or a piece of cotton cloth, apply the Pain Paint to every part or place where pain exists; soak and sop the part affected with Paint until pain is relieved. Then rub thoroughly, continue to soak the affected part constantly for twenty minutes or half an hour. In the latter, however, the pain and sometimes the stomach, too, should be perfectly sooth and kept wet with Paint. Do not be broken up. Pain Paint will do it most effectually, and the deep bottled up pain will be relieved from unnecessary. Ulcers or sores should be well soaked, at least twice a day, and several bottles of cotton cloth and Pain Paint kept wet over the part affected. Sometimes it may be necessary to bathe the joint with water and wash it, but cold applications are generally the best, except for very young children or weakly persons. Wolcott's Pain Paint leaves no smart, will not color or stain. Price 25 cents, 50 cents, and $1 per bottle, but 25 cents. Pain Paint reduces and subdues inflammation, and, therefore, one hundred bottles will cure it. It is absolutely harmless. All physical pain arises from inflammation, and the Pain Paint will cure it, and only it. It is not only a certain remedy for mankind, but for all the animal creation. It is good for internal, and only for all pain, but it does permanently cure the following: Pain in the head, toothache, sore throat, sore, hoarseness, cough, asthma, bronchitis, headache, neuralgia, stiff and enlarged joints, fever sores, fits, &c., require the largest bottles, and the daily, and sometimes hourly, application of this Paint. Nature heals the most inveterate ulcers, if fever and heat are constantly kept down. A little perseverance and patience accomplish the most wonderful results. If you suffer pain, use Pain Paint, or call at Dr. WOLCOTT'S office, 176 Chatham Square, and it will be removed without money or price. Pain Paint is worth to every family more than $1000 spent in dragging the system. For sale by all Druggists.

KRUMMACHER'S DAVID, KING OF ISRAEL. David, the King of Israel: a Portrait drawn from Private Life and the Book of Psalms. By Frederick William Krummacher, D.D., Author of "Elijah the Tishbite," &c. Translated under the express Sanction of the Author by Rev. M. G. Easton, M.A. With a Letter from Dr. Krummacher to his American Readers, and a Portrait. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

In such a field Dr. Krummacher's well-known powers of description, his chaste fancy, his well-balanced judgment, and his delightful piety were sure to find full scope; nor have our anticipations been disappointed. In the present work David passes before us in the various phases of his character as shepherd, psalmist, warrior, and monarch. There is no attempt at originality of view, no proud notion of singularity, no controversial sparring; the narrative flows on like a well-told story, and the art of the writer lies in the just selection of salient points, and in the naturalness of his reflections.—British and Foreign Evangelical Review.

The treatment is marked by the acuteness of insight and the tenderness of sympathy that are characteristic of the author.—Imperial Review.

We would commend this volume to the clergy as a storehouse of hints for pulpit use, and also as a valuable addition to our devotional literature.—Christian Journal.

A very happy specimen of the style for which Dr. Krummacher is best known—at once vivid, imaginative, and expressive. It exhibits more of the intellectual and robust than his earlier works.—Record.

A lifelike portrait of one who has ever been an object of deep interest.—Dublin Evangelical Magazine.

The story of the shepherd-king it tells in a very fascinating manner, and throws upon it in a way that combines both the pleasant and the profitable. Mr. Easton has succeeded in rendering his author into such transparent language that no one can fail to think Krummacher has made the translator, and this is just as it ought to be.—Edinburgh Free Methodist.

SMILES'S HISTORY OF THE HUGUENOTS. The Huguenots: their Settlements, Churches, and Industries in England and Ireland. By Samuel Smiles, Author of "Self-Help," &c. With an Appendix relating to the Huguenots in America. Crown 8vo, Cloth, Beveled, $1 75.

The wonderful story is told with spirit and accuracy, and it is one which has been over before it was told. The reader is enabled to follow the course of events with ease, and the interest attaches to the style of the exciting narrative. Seldom does so much valuable matter be given, and nowhere do the covers of a single volume as we find in this; and the appendix on the same line as a separate and instructive treatise.—Boston Traveller.

The author has given his subject the most thorough investigation. Drawing his material only from the best-authenticated historic sources, he has followed the accounts of the most impartial writers in regard to the persecutions of the Huguenots on the Continent of Europe. Respecting their reception in England Mr. Smiles narrates much that is entirely new and of great interest.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

THE MASSACRE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW: Preceded by a History of the Religious Wars in the Reign of Charles IX. By HENRY WHITE, M.A. With Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $1 75.

Mr. White has performed his task well. His arguments are every where conclusive, ably supported by the results of deep researches into the contemporary histories of the times of which he treats. His language is always forcible, and frequently rises to eloquence. His account of the state of France in the middle of the sixteenth century is admirable and exhaustive. The same praise may be allowed to his descriptions of the characters of the chief personages of the bloody drama which he recounts. We heartily commend the book for the tolerant spirit in which it is written. Remembering how hard it is even to think of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew without a thrill of indignation, we can not sufficiently praise this conspicuous merit of the volume.—London Review.

Of the state of France from the commencement of the century to the terrible day of St. Bartholomew Mr. White gives a masterly account. From numerous contemporary memoirs and state documents he has collected the details of a picture at once broad in its general effect and minute in its accessories—a picture full of life, color, character, and force. The labor of collecting so many materials from such scattered places, some very obscure and not easily searched out, is only equaled by the power of combining them in a striking manner; and of the capacity to do both Mr. White has given abundant proof. The massacre of Paris is of course the chief feature in the work. It is admirably described, without any pretense of pictorial writing, yet in such a way that the whole hideous tragedy passes vividly before our eyes, and we behold the grim old Paris of the sixteenth century in its spasm of blood and terror. Mr. White has produced a work which has some of the best characteristics of history: a book full of research, conceived in the most conscientious and painstaking spirit, and written in a nervous and vigorous style, proper to the gravity of the events which it narrates and the principles which it affirms. —London Daily News.

Mr. White has exhibited great skill, great research, and considerable candor in executing his work, and readers of his clear narrative will readily bear testimony to the interest with which the story is kept up down to the awfully tragic close.—Glasgow Daily Herald.

TESTIMONIALS.

From the Philadelphia Press.

THE OROIDE WATCH.—By reference to the advertisement of Messrs. Collins & Co., it will be seen that the firm claims to give a really good watch, with good works, and an oroide case, for fifteen dollars. Oroide is a costly bronze, precisely resembling gold, wearing like it, and never changing color like pinchbeck. We have examined these watches and found them good and cheap—two having been purchased at retail price by gentlemen in our office—and are satisfied that they are fully what Messrs. Collins & Co. represent them to be. Their ladies' watches are very beautiful, and we know of no present so cheap which would be more acceptable. The very small proportion of gold which is given in most of the so-called gold watches of the present day renders them practically of no greater value than oroide.

BLACKSHEAR, GEORGIA, January 6, 1868.
C. E. Collins & Co., Nassau Street, New York:
GENTS,—I have just seen one of your gold fifteen dollar ($15) watches, and must have one immediately. You will please ship at your earliest convenience one of the same kind (imitation gold $15 watch). If I get as good a one as the one I have just seen I can make a good trade for you in this part of the country.
Yours respectfully,
J. S. COLCORD, S. Atlantic and Gulf Railway, Georgia.

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, January 10, 1868.
Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:
GENTS,—I have carried one of your oroide watches some time. It keeps good time, and keeps its color good. I am well pleased with it. Mine is a large size, at $15. Please send me one of the ladies' size.
A. H. BRIGGS, 256 So. Desplans, Chicago, Illinois.

FORT SUMNER, NEW MEXICO, December 28, 1867.
Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:
GENTLEMEN,—I have received your chain per express, for which I paid $6 75, and am well pleased with it. I consider it a cheap article. Please send me two of your watches, gentlemen's size, at $15 each. Send them C. O. D., by express, to Fort Union, New Mexico, where the mail conductor from this post will receive them for me and pay all expenses. I have no doubt but I will be able to send you several more orders when the watches are seen here.

BLACKSHEAR, GEORGIA, December 27, 1867.
Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:
GENTLEMEN,—You will please send me one of your oroide hunting watches by express to Blackshear, Ga. —No. 8, A. & G. R. R.—C.O.D. I saw the watch you sent to Mr. W. W. Campbell, which created a great sensation. I think you will be patronized if you hold out and prove to be genuine. I would be pleased to be your agent if I would be any help to you. There will be quite a number here that will send for watches in a short time.
Respectfully yours,
E. F. SWEAT.

FORT UNION, NEW MEXICO, December 25, 1867.
Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:
SIRS,—I have the pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of your watch, and it gives entire satisfaction; but you forgot to send me the $2 chain. You will have more orders from me before long.
Yours respectfully,

Ground Coffee, 20c., 25c., 30c., 35c., best 40c. per pound. Hotels, Saloons, Boarding-House Keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our French Breakfast and Dinner Coffee, which we sell at the low price of 30c. per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50c. to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St. (Post-Office Box, No. 5643), New York City.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city.

Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a club say how much tea or coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete send it to us by mail, and we will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost, so there need be no confusion in their distribution —each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the club can divide equitably among themselves.

The funds to pay for the goods ordered can be sent by drafts on New York, by post-office money orders, or by express, as may suit the convenience of the club. Or, if the amount ordered exceed $30, we will, if desired, send the goods by Express to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary package for Clubs of less than $30.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-third by sending directly to "The Great American Tea Company."

BEWARE of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our Establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are bogus or imitations. We have no branches, and do not, in any case, authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office orders and drafts make payable to the order of the Great American Tea Company. Direct letters and orders to the

"IMPROVED BRONZE ALUMINUM HUNTING-CASED WATCHES"
(The qualities and resemblance of this new metal are such, compared to gold, that even judges are deceived) and "HOSKOPP'S PATENTED PEOPLE'S WATCH."
TRADE MARK.
The Improved Bronze Aluminium of which my watches are made is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. It has seriously occupied the attention of Scientific men, and has not only called forth the favorable notice of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition, and even been favorably noticed by receipt of His Holiness Pius IX., authorizing its use in the manufacturing of Church goods.
The qualities of the metal are such that it is surpassed by none, if we except gold itself, and that only on account of the intrinsic value of the latter. Further details will be found in my circular, which will be sent postpaid on demand.
My watches are made of three sizes, all hunting-cased—one small for ladies or lads, and two for gents. The movements are well finished, carefully put together by skilful workmen, and perfectly regulated. I can therefore warrant them accurate time-keepers. These goods being manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to sell any of the above sizes at the extremely low price of $16 00. None genuine unless bearing my trade-mark as above. A full assortment of all kinds of chains always on hand.
Goods sent by express, C.O.D., with charges.
Not responsible for money sent enclosed in letters.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

THE New Hampshire election shows at least that there is not a universal and irresistible reaction. It shows that the people will not allow their dissatisfaction with some measures of public policy, and with certain aspects of the situation of the country, to betray them into a surrender of power into the hands of the political allies of the rebellion. It would have been a subject of very serious apprehension if the Democratic party, under the championship of such persons as HENRY CLAY DEAN, MONTGOMERY BLAIR, CHAUNCEY C. BURR, and D. W. WOODBRIDGE, had succeeded in New Hampshire. For certainly it should be enough for every man who sincerely loves liberty, and who believes in intelligence and a high sense of national honor as its foundations, that every man who is hostile to the Government and the Union, every worshiper of "the lost cause;" every enemy of free schools; every inciter of hatred of race; every political leader who is unhanged in heart and lurking in foreign lands; every man who rejoiced over Bull Run and scowled when Richmond fell, would have rejoiced if the Democratic party had carried New Hampshire.

The satisfaction with the actual result, with the decided and triumphant success of the Republican party, after one of the most earnest and determined of political contests, is precisely of the same kind with the satisfaction occasioned by the fall of Donelson and Vicksburg, with the re-election of LINCOLN, and with the recorded at Appomattox. It shows that the purpose of the people is inflexible; that while the great issues of the war are unsettled they will work through the party organizations of the war, and will defer new parties until new questions arise. The defeats of the autumn undoubtedly contributed to the New Hampshire victory. It has become evident that if the people give way to impatience, if they refuse to sustain the Republican party out of dislike of certain men and measures, if they choose to make the party in power responsible for all the disagreeable things that necessarily follow a civil war and which no party could possibly avoid, they must see the Copperhead party come into power. What that party is the people have not failed to see, for the successive events of last year, the fatal faith of the "Democracy" that the great reaction would sweep the old Southern policy of which they were the tools into power, has emboldened the party to throw away its masks and reveal its character and purpose.

The country has consequently seen that the leaders who were most strenuously Copperhead have become most conspicuous. FERNANDO and VALLANDIGHAM stump Ohio, and VALLANDIGHAM contests a seat in the Senate of the United States, which is given to another who noted but not less bitter partisan. PENDLETON, a frank secessionist and repudiator, is enthusiastically nominated for the Presidency by many State Democratic Conventions, and delegates are instructed to vote for him at the National Convention. EVEN SEYMOUR, who has not openly advocated repudiation, formally withdrew from the field, with how much sincerity may be inferred from his previous career. ISAAC TOUCEY, Mr. BUCHANAN'S Secretary of the Navy, who scattered the navy in order to help the rebellion, cheered by the apparent reaction, makes himself heard from the national contempt into which he has fallen, by goading the Democratic victory in New Hampshire and elsewhere which "will undo all the damnable legislation of Congress," and put down the South "where she can govern herself without the tyrannical interposition of a miserable rump of a Congress." JESSE D. BRIGHT, who was expelled from the Senate at the beginning of the war for corresponding an inventor of fire-arms to "His Excellency, JEFFERSON DAVIS, President of the Confederation of States," and who now declares that he was opposed to the war from the beginning to the end, and never intends "to vote for paying a dollar of the principal of the debt," is made President of the Democratic Convention of Indiana, and is nominated as a Democratic Presidential elector. Meanwhile the Democratic papers and speakers studiously shun every thing even the word "loyal," which is simply the description of a man wholly true to the Union during the war; and, sure of the reaction, the party sends into New Hampshire speakers who talk but too plainly, and who do not even try to conceal their fierce hatred of the freedmen and of the Union soldiers. The country has seen that the Democratic party proposes to enter upon the political campaign of 1868 with a platform of repudiation, of negro hate, of restoration of the Southern States to the exclusive political control of those who are hostile to the Government, and with all the cruel injustice and increasing perilous agitation that are implied in the cry of "white man's government;" in one word, with the determination to plunge the country as far as possible back into the condition which produced a terrible war, and to do this by every kind of appeal to the meanest of human passions and motives.

To this intention of the Democratic party, now plainly perceived, the result of the New Hampshire election is the first emphatic response. The victory has been greatly helped by the association of the name of General GRANT with the successful party. That name is the assurance of firmness, moderation, and sagacity. The victory was achieved under the leadership of one of GRANT'S soldiers, General HARRIMAN, and by the constant appeal, local and upon local issues. The result of the elections in some of the Eastern cities, as for instance in Portland, have been claimed as Democratic triumphs. They were, however, decided upon local questions; that in Portland, for example, was a temperance division. The great multitude of temperance men in Maine and in the country agree, politically, with the Republican party. But the Republican candidate for mayor of Portland was very warmly opposed on temperary legislation, and upon that ground many of the Republicans, who were decided temperance men, voted against him. So in the Massachusetts Legislature the Prohibitionists united with the Democrats to defeat a license law. The city elections in the State of New York also are necessarily affected by local considerations, and can not safely be regarded as political indications. But in New Hampshire the question was really national. General HARRIMAN was the representative of General GRANT and of the Republican policy, and Mr. SINCLAIR was the representative of the Copperhead reaction. We are devoutly grateful that the head of that old snake has been again broken, and we sincerely trust that in November it will be ground under the heel of an intelligent and liberty-loving people.

THE PRESIDENT'S POWER OVER THE CABINET.

THE Impeachment of the President is earnestly resisted on the ground that he is entitled to a Cabinet in unison with him. We have already shown in previous articles that the Constitution did not contemplate the creation of a Cabinet, but that one has grown up from the custom of successive administrations. We repeat, however, the whole of the clause conferring on the President power over the Heads of Departments: "He may require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the Executive Departments upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices."

This power clearly negatives the idea that a much higher power than was intended is to be conferred, and negatives that also that it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution to create a Cabinet. The duties of officers indicated by the description of "the principal officer in each of the Executive Departments" are not specified in the Constitution; but Congress, under the power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution".... the "powers vested by this Constitution ... in any department or officer thereof," have, from time to time, created various departments and changed those duties at pleasure. Did the Constitution intend that the President, at his pleasure, and without reason, shall have in those departments such officers as he shall think proper? The power conferred on him is to require the Heads of Departments is that he shall "nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate appoint" them. It was intended that he should take the advice of the Senate as to the choice thereof," have, from time to time, created various departments and changed those duties at pleasure. Did the Constitution intend that the President, at his pleasure, and without reason, shall have in those departments such officers as he shall think proper? The power conferred on him is to require the Heads of Departments is that he shall "nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate appoint" them. It was intended that he should take the advice of the Senate as to the choice thereof, and after obtaining their consent appoint. General WASHINGTON constructed the Executive power by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to make treaties," as indicating that he should in advance take such advice. In the proceedings, in 1789, of the First Congress, will be found a letter from President WASHINGTON addressed to the Senate, informing them that he would meet them at their chamber, to take their advice on the formation of an Indian treaty, for which purpose he should present a resolution to receive him at the time mentioned. They met and consulted together; and such was no doubt the intention of the Constitution. The language of the power with respect to officers is somewhat different; but that the Senate was to advise with the President on that subject is very clear. The practice has doubtless been abandoned from the multiplicity of nominations and appointments. The language contemplated intimate relations between the Senate and the President on that subject. It will be recollected that Mr. STANTON, under the Tenure-of-Office Act, was suspended by President JOHNSON, and that General GRANT was appointed Secretary ad interim under the authority of that act. The suspension of Mr. STANTON was reported to the Senate by having been made for some of the causes of objection which the act enumerates, but they were deemed insufficient, and Mr. STANTON was restored. This action amounted to the Senate's advice on that subject, and was equivalent to the refusal of the Senate to consent to Mr. STANTON'S removal. In defiance of such advice and of the plain intent of the Tenure-of-Office Act, the President removed Mr. STANTON. This, as we have seen, constitutes one of the grounds of impeachment.

Mr. STANTON'S removal was proof not only of a want of cordiality between the President and the Senate, but of a wide difference between them, and it is scarcely to be expected that the Senate, which is invited with the power "to advise and consent" to appointments, would use the power in order to arm the President with an officer in hostility—in the gravest matters of public concern—not only to the Senate, but also to the House of Representatives. Such an officer, if appointed, would add to the power of the President to defeat the action of Congress. Indeed, with the complete command of the War Department and of the army and all the material of war, the President might defy the popular branch of the Government. The President's course furnished just grounds of suspicion that his motives in appointing General THOMAS to the control of that Department were not all that could not be tolerated. All laws conflicting with the Tenure-of-Office Act having been in force repealed by it, there was no such office as the "Secretary of War ad interim," except in the contingency of suspension. Removal, not suspension, was resorted to, and hence the chief clerk was to act as custodian of the books and papers if a vacancy had occurred, which it did not; but the President chose to assume that there was a vacancy against the fact, and to order General THOMAS to act. The order was in the nature of a military order from the Commander-in-Chief to a subordinate, who was disposed to obey in a military manner to take possession of the Department. These extraordinary proceedings show that Congress was right in withdrawing from the President the power of appointment which the Act of 1789 assumed that he possessed, and in declaring that it should be exercised only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The Secretary of War is, in ordinary times, when there is perfect accord between all the branches of the Government, as important to Congress as to the President. It is in the power of Congress at any time to abolish the office, and to create it again at their pleasure. If Congress can destroy and create at pleasure, may not Congress say that the officer shall not be removed except by the same ceremonies that were required before appointment?—that is to say, the Senate must consent.

Mr. MADISON undoubtedly argued in Congress in favor of the President's power; but, as he was one of the recognized authors of the Federalist, which was committed to the doctrine advanced in the 77th No. of that work, that "the consent of that body (the Senate) would be necessary to displace as well as to appoint." The names of the several authors of the Federalist were not known at the time of its not at the time of their publication announced, and hence it may be said (although Mr. HAMILTON wrote the principal article) that Mr. MADISON abandoned, when supporting WASHINGTON'S administration, a position which he had advanced to secure the adoption of the Constitution.

"Where a man" (said Mr. HAMILTON) "in any station had given satisfactory evidence of his fitness for it, a new President would be restrained from attempting a change in favor of a person more agreeable to him, by the apprehension that a discontentance of the Senate might frustrate the design, and bring some degree of discredit upon himself."

These are the words of one of the authors of the Constitution, and the distinguished commentator, and of a Cabinet officer afterward of the highest authority. They do not sustain the haughty claims made in the President's behalf, as if he were "the sole disposer of offices." The President has encroached upon this distribution of power in face of the advice of the Senate deliberately given, and in defiance of the solemn decision of Congress, and, it now appears, in face of the true meaning of the Constitution.

THE PRECEDENT OF IMPEACHMENT.

"IT is a pity to show how easily a President can be removed," says a writer. "It is a pity to make a precedent that will lead every Congressional opposition in the majority to remove the Executive," say others. To the first remark we reply that the removal of a President for a clear violation of law is no easier a process than the Constitution intended it to be. And which is the greater evil—that the Executive should continue to impose his veto after its constitutional expiration, until he can procure the judgment of the Supreme Court, or that an Executive which refuses to obey the law should be legally removed? And if the President should be removed, is it "easily" done? Let us see:

When the proposition was originally made, more than a year ago, the universal feeling among those who had elected Mr. JOHNSON was that although he was strenuously endeavoring to baffle the intentions of the people as expressed by their representatives, yet he was ingeniously keeping within the letter of the law; while, to make sure of a successful impeachment, technical guilt was necessary. His conduct in connection with the New Orleans massacre; his reeling tour and maudlin speeches in the summer of 1866, might, of themselves—as it seemed to many—have justified a charge of "misdemeanor," if nothing more. But it was remarked that while he cursorily insulted Congress he yet recognized its authority; and the good-sense of the country concluded that it was expedient to await the ordinary method of an election to remove an obnoxious to its will. This conclusion was more emphatically declared by the enormous majority against impeachment at the opening of the present session, when the laws that had been passed over the veto of the President had made his efforts to paralyze the equitable reconstruction of the Union still more effective. His intolerance was evident; but although a great misfortune to every national interest by perplexing and prolonging national pacification, it was better to endure it to the end than to impeach without palpable and technical guilt which should satisfy every one who was not skeptical of every thing that Congress could do.

Under plea of testing the constitutionality of a law by making a case for the Supreme Court, the President violated the law. He had now supplied the technical offense. The whole career, and the immediate circumstances of the case, tended to show that his act was tentative merely. There could be no reasonable doubt that, if not at once arrested in his course, the President would not hesitate to take steps still more daring; and the same House that a little before had so decisively refused to impeach opposed impeachment now by the whole Republican vote impeached. We ask those who think the impeachment will show how easily a President can be removed, what else could Congress have done? If it be said that it might have awaited the opinion of the Court, the reply that it could only have been done at all, when it had reason to believe in the honest purpose of the President; and even if it had been sure of that purpose, it might properly have feared that the precedent was dangerous. For if the Executive may continue to impose his veto when it has been constitutionally overruled, in one case, he may do so in every case.

If, indeed, President JOHNSON had not vetoed any law passed by the Thirty-ninth Congress, upon the ground of unconstitutionality, and it had been passed over his veto, every one would understand that he might have arranged with Congress that it should be judicially determined by a case mutually agreed upon; but only because of the extraordinary circumstances of the time and of the remarkable confidence that was reposed in him personally. But if BUCKINGHAM, or PIERCE, or SEYMOUR had been President at the time, and had already violated the law under plea of awaiting a judgment of the Court, we can not imagine that Congress would have delayed impeachment for a single week. The declared opinions and antecedents of those three persons would have furnished a conclusive presumption against the loyalty of their intentions. Congress could not safely have trusted them. If an Executive were ever to be removed by impeachment, the case would be plain.

It is so with the President. The only thing consistently clear in his brief story is the intention to thwart the policy of Congress. Hostility to Congress in his memorandum, and when having opposed its will by his veto he continues to defy the two-thirds vote, Congress is brought to the alternative of impeaching him, or of suffering the two-thirds to be wholly disregarded by the Executive. until the Supreme Court has decided whether the law passed by the two-thirds is constitutional. In case of conviction we can not think that the President is "easily" removed because he is guilty of such an offense. If the law is of such a kind that it can not be executed unless the Executive chooses it, we repeat what we have before said that he must violate it at his risk; a risk which may not indeed be serious to him, except in name, as in this case, he has revealed his spirit and purpose. The removal of the President by impeachment for violating a law upon plea of its unconstitutionality, is a process which no good citizen can object to seeing made.

That a party majority in the House will hereafter maliciously resort to impeachment when a mere difference exists with the President we have no fear. This is not a difference with the President; it is, in the judgment of the House, a violation of law. As for party majorities and their action we presume that there is nobody who doubts that had a Democratic Congress under its slaveholding leaders found itself opposed by the President, and as he sent nine in command of a two-thirds vote, it would have promptly impeached him if he had refused to obey a law passed over his veto, and the Supreme Court could move in the matter. The present impeachment is a party measure, undoubtedly, but no more than the opposition to it; and it is necessarily a party measure, because the law which the Executive violated was passed by a party majority. Impeachment contemplates a political offense, among others, and the trial is of necessity a political trial. It need not therefore be strictly and offensively partisan, although, as the members of a great party naturally sympathize upon political questions, it will almost inevitably assume a party aspect. Yet it must be always remembered that the Republican majority refused to impeach the President for betraying the cause which he was elected to serve. He is impeached not for treason to his party, but for violating the law which he had sworn to execute. If he be removed it can not be said that a Republican Congress published a President because he differed in opinion, but because, against the Constitution, he endeavored to make his opinion law.

THE WEST AND REPUDIATION.

It is pleasant to know that it is a mistake, although a very general one, to suppose that the West as a section unanimously demands repudiation. There are weighty official voices of the business interests of that part of the country which pronounce against it most earnestly, and which declare with the power and simplicity of truth the soundest principles, exposing with equal insight the fallacy of the common argument of the repudiators. There is, indeed, at St. Louis a quarto weekly newspaper just established which is devoted to the great cause of national dishonor. It is not surprising to find that it is the project of a man who during the war was one of the most faithful allies of the rebels. Its introductory article spenks of President LINCOLN as "one of those grotesque moral monsters who, secretly conscious of his own meanness, was always trying to appear honorable without the intellectual and moral ability to be so." The paper is a full illustration of the real significance of repudiation. It is the attempt of the defeated rebellion to make the country pay for victory by a loss of honor.

That Senator SHERMAN mildly implies repudiation under the guise of an elaborate system of exchange of bonds, and that General BUTLER advocates merely paying "according to the letter of the law," and that the patriotic fidelity of both of those gentlemen is unquestionable, does not alter the case. For if the country can not pay the debt which it contracted for the support of the war, exactly as it has hitherto paid all other debts, it is undeniably dishonest; and that is what the spirit of rebellion would most gladly see. If Senator SHERMAN and General BUTLER take the ground they occupy because they think a frail claim the Republican party can not maintain itself upon any other, they admit that that party stoops to dishonor in order to continue to lead a demoralized country. It is a mistake. For if the country means to repudiate, under whatever fine name, it will follow an original and sincere repudiating Democratic party, and not the reluctant and doubting proselytes.

It is painful to reflect that the reaction from the the elevation of feeling during the war has gone so far that even now grave men consider whether we will pay our debts. Mr. Petroleum Nasby states the case with his usual point. Bigler owes Biggers a note. Biggers has a little amount covered by a note which was bearing interest. But after pondering the wisdom of Pendleton and Butler for some time, Bigler destroys the note of Biggers, and insisted that he should accept in payment a note that bore no interest. He had suffered the intolerable pressure too long. He should not pay interest to Biggers any more than to the Government. Nothing was so convenient to Bigler as to pay his debts with his neat note-of-hand; and the ingenious Bigler appropriated the happy idea from that accomplished financier Mr. Wilkins Micawber. The paper at St. Louis, of which we have spoken, maintains the financial principles of Messrs. Micawber and Bigler, but without their entertaining ability. On the other hand, we observe that the committee on finance and the executive of the late Commercial Convention in Boston—a committee composed of twenty-one Western and ten Eastern members—reported a resolution emphatically against any form of repudiation. The Convention passed it unanimously, and when the President, Mr. Rex of St. Louis, announced the result, the whole Convention rose and cheered. The debt undoubtedly, as an extremely sagacious critic suggests, will not be paid by cheers for the national honor. But it will certainly not be paid if that is not the national feeling.

The Committee of Finance also of the Chicago Common Council have recently made an admirable report to that body upon certain resolutions declaring that the contraction of the currency be stopped, and that the present volume of currency be increased to the amount already withdrawn by the Secretary of the Treasury. As, however, the contraction has been stopped, the Committee devote their Report entirely to the second resolution pointing inflation. In a very clear and conclusive manner the Report refutes some of the popular fallacies in regard to the financial question. Thus to attribute the stagnation of commerce, as is so frequently done, to a scarcity of the currency, is a great mistake. It is the decrease of consumption or demand which occasions depreciation of commodities. Trade is more protracted in the Eastern cities than at the West, while money has gone begging in New York at four and five per cent. per annum. This truth, to which the Chicago Committee refers, is still more remarkable in Europe. Mr. GOSCHEN, member of Parliament for London, and one of the ablest of its financiers, has lately called attention in the Edinburgh Review to the fact that money in England is at two per cent. per annum, and but little higher upon the Continent. Sixty millions sterling are stored in the banks of England and France, yet commercial enterprise stagnates, factories are closed, trade is from hand to mouth, and there is no credit. Why, then, should we assume as the cause of stagnation in our business that which does not exist where the stagnation is greater?

Moreover, contraction having been stopped, the volume of the currency is fixed at seven hundred millions of dollars. This is twice what it was before the war. During the war, of course, the necessity of mobilizing a part of the capital of the country required an extraordinary volume of currency. But now that upon a legitimate peace-level, does it require in 1868 more than double the amount of currency that was sufficient in 1860? The friends of an increase of the currency forget that greenbacks are not money—they are only certificates of indebtedness, at least so long as it is intended to redeem them some time. Hence, to demand an increase of the currency is really to demand an increase of the national debt. Besides, every issue of "legal tender" paper is a forced loan, which is justified by the dire extremity of a nation fighting for its life. But to issue millions of them now when no extreme necessity can be pleaded, is to announce that the nation does not know or care whether it can ever redeem its promises.

The proposition that the Forty-Twenties ought to be "redeemed" in paper as fast as paper may be required for a circulating medium is characterized by the Chicago Committee as a proposition forcibly to convert a long-term bearing loan, secured by the public faith, into a compulsory non-interest-bearing loan, with very little promise of its redemption. The common understanding of civilized nations, of hundreds of thousands of our own farmers, tradesmen, laborers, widows, and orphans who invested in these bonds, made the Forty-Twenties payable in coin. The borrower may wriggle out of this understanding, and escape the law if there be no court before which to arraign him, but he can not escape the just judgment of dishonesty. If the Western States should be supposed to be more favorable to repudiation because they are more in debt, and the Eastern States of foreign capital to develop their resources, and are, therefore, debtor States rather than creditor States, it should, on the other hand, be remembered that we do not expect to be trusted with that capital if they show a disposition to pettifog and dispute and sophisticate upon the simple and honest payment of the national debt. And Chicago as the chief Western city should be especially careful of its own honor, lest desirous to escape the fatal fulfilment of its promises she involved in the scheme of repudiation.

In the bold and vigorous statement of these cardinal truths the Chicago Committee have done the best service which could have been certainly helped to remove the stigma from the West of favoring repudiation. The effect of so terrible a reproach must be fatal to any political—it would be national. It would be the disaster in which we should all fall down.

THE PRESIDENT'S TRIAL.

The impeachment trial opened with great dignity and tranquility. The President, by his counsel, asked for a delay of ten days in his answer; which request, after due deliberation, was declined, and the 23d of March was appointed as the day upon which he must answer. At this answer the Managers of the House make a replication, and the Senate resolved that unless otherwise ordered, for cause shown, the trial should at once proceed. Thus no delay can be no reason for such delay as the President requested. Mr. NELSON, one of the President's counsel, urged that the great claim of judicial proceedings in impeachment is their moderation is that they hasten slowly. But Mr. NELSON surely does not forget that the law's delay is one of the most accurate descriptions of legal processes. The circumstances of this trial demand as much promptness as is consistent with deliberate justice, and there is no variety of charge which DANTON could not overwhelm.

The spectacle of the trial, in itself so simple, is imposing from the considerations which attend it. That the original chief of one of the great nations can be removed by legal process absolutely and peremptorily from his position, is a truth which seems to us a matter of course. Because, when Louis XVI. was put upon his oar training had not prepared us for any thing but the peaceful rule of law. But to other nations so great a change would seem to be the necessary signal of vast civil commotions. One great reason, indeed, for the calmness of the public mind is undoubtedly that the President has no political party behind him. He is impeached and tried by the party that elected him, and the Democratic party merely attacks the Impeachment as it would any other grave measure upon any grave public question which the Republican party might adopt. There is no partisan sympathy for the President. The Democrats who denounce the Republicans are very careful to say that they are no friends of the President; and many of them, indeed, most feel that if a man who so disgraces the highest office in the land can be properly and justly removed, it is not a misfortune.

If, however, the President had been elected by the Democratic party, it is impossible to say whether the same tranquility would have prevailed. A party which, in half the country, conducted its campaign of 1860 by a threat of civil commotion if it were defeated, and in the other half tolerated the threat without protest and palliated and half justified it; whose chief leaders actually rose in rebellion because they were outvoted; a party whose orators are very fond of speaking of "the physical force" upon their side, and whose force and constant cry is of hostility to the poorer and most friendless class of the population, is not a party of which tranquil submission to the law is to be expected as of course. And the perpetuity of a peaceful acquiescence in the Constitutional methods of relief from political difficulties were intrusted to the Democratic party, we should not feel quite so much at ease as we do of the regular recurrence of seed-time and harvest.

It is fair to presume, however, under the circumstances, that the removal of the President should such be the judgment, will be accomplished without trouble. If the Managers shall decide to press the article offered by General BUTLER, the trial must take a wide range, and must last for a long time. If, however, they confine themselves to the immediate question of law involved, the proceedings must not occupy many days. Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS says, indeed, that that occasion is not sufficient, but the country seldom agrees with Mr. STEVENS in anything except it honors his indomitable persistence in the course he sincerely adopts. The trial of the President will undoubtedly furnish another illustration of the practical value of our political system.

AT THE FRONT.

The extracts which we lately published from the Montgomery Daily Mail and other papers show the spirit now prevailing among the late rebels at the South. The denunciation and persecution of Union men are as bitter as those of anti-slavery men before the war, and nothing but the presence of the military authority prevents the open and violent assertion of those who are guilty of devotion to the Union and fidelity to the principles of the Government. The Tuscaloosa Monitor of the 12th of February publishes "A List of Traitors," who have plunged headlong down into the loathsome abyss of INFAMY!!!" After printing the names, it adds:

"The above so-called white men, we are assured, employed Yankee spies to hunt and kill Col. ROBERT C. Boyd, it will be remembered, attended the grand Constitutional Union meeting held in this place on the 9th inst., and made a long, loud Conservative speech across here, and was on his way home from this city to take the Committee to report. It is understood he had in his pocket a list of the head-quarters of one of the Loyal Leagues in this county. He was received by the Yankee Committee with the information that he was a returned prodigal or converted Saul. Like the miserable tool and dupe of Yankee tyranny that acted it, he has proven himself to be a traitor and a hypocrite! Of course we speak in the highest terms of Col. Boyd's private Constitutional. If he has any denial to make, our columns are at his service. Publication of said denial, and if he can prove that he did not vote for said Constitution we will apologize. The Reporter will announce current condemnation.

"Some of the others we know, some we do not know, and all we never wish to know save to shun their filthy dens. Let the honest men cut them dead, from trade, from recognition, from humanity! Vice and crime thus crushed, in its impiniency, or we will never be able to separate it from Virtue. Let every man prove himself a MAN. 'Tread not unto us, lest we handle not.' Every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down. By their fruits ye shall know them."

There are not enough sons men in Tuscaloosa to support them; and if all the poor men will avoid them, socially and politically, they will have to seek their congenial intimates, till they finally reach a battledinal hell!"

Subsequently the same paper contained the following communication from a "Conservative," directed against a peaceful Union citizen of the town of Tuscaloosa, years old:

"HERE'S YOUR GYASTICUTE.

"MR. EDITOR,—You have for some time been blowing about your 'Conservatism,' and now I desire to show the clean public my 'Great washed Radical.' This animal is a native of Tuscaloosa, and is about years old. He was born in the University Bath-House, and growing daily to the University Campus, and there wallowing in the mire of dissent, and nothing is to every principle of decency and honor, and nothing is left except the hide and bones. The hide is now about five feet, and the bones in a blessing to him, as are 'treensigns,' which keeps his neck so soon when he is hung. He is supposed to be the result of a blessed mixture of Yankee and Scum the fact of his keeping a bookstore. He is perverting, principally, for not buying books—but for having very large feet. I think if you deny to advise all your friends to keep away from your duty to advise all your friends to keep away from your store, that you will him keep a nigger book-store, as the African scent seems so odorous to his proboscis.

"YANK, Anti-Radical'y. BOOBERSAW."

These extracts show the state of feeling not among a few persons, but, as every one familiar with the facts knows, among the mass of men who are called "conservatives" by themselves, and "the people of the South" by Democratic newspapers and orators at the North. Contrast with this fierce fury the calm and manly temper of the person assailed, who, after alluding to his age, says:

"I voted for the adoption of the Constitution, believing that the best interests of the country would be promoted thereby, and would do it again a thousand times over.

"The cry about negro supremacy and social equality is all fudge. Social equality regulates itself; and as for negro supremacy, thirty millions of white people (and there will soon be fifty millions in the U. S.) can never be controlled by four millions of negroes.

"I do assure my democratic fellow-citizens that the course they are pursuing, and I doubt not honestly, will bring disastrous results to the property of the country. The Republican party will control the Government during this generation. They will carry every State in the approaching Presidential election except Kentucky, Maryland, and Delaware.

"In 1865 I warned our people, as hundreds can testify who heard me, that the dissolution of this Union and the abolition of slavery were synonymous terms; that it was only a question of time. I was sneered at then, as I am now. I hope my fellow-citizens will award to me the same privileges, as a freeman, that they claim for themselves."

It is satisfactory to know that so long as the United States keep the peace in Tuscaloosa the man who writes in this strain to the newspapers will not be hung at his own hemp-door by an "anti - Radical" Vigilance Committee. But should the "Conservative" policy be adopted, and the power in the State of Alabama be committed exclusively to the hands of "Boomerang," and the sympathizers with the Tuscaloosa Monitor, and the Montgomery Mail, and the Mobile Tribune, how long would such letters be written to the papers, and how long would their authors and the loyal voters be tolerated? If the people of the United States abandon their faithful stout-hearted citizens in Alabama and elsewhere, who are now "at the front" of the great political contest, by refusing to sustain the general policy of Congress, those fellow-citizens may well ask whether it had not been better for them to secure protection by helping the rebellion.

"AMERICA AND THE EAST."

General JAMES L. KIERNAN, United States Consul to China, will lecture on "America and the East, particularly China and Japan—our present and future relations," at Irving Hall, this evening, March 27. General KIERNAN has traveled extensively in the East, is an accurate and practical observer, and will give his hearers valuable and interesting information on a question of growing importance to the commerce of America.

THE IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

The Senate on March 6 finished the long discussion on the right of the President pro tem. to act as a member of the Court by the withdrawal of the objections of Mr. HENDRICKS that that officer was duly sworn in. On the same day the Sergeant-at-Arms was ordered to serve the summons of the Court on the President, it being made returnable on March 13, to which time the Senate as a Court adjourned.

The Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, Mr. GEORGE T. BROWN, waited on President JOHNSON at the White House on the afternoon of March 7, and was at once admitted to the room of that official. Mr. JOHNSON received him standing at his table, attended only by his private Secretary, Colonel W. G. MOORE. The ceremony was very brief. Mr. BROWN announced his business in a few words, and handed President JOHNSON the writ, which after returning it said he "would attend to the matter." Our engraving on the front page is an accurate representation of this interesting scene.

On March 13 the Court reassembled, and the Managers on the part of the House and the counsel for the President, consisting of Messrs. HENRY STANBERY, who resigned his position as Attorney-General of the United States to do this, and Messrs. BENJAMIN R. CURTIS, J. L. BLACK, WILLIAM M. EVARTS, and THOMAS A. R. NELSON, at once took their places for the trial. The President through his counsel entered a plea asking for forty days to prepare his defence, and the counsel on the other side asked the same. It was, however, denied; ten days were deemed sufficient for preparation, and the trial was set down for March 23.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

NEWS ITEMS.

The New Hampshire gubernatorial election took place on March 10, and resulted in favor of the Republican ticket by a majority of 5000.

The Democratic State Convention of New York assembled at Albany on March 11, and adopted a declaration of principles. The Convention also recommended Mr. Seymour and Vice-President.

The Democratic Convention Convention adjourned on March 11, having finished its labors by adopting a platform as follows:

Governor Baker, of Louisiana, an appointee of General SICKLES, has been arrested and held to bail on a charge of perjury in taking the oath of office.

The Republican Convention of Pennsylvania met at Philadelphia on March 11, and decided unanimously to recommend GRANT as the candidate for President.

The Massachusetts Republican State Convention met on March 12, and recommended General GRANT for President, and as the candidate for President for Vice-President.

The South Carolina Republican State Convention met in Charleston on March 12, and nominated a colored man named Richardson for Secretary of State. Half the delegates elected to attend the National Convention are also colored persons.

Major-General Thomas, commanding in Tennessee, has issued an order declaring that the rights of the rebels of that State were organizing for the purpose of resisting the execution of State laws. General GRANT telegraphed a reply directing General Thomas to take such measures as he may think proper, and call for all the troops he may want.

DEATH OF DANIEL LORD.

DANIEL LORD, one of the most distinguished members of the New York bar, died on March 4, aged seventy-three years. He had been for half a century a member of the legal profession, and for forty years of that time among the most prominent of American advocates. He was more particularly acquainted with commercial and insurance law, and numbers of the great suits of this character in which he was engaged are now famous as our precedents, and the arguments advanced in them by Mr. LORD and others are considered by the legal authorities as sound, indisputable law. For many years Mr. LORD was the attorney of JOHN JACOB ASTOR and the ASTOR family generally. The former made him one of the executors of his vast estate, and also one of the trustees of the Astor Library. Mr. LORD was held in the highest regard by the profession generally, and in the various courts of the city proper action of respect for his memory was taken, and eulogies of the deceased were made.

RUNNING THE FIRE-GUARD.

We illustrate on this page a peculiarity of Western farming which will be new to most of our readers. To fully comprehend the sketch it must be remembered, first, that wood is very scarce and valuable on the prairies, and also that the fires which sweep for miles across the plains are very destructive. As a general thing, the dry season of the West is in the fall and early winter —another peculiarity of that peculiar country—and the fires naturally prevail mostly about that time. To guard the fences on his farm from these fires the farmer plows up several furrows parallel to each fence on the uncultivated or prairie side, from which the fire which consumes the prairie-grass is to be expected. This breaks the "continuity of the fire-current," as one old farmer expressed it to our artist, and the fire is brought to a stop in that direction. After harvest the farmer is often busy for days in running these guards in anticipation of fires, and when one by accident or procrastination loses his fences he considers himself most unfortunate indeed.

It is when the fire comes unexpectedly, before the crops are in and the fences guarded, or, as sometimes happens, when the fire-fiend comes from the wrong direction, against which no preparation has been made, that the scene depicted in the sketch occurs. It is not true—as has been sometimes stated, and as was generally believed years ago, when we supposed the great West was a great sandy desert—that prairie-fires move with lightning rapidity. They move fast enough, it is true, but often the farmer who sees the fires in the distance is enabled to hastily run a fire-guard on the unguarded side of his fences in time to save his property; but it is a work requiring a quick and steady hand, and is not unattended with danger.

THE MEXICAN RAILROAD.

We have heretofore given considerable space to accounts and illustrations of the Mount Cenis, Union Pacific, Central Pacific, and other remarkable railroad enterprises which have served to display the engineering skill of the age. Another road only less remarkable in this respect is that which is now building between Vera Cruz and Mexico City, and which crosses the Sierra Madre Mountains through the gorge or Pass of the Mule (Paso de la Mula), near the peak Las Cumbres. This mountain peak is 2500 feet high, and is described by our artist as one solid wall of granite. The work of grading through the pass in order to form a secure and substantial rond-bed required great skill, and was found to be very expensive. The mountain-sides are very steep, and numerous small brooks rush down them into the gorge. In order to protect the road-bed from these torrents it was found necessary to construct works of solid masonry which bind the grade to the sides of the granite rock. The ascent of the gorge is made by very heavy gradients and numerous sharp curves; and altogether this road is one of the most difficult now building, and will be quoted as among the greatest triumphs of engineering skill.

THE MOONSTONE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," etc.

Printed from the Author's Manuscript.

RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.

I WALKED to the window to compose myself. The rain had given over; and, who should I see in the court-yard but Mr. Begbie, the gardener, waiting outside to continue the dog-rose controversy with Sergeant Cuff.

"My compliments to the Sairgent," said Mr. Begbie, the moment he set eyes on me. "If he's minded to walk to the station I'm agreeable to go with him."

"What!" cries the Sergeant, behind me, "are you not convinced yet?"

"The deil a bit I'm convinced!" answered Mr. Begbie.

"Then I'll walk to the station!" says the Sergeant.

"Then I'll meet you at the gate!" says Mr. Begbie.

I was angry enough, as you know—but how was any man's anger to hold out against such an interruption as this? Sergeant Cuff noticed the change in me, and encouraged it by a word in season. "Come! come!" he said, "why not treat my view of the case as her ladyship treats its? Why not say, the circumstances have fatally misled me?"

To take any thing as her ladyship took it was a privilege worth enjoying—even with the disadvantage of it's having been offered to me by Sergeant Cuff. I cooled slowly down to my customary level. I regarded any other opinion of Miss Rachel than my lady's opinion or mine with a lofty contempt. The only thing I could not do was to keep off the subject of the Moonstone! My own good sense ought to have warned me, I know, to let the matter rest—but, there! the virtues which distinguish the present generation were not invented in my time. Sergeant Cuff had hit me on the raw, and, though I did look down upon him with contempt, the tender place still tingled for all that. The end of it was that I perversely led him back to the subject of her ladyship's letter. "I am quite satisfied myself," I said. "But never mind that! Go on as if I was still open to conviction. You think Miss Rachel is not to be believed on her word; and you say we shall hear of the Moonstone again. Back your opinion, Sergeant," I concluded, in an airy way. "Back your opinion."

Instead of taking offense Sergeant Cuff seized my hand and shook it till my fingers ached again.

"I declare to Heaven," says this strange officer, solemnly, "I would take to domestic service to-morrow, Mr. Betteredge, if I had a chance of being employed along with You! To say you are as transparent as a child, Sir, is to pay the children a compliment which nine out of ten of them don't deserve. There! there! we won't begin to dispute again. You shall have it out of me on easier terms than that. I won't say a word more about her ladyship or about Miss Verinder—I'll only turn prophet, for once in a way, and for your sake. I have warned you already that you haven't done with the Moonstone yet. Very well. Now I'll tell you, at parting, of three things which will happen in the future, and which I believe, will force themselves on your attention, whether you like it or not."

"Go on!" I said, quite unabashed, and just as airy as ever.

"First," said the Sergeant, "you will hear something from the Yollands—when the postman delivers Rosanna's letter at Cobb's Hole on Monday next."

If he had thrown a bucket of cold water over me, I doubt if I could have felt it much more unpleasantly than I felt those words. Miss Rachel's assertion of her innocence had left Rosanna's conduct—the making the new night-gown, the hiding the smeared night-gown, and all the rest of it—entirely without explanation. And this had never occurred to me till Sergeant Cuff forced it on my mind all in a moment!

"In the second place," proceeded the Sergeant, "you will hear of the three Indians again. You will hear of them in the neighborhood, if Miss Rachel remains in the neighborhood. You will hear of them in London, if Miss Rachel goes to London."

Having lost all interest in the three jugglers, and having thoroughly convinced myself of my young lady's innocence, I took this second prophecy easily enough. "So much for two of the three things that are going to happen," I said. "Now for the third!"

"Third, and last," said Sergeant Cuff, "you will, sooner or later, hear something of that mongrel-gender in London, whom I twice took the liberty of mentioning already. Give me your pocket-book, and I'll make a note for you of his name and address—so that there may be no mistake about it if the thing really happens."

He wrote accordingly on a blank leaf: "Mr. Septimus Luker, Middlesex Place, Lambeth, London."

"There," he said, pointing to the address, "are the last words, on the subject of the Moonstone, which I shall trouble you with for the present. Time will show whether I am right or wrong. In the mean while, Sir, I carry away with me a sincere personal liking for you, which I think does honor to both of us. If we don't meet again before my professional retirement takes place, I hope you will come and see me in a little house near London, which I have got my eye on. There will be grass and a Mr. Betteredge, I promise you, in my garden. And as for the white moss-rose—"

"The plant a bit yet, he'll get the white moss-rose to grow, unless ye bud him on the dogue-rose first," cried a voice at the window.

We both turned round. There was the everlasting Mr. Begbie, too eager for the controversy to wait any longer at the gate. The Sergeant swung my hand, and darted out into the court-yard, better still on his side. "Ask him about the moss-rose, when he comes back, and see if I have left him a leg to stand on!" cried the great Cuff, hailing me through the window in his own cantankerous manner. My interest in entertaining them again as I had moderated them once already, "in the matter of the moss-rose then" was a great deal to be said for it. I might as well (as the Irish say) have whistled jigs to a mile-stone. Away they went together, fighting the battle of the roses without once giving quarter on either side. The last I saw of them Mr. Begbie was shaking his obstinate head, and Sergeant Cuff had his leg as much as like a prisoner in charge. Ah, well! well! I own I couldn't help liking the Sergeant—though I hated him all the time.

Explain that state of mind if you can. You will soon be rid now of me and my contradictions. When I have recorded Mr. Franklin's departure, the history of the Saturday's events will be finished at last. And when I have next described certain strange things that happened in the course of the new week, I shall have done my part of the Story, and shall hand over the pen to the person who is appointed to follow my lead. If you are as tired of reading this narrative as I am of writing it—Lord, how we shall enjoy ourselves on both sides a few pages further on!

CHAPTER XXII.

I HAD kept the pony-chaise ready, in case Mr. Franklin persisted in leaving us by the train that night. The appearance of the luggage, followed down stairs by Mr. Franklin himself, informed me plainly enough that he had held firm to a resolution, for once in his life.

"So you have really made up your mind, Sir?" I said, as we met in the hall. "Why not wait a day or two longer, and give Miss Rachel another chance?"

The foreign varnish appeared to have all worn off Mr. Franklin, now that the time had come to say good-by. Instead of replying to me in words, he put the letter which her ladyship had addressed to him into my hand. The greater part of it said over again what had been said already in the other communication received by me. But there was a bit about Miss Rachel added at the end which will account for the steadiness of Mr. Franklin's determination, if it accounts for nothing else.

"You will wonder, I dare say" (her ladyship wrote), "at my allowing my own daughter to keep me perfectly in the dark. A Diamond worth twenty thousand pounds has been lost—and I am left to infer that the mystery of its disappearance is no mystery to Rachel, and that some incomprehensible obligation of silence has been laid on her, by some person or persons utterly unknown to me, with some object in view at which I can not even guess. Is it conceivable that I should allow myself to be trifled with in this way? It is quite conceivable, in Rachel's present state. She is in a condition of nervous agitation pitiable to see. I dare not approach the subject of the Moonstone again until time has done something to quiet her. To help this end I have not hesitated to dismiss the police-officer. The mystery which baffles us baffles him too. This is not a matter in which any stranger can help us. He adds to what I have to suffer; and he maddens Rachel if she only hears his name.

"My plans for the future are as well settled as they can be. My present idea is to take Rachel to London—partly to relieve her mind by a complete change, partly to try what may be done by consulting the best medical advice. Can I ask you to meet us in town? My dear Franklin, you, in your way, must imitate my patience, and wait, as I do, for a fitter time. The valuable assistance which you rendered to the inquiry after the lost jewel is still an unpardoned offense, in the present dreadful state of Rachel's mind. Moving blindfold in this matter you have added to the burden of anxiety which she has had to bear, by innocently threatening her secret with discovery, through your executions. It is impossible for me to excuse the perversity which holds you responsible for consequences which neither you nor I could imagine or foresee. She is not to be reasoned with—she can only be pitied. I am grieved to have to say it, but, for the present, you and Rachel are better apart. The only advice I can offer you is, to give her time."

I handed the letter back, sincerely sorry for Mr. Franklin, for I knew how fond he was of my young lady: and I saw that her mother's account of her had cut him to the heart. "You know the proverb, Sir," was all I said to him. "When things are at the worst, they're sure to mend. Things can be much worse, Mr. Franklin than they are now."

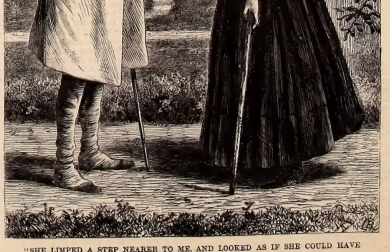
Mr. Franklin folded up his aunt's letter, without appearing to be much comforted by the remark which I had ventured on addressing to him.

"When I came here from London with that horrible Diamond," he said, "I don't believe there was a happier household in England than this. Look at the household now! Scattered, disunited—the very air of the place poisoned with mystery and suspicion! Do you remember that morning at the Shivering Sand, when we talked about my uncle Herncastle, and his birthday gift? The Moonstone has served the Colonel's vengeance, Betteredge, by means which the Colonel himself never dreamed of!"

With that he shook me by the hand, and went out to the pony-chaise.

I followed him down the steps. It was very miserable to see him leaving the old place, where he had spent the happiest years of his life in this way. Penelope (sadly upset by all that had happened in the house) came round crying, to bid him good-by. Mr. Franklin kissed her. I waved my hand as much as to say, "You're heartily welcome, Sir." Some of the other female servants appeared, peeping after him round the corner. He was one of those men whom the women all like. At the last moment I stopped the pony-chaise and begged as a favor that he would let us hear from him by letter. He didn't seem to heed what I said—he was looking round from one thing to another, taking a sort of farewell of the old house and grounds. "Tell us where you are going to, Sir!" I said, holding on by the chaise, and trying to get at his future plans in that way. Mr. Franklin pulled his hat down suddenly over his eyes. "Going?" says he, echoing the word after me. "I am going to the devil!" The pony started at the word as if he felt a Christian horror of it. "God bless you, Sir, go where you may!" was all I had time to say before he was out of sight and hearing. A sweet and pleasant gentleman! With all his faults and follies, a sweet and pleasant gentleman! He left a sad gap behind him when he left my lady's house.

It was dull and dreary enough when the long summer evening closed in on that Saturday night.



I kept my spirits from sinking by stirking fast to my pipe and my Robinson Crusoe. The women (excepting Penelope) beguiled the time by talking of Rosanna's suicide. They were all obstinately of opinion that the poor girl had stolen the Moonstone, and that she had destroyed herself in terror of being found out. My daughter, of course, privately held fast to what she had said all along. Her notion of the motive which was really at the bottom of the suicide failed, oddly enough, just where my young lady's assertion of her innocence failed also. I left Rosanna's sweet journey to Frizinghall, and Rosanna's proceedings in the matter of the night-gown, entirely unaccounted for. There was no use in pointing this out to Penelope; the objection made about as much impression on her as a shower of rain on a water-proof coat. The truth is, my daughter inherits my superiority to reason —and, in respect to that accomplishment, has got a long way ahead of her own father.

On the next day (Sunday), the close carriage, which had been kept at Mr. Ablewhite's, came back to us empty. The coachman brought a message for me, and written instructions for my lady's own maid and for Penelope.

The message informed me that my mistress had determined to take Miss Rachel to her house in London on the Monday. The written instructions informed the two maids of the clothing that was wanted, and directed them to meet their mistress in town at a given hour. Each of the other servants were to follow. My lady had found Miss Rachel so unwilling to return to the house, after what had happened in it, that she had decided on going to London direct from Frizinghall. I was to remain in the country, until further orders, to look after things indoors and out. The servants left with me were to be put on board wages.

Being reminded by all this of what Mr. Franklin had said about our being a scattered and disunited household, my mind was led naturally to Mr. Franklin himself. The more I thought of him the more uneasy I felt about his future proceedings. It ended in my writing, by the Sunday's post, to his father's valet, Mr. Jeffco (whom I had known in former years), to beg he would let me know what Mr. Franklin had settled to do on arriving in London.

The Sunday evening was, if possible, duller even than the Saturday evening. We ended the day of rest as hundreds of thousands of people and it regularly, once a week, in these islands—that is to say, we all anticipated bedtime, and fell asleep in our chairs.

"SHE LIMPED A STEP NEARER TO ME, AND LOOKED AS IF SHE COULD HAVE EATEN ME ALIVE."

How the Monday affected the rest of the household I don't know. The Monday gave me a good shake up. The first of Sergeant Cuff's prophecies of what was to happen—namely, that I should hear from the Yollands—came true on that day.

I had seen Penelope and my lady's maid off in the railway with the luggage for London, and was pottering about the grounds when I heard my name called. Turning round I found myself face to face with the fisherman's daughter, Limping Lucy. Eating her inane foot and her inane smile by way of a breakfast. A dark, keen, clever face, and a nice clear voice, and a beautiful brown head of hair counted among her merits. A cruelly deformed in the list of her misfortunes. And a temper reckoned high in the sum total of her defects.

"Well, my dear," I said, "what do you want with me?"

"Where's the man you call Franklin Blake?" says the girl, fixing me with a fierce look as she rested herself on her crutch.

"That's not a respectful way to speak of a gentleman," I answered. "If you wish to inquire for my lady's nephew, you will please mention him as Mr. Franklin Blake."

She limped a few steps nearer to me, and looked as if she could have eaten me alive. "Mr. Franklin Blake!" she repeated after me. "I'll call dever Franklin Blake when he is a fitter name for him."

My practice with the late Mr. Betteredge came in handy here. Whenever a woman tries to put you out of temper turn the tables, and put her out of temper instead. They are generally prepared for every other you can make by your own defense but that. One word does as well as a hundred; and one word did it with Limping Lucy. I looked her pleasantly in the face; and I said—"Pooh!"

The girl's temper flamed out directly. She poised herself on her sound foot, and she took her crutch and beat it furiously three times on the ground. "He is a murderer! he's a murderer! he's a murderer! He has been the death of Rosanna Spearman!" She screamed that answer out at the top of her voice. One or two of the people at work in the grounds near us looked up—saw it was Limping Lucy—knew what to expect from that quarter—and looked up again.

"He has been the death of Rosanna Spearman?" I repeated. "What makes you say that, Lucy?"

"What do you care? What does any man care? Oh! if she had only thought of the men as I think of them, she would have been living now!"

"She always thought kindly of me, poor soul," I said; "and, to the best of my ability, I always tried to set her right."

I spoke those words in as comforting a manner as I could. The truth is, I hadn't the heart to irritate the girl by slamming the door on her myself. I had only noticed her temper at first. I noticed her wretchedness now—and wretchedness is not uncommonly insolent, you will find, in humble life. My answer melted Limping Lucy. She bent her head down, and laid it on the top of her crutch.

"I loved her," the girl said softly. "She had loved a young man. Her honeysuckle—the apple had ill-treated her and led her wrong—and he hadn't spoiled her sweet temper. She was an angel. And one night love was heavy with her, and had a plan for our going to London together like sisters, and living by our needles. That man came here, and spoke to her. He bewitched her. Don't tell me he didn't mean it, and didn't know it. He ought to have known it. He ought to have taken pity on her. I can't live without him—and, oh, Lucy, he never even looks at me." That's what she said. Cruel, cruel, cruel!' I said, 'Do you call it worth fretting for in this life?' And she said, 'There are men worth dying for, Lucy, and he is one of them.' I had saved up a little money. I had settled things with father and mother. I meant to take her away from the mortification she was suffering here. We should have had a living in London, and have lived together like sisters. She had a good education, Sir, as you know; and she wrote a good hand. She was quick at her needle. I was a good education, and I write a good hand. I am not as quick at the needle as she was—but I could have done. We might have got our living easily. And, oh! what happens this morning? what happens this morning? Her letter came, and tells me she has done with the burden of her life. Her letter comes, and bids me good-by forever. Where is she? Gone, the girl, lifting her head from the crutch, and flaming out again through her tears. "Where's this gentleman that I mustn't speak of, with respect? Is, Mr. Betteredge, the day is yet far off when the poor will rise against the rich. I pray Heaven they may begin with him. I pray Heaven they may begin with him."

Here was another of your sensible young Christians, and here was the usual break-down, consequent on that same average Christianity being pushed one step further. The person himself (though I own this is saying a great deal) could hardly have lectured the girl in the state she was in now. All I ventured to do was to keep her to the point—in the hope of something turning up which might be worth hearing.

"What do you want with Mr. Franklin Blake?" I asked.

"I want to see him."

"For any thing particular?"

"I have got a letter to give him."

"From Rosanna Spearman?"

"Yes."

"Sent to you in your own letter?"

"Yes."

Was the darkness going to lift? Were all the discoveries that I was dying to make, coming and offering themselves to me of their own accord? I was obliged to wait a moment. Sergeant Cuff had left his infection behind him. Certain signs and tokens, personal to myself, warned me that the detective-fever was beginning to set in again.

"You can't see Mr. Franklin," I said.

"I must, and will, see him."

"He went to London last night."

Limping Lucy looked me hard in the face, and saw that I was speaking the truth. Without a word more she turned about on her crutch instantly, and Cobb's Hole.

"Stop!" I said. "I expect news of Mr. Franklin Blake to-morrow. Give me your letter and I'll send it on to him by the post."

Limping Lucy steadied herself on her crutch and looked back at me over her shoulder.

"I am to give it from my hands into his hands," she said. "And I am to give it to him in no other way."

"Shall I write and tell him what you have said?"

"Tell him I hate him. And you will tell him the truth."

"Yes, yes. But about the letter—?"

"If he wants the letter, he must come back here and get it from Me."

With those words she limped off on the way to Cobb's Hole. The detective-fever burned up all my dignity on the spot. I followed her and tried to make her talk. All in vain. It was my misfortune to be a man—and Limping Lucy enjoyed disappointing me. Later in the day I tried my luck with her mother. Local Mrs. Yolland could only cry and recommend a drop of comfort out of the Dutch bottle. I found the fisherman at home. He said it was "a bad job," and went on mending his net. Neither father nor mother knew more than I knew. The one motive that I had for not writing to Mr. Franklin Blake, which might come with the morning, of writing to Mr. Franklin Blake.

I leave you to imagine how I watched for the postman on Tuesday morning. He brought me two letters. One, from Penelope (which I had hardly patience enough to read), informing me that my lady and Miss Rachel were safely established in London. The other, from Mr. Jeffco, informed me that his master's son had left England already.

On reaching the metropolis Mr. Franklin Blake it appeared, had gone to his father's residence. He arrived at an awkward time. Mr. Blake, the elder, was up to his eyes in the business of the Lord knows what, and was amusing himself at home that night with the favorite parliamentary plaything which they call "a private bill." As a matter of course, he showed Mr. Franklin into his father's study. "My dear Franklin! why do you surprise me in this way? Any thing wrong?" "Yes; something wrong with Rachel; I am dreadfully distressed about it." "Grieved to hear it. But I can't listen to you now." "When can you listen?" "My dear boy! I won't deceive you. I can listen at the end of the session, not a moment before. Good-night." "Thank you. Good-night."

Such was the conversation inside the study, as reported to me by Mr. Jeffco. The conversation outside the study was shorter still. "Jeffco, see what time the tidal train starts to-morrow morning." "At nine, Sir, A.M." "Have me called at five." "Going abroad, Sir?" "Going, Jeffco, wherever the railway chooses to take me." "Anybody with you, Sir?" "Yes; tell him at the end of the session."

The next morning Mr. Franklin had started for foreign parts. Mr. Jeffco (supposing that I was bound nobody (himself included) could presume to guess. We might hear of him next in Europe, Asia, Africa, or Australia. He knew not) were as equally divided as possible, in Mr. Jeffco's opinion, among the four quarters of the globe.

This news—by closing up all prospect of my bringing Limping Lucy and Mr. Franklin together—threw me strongly on the further progress of mine on the way to discovery. Penelope's belief that her fellow-servant had destroyed herself through unrequited love for Mr. Franklin Blake was confirmed—and that was all. Whether the letter which Rosanna had left to be given to him after her death was, or was not, a confession which Mr. Franklin had suspected her of trying to make to him in her lifetime, it was impossible to say. It might be a letter of advice, telling nothing but the secret of her unhappy love for a person beyond her reach. Or it might own the truth, and lead to the stirring proceedings in which Sergeant Cuff had detected other, from the time when the Moonstone was lost to the time when she rushed to her own destruction at the Shivering Sand. A sealed letter it had been placed in Limping Lucy's hands, and a sealed letter it remained to me and to every one about the girl, her own parents included. We all suspected her of having been in the dead woman's confidence; we all tried to make her speak: we all failed. Now one, and now another, of the Cobb's Hole—still looking at the belief that Rosanna had stolen the Diamond and had hidden it—peered and poked about the cottage, and the boat, and the fishing-net, and peered and poked in vain. The tide ebbed, and the tide flowed; the summer went on, and the autumn came. And the Quicksand, which hid her body, hid her secret too.

The news of Mr. Franklin's departure from England on the Sunday morning, and the news of my lady's arrival in London with Miss Rachel on the Monday afternoon, had reached us, as you are aware, by the Tuesday's post. The Wednesday came, and brought nothing. The Thursday produced a second budget of news from Penelope.

My girl's letter informed me that some great London doctor had been consulted about her young lady, and had earned a guinea by remarking that she had better be amused. Flowershows, operas, balls—there was a whole round of gayeties in prospect; and Miss Rachel, to her mother's astonishment, eagerly took to it all. Mr. Godfrey had called; evidently as sweet as ever on his cousin, in spite of the reception he had met with when he tried his luck on the occasion of the birthday. To Penelope's great regret, he had been most graciously received, and had added himself to the number of the list of Indies' Charities on the spot. My mistress was reported to be out of spirits, and to have held two long interviews with her lawyer. Certain speculations followed, referring to a poor relation of the family—one Miss Clack, whom I have mentioned in my account of the birthday dinner, as sitting next to Mr. Godfrey, and having a pretty taste in Champagne. Penelope was astonished that Miss Clack had not called yet. Surely she would not be long before she fastened herself on my lady as usual?—and so on, and so on, in the way women will go writing at each other, on, and off, paper. This would not have been worth mentioning but for one reason. I hear you are likely to meet with Miss Clack. In that case, don't believe what she says of me.

On Friday nothing happened—except that one of the dogs showed signs of a breaking-out behind the ears. I gave him a dose of sing of buckthorn, and put him on a diet of pot-liquor and vegetables till further orders. Excuse my mentioning this. It has slipped in somehow. I was in very low spirits on that day. The end of my offenses against your cultivated manners seems to be in my pocket-book, and identified it at once as the writing of Sergeant Cuff.

Looking through the paper eagerly enough, after this discovery, I found an ink-mark drawn round one of the police reports. Here it is at your service. Read it as I read it, and you will see the right of the Sergeant's polite attention in sending me the news of the day:

LAUNDRY.—Shortly before the closing of the court, Mr. Septimus Luker, a respectable dealer in ancient gems, carvings, intagli, etc., etc., applied to the sitting magistrate for advice in a case which appeared (as it had been announced, at intervals throughout the day, in the advertising columns) to require skilful treatment. Mr. Luker stated that he had been annoyed, at various times during the last few months, by certain strolling fellows who infest the streets. The persons complained of were three in number, and consisted of an organ-boy, by the police, they had returned again and again, and had successively brought with them a performer of dancing for charity. Warned off in the front, they had been discovered in the rear, at the back of the premises. Besides the annoyance complained of, Mr. Luker expressed his fear that some of these appearances might be a preliminary to robbery might be contemplated. His collection contained many unique gems, collected with much curiosity, of the highest value. He had only the day before been informed that a skilled workman in ivory carving from his employment (a native of India, as we understood) was in possession of stronged faculty; and he felt by no means sure that this man and the strolling fellows might not be conspiring, might not be acting in concert. It might be their object to collect a crowd, and to create confusion in the street, and, in the confusion thus caused, to obtain access to the house. In answer to questions put by the magistrate, Mr. Luker could not say that he had any evidence to produce of any attempt at robbery being in contemplation. He could not speak positively to the annoyance and interruption caused by the latter-named fellows on any single day. He could state remarked that, if the annoyance were repeated, the applicant would summon the strollers before that court, where they might easily be dealt with under the Act. As to the ivory-carving Indian's possession, Mr. Luker himself must take the best measures for their safe custody. As to the Indian's character and communication with the police, and to adopt such additional precautions as that gentleman might suggest. The applicant thanked his worship and withdrew."

One of the wise ancients is reported (I forget on what occasion) as having recommended his fellow-creatures to "look to the end." Looking to the end of these pages of mine, and wondering for what reason I should possibly trouble you to write it, I find my plain statement of facts coming to a conclusion, most appropriately, of its own self, at the point we are in, in this matter of the Moonstone, from one marvel to another; and here we end with the greatest marvel of all—the sudden appearance of Sergeant Cuff among the people of London at the time. You see, I put things at their worst, even when they tell dead against my own side. You see, moreover, and side with the Sergeant, on the evidence before you—if the only rational explanation you can see is, that Miss Rachel and Mr. Luker must have got together, and that the Moonstone must be now in pledge in the pawnbroker's hands. Your own I can't blame you for arriving at that conclusion. In the dark I have brought you thus far. In the dark I can compelled to leave you with my best respects.

Why compelled? it may be asked. Why not take the whole narrative from one story with me so far up into those regions of superior enlightment in which I sit myself?

In answer to this I can only state that I am acting under orders, and that those orders have been given to me (as I understand) in the interests of truth. I am forbidden to tell more in this narrative than I knew myself at the time. Or, to put it plainer, I am to keep strictly within the limits of my own experience, and am not to inform you of what other persons told me—for the very sufficient reason that you are to have the information from those other persons themselves at first hand. In this matter of the Moonstone the plan is not to present reports, but to produce witnesses. I picture to myself a member of the family reading these pages fifty years hence. Lord! what a compliment he will feel it, to be asked to take nothing on hearsay, and to be treated in all respects like a Judge on the Bench.

At this place, then, we part for the present, at least—after long journeying together, with a companionship finishing, I hope, on both sides. The devil's dance of the Indian Diamond has threaded its way to London; and to London you must go after it, leaving me at the country-house. Please to excuse the faults of this composition—my talking so much of myself, and being too familiar. I am afraid, with you. I mean no harm; and I drink most respectfully (having just done dinner) to your health and prosperity, with a standard of her ladyship's age. May you find in these leaves of my writing what Robinson Crusoe found in his Experience on the desert island—namely, "nothing to comfort yourselves from, and to set in the Description of Good and Evil, on the Credit Side of the Account."—Farewell.

THE END OF THE FIRST PERIOD.

THREE MEETINGS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

On the happy meeting from over the sea,
Of friends who have longed and yet dearly loves me:
And we stand face to face, and for letters read
There are saddest words to be heard and said,
With a pathos between, sly, anxious, half strange,
As if asking, "Say now, is there aught of change?"
Till we both settle down as we used to do
Since I love my friend and my friend loves me.

On the blissful meeting of lovers true,
Against whom Fate has done all that fate could do;
And then dropped, conquered: while over those slain
Dead years of anguish, parting, and pain
Hope lifts her banner, gay, radiant, and fair,
Unstained, untorn, in the balmy air;
And the hearts of the future, joyous and bright,
Arches above them—God guards the right!

But oh for the meeting to come one day,
When the spirit slips out of this house of clay;
When the unbroken, with a pitying sign,
Shall softly cover the face of mine,
And I shall see, and I shall know:
But outward, onward, as spirits must go;
Out of the eye, without form I see:
God, and my lost, as they see me.

DAVID'S DOOR.

If young Bartis and his mother had considered the subject from more than one point of view they would have seen that they were preparing difficulties for themselves. The constant existing between them was daily ignored under circumstances which promised that at any time it might be denied. The woman was employed to keep the rooms of the Treasury Building in order, and her son was a clerk in one of the offices. Both of them had represented them as applicable to Mr. Abeel, who knew her husband when he was a bank-note engraver, that is, in the days of his prosperity. But he was now in the straight alley in life, when there was a prospect of long years before him.

In her extremity the wife consulted with the chief officer in the Treasury Department, and he could suggest nothing better than a housekeeping of the chief officer—a very responsible position, but offering certain advantages. Nobody could be found willing to take it for any money. The work was not laborious, and it would be liberally paid. And the circumstances were desperate. David was too young for any of any standing to the support of the family, and the engraver had not been able, though never a spendthrift, to lay up any thing before his day of darkness came. She considered the subject one afternoon, and the next appeared on the upper floor of the building, and went and dusted her own room to the lowest. She took the dollar home which she had earned, and continued to do this day after day, and year after year, until she was considered in her degree as essential to the welfare of the building as Mr. Abeel was to that of the Department. We hate the idea of charity, but David was thinking of his father's skill in the handling of tools his mother put a pen in his hand and taught him to write. By the time he was twelve years old Mr. Abeel gave him a desk in one of the offices, and paid him wages as he did other clerks.

Mrs. Bartis was a thoughtful mother, and she had considered all that was involved in this step. David, among the clerks, was to be a young gentleman among gentlemen. She made him see and feel this, and also that inside that building their relationship of mother and son had a dignity of Mr. Abeel there was not a man inside the Treasury Building who would not treat that lowly Bartis was the son of the woman who kept the house in order. And so it naturally followed that when Mr. Abeel died, one of the foremost thoughts in the mind of the mother and of the son was this, that there was no one about who could make the best of their relationship a matter of comment. The thought occasioned a sense of relief, and that the son felt it was because he had been made conscious of feeling it by his mother.

Not long after the death of Mr. Abeel David was transferred to another room, where the more responsible business of the Department was transacted. His salary was raised, and it now became his easy noble hope that he should soon be able to insist upon his mother's retiring from service. No prospect of labor could have disturbed him as did the shadow which he saw moving through the halls and behind the doors of the great gloomy building; his conscience was never void of offense as he developed into manhood. There was something to be hid, there was something to be owned; his pride was perpetually humiliated, his dignity constantly impugned, his aspiration rebuked, his honor brought into the dust by the lie which he seemed to himself to be living. True, he had not really disowned his mother, but this tacit agreement between them was, to his expanding sense of manhood, equivalent to living in a lie. Now, there is with every temptation a way of escape offered.

One hot afternoon in July the clerks in the room where David was employed were at work later than usual. Reports were to be made, items must be in readiness. By three o'clock the floor was generally cleared, and the room in the hands of the sub-janitress. But at half past three the work of the clerks was still going on. At four Mrs. Burtis knocked at the door and then gently pushed it open—there she stood with her brush and pail.

The young man who sat directly facing the door—it chanced to be David—looked up and shook his head; but she did not need the hint, for she saw what was going on, and immediately retired.

The clerk occupying the desk next to David had nearly completed his task, and feeling a little elated, perhaps, that he had outstripped his neighbors, broke out, "You ain't good-looking, and you can't come in!" and there was a general laugh; whereupon he used his blotter with a flourish, shut his book, cleared his desk, and took his departure. One by one the fellows went away. David had a longer task than others, and was always more painstaking, for he had an artist's eye to satisfy.

Young Stopp, his friend, lingered about till Burtis was ready to go, and then, arm in arm, they strolled out upon the pavement and down to the ferry-boat, Stopp proposing that they should hunt up a sea-breeze.

The breeze they found; and on shore intelligence not less stirring. A telegram awaited Stopp which informed him that his father was suddenly and dangerously ill. The summons took him away at midnight; riding every moment he would arrive at his parent's bedside in twenty-four hours. The excitement into which he was thrown by the telegram, the grief which rolled as a flood out of his young heart, furnished Burtis with matter for reflection as he walked away from the dépôt after the train had left.

Though Stopp had apparently forgotten that he was about to leave his place in the office vacant at a time when a clerk could with difficulty be spared, David did not forget in parting with him to say, "Smith and I will divide your work between us—so don't give that a thought," for he knew that such an assurance would be needed before his friend had accomplished half his journey.

The next morning David was up at an earlier hour than usual and off to the office. Earlier, too, came young Harkness. He entered the room hastily. He was a strong, pugnacious-looking fellow, who never considered more than one thing in his life, and that was himself. Of himself, that is of what concerned him, he was now thinking.

"Oh, Burtis, you here!" he said. "I don't believe if I started at daybreak for the office I could get here in advance of every body. Have you seen any thing of my sleeve-buttons? I took them off and laid them on my desk yesterday afternoon and must have left them. I noticed it when I got home, and came back, hot as it was. But the old woman had locked up by that time. Do you know where she keeps herself?"

"I don't know where she is just now," said Burtis, and his countenance bore witness to the amazement and displeasure he felt as he left his seat and went over to Harkness. "Have you looked in your desk?"

"There's nothing there, you see. I wouldn't have lost those buttons for fifty dollars. They cost that nearly, I reckon. They were given to me. Did you ever notice them?"

"No." But Harkness almost thought that David answered as if he were confused by the question.

"They had a diamond in the centre," said he. "I hadn't any business to take them off here, but I got so worked up by the heat I couldn't stand it."

"You may have put them somewhere about you. Have you looked in all your pockets?"

"Of course I have. First thing. Though I knew I laid them on the desk. No—somebody else can tell better than I can what's become of them."

"Ask every body. They'll turn up, I've no doubt," said Burtis; and then, recollecting what a day's work was before him, he went back to his seat.

"Of course, I shall ask every body," answered Harkness; "but I'd like to begin with the old woman first. They must be somewhere. She couldn't have brushed them up without seeing them; for they were too big for that."

"I never heard of any thing missing in this room before. You'll find them, no doubt."

The almost indifference with which Burtis said this, and the degree to which he was absorbed in his work the next moment, displeased the great, overgrown, selfish boy, who would never arrive at man's estate though he lived through the allotted term of a man's life; and he continued his investigations, as the clerks came in, in a manner that would have provoked a quarrel in some quarter, had not the young men all been so preoccupied with the fact that a "tremendous day's work" was before them, and that there was no time for talk.

Smith arrived, and sat down before his desk to perform his task, and at the same time endure a raging headache. When Burtis looked at him he saw that no assistance was to be asked of him, and resolved that he would himself make Stopp's place good. Mr. Wood, the head clerk, accepted his offer, and allowed David to do the work of two without a word of encouragement. Mr. Abeel never would have done this; but the contrast between the two merely suggested itself to David; he was too much preoccupied to dwell upon it. And it was not the work he had to do that so much absorbed him. He was thinking of the sub-janitress.

At half past three o'clock she came, as on the day before. And again, when she opened the door, her son looked up and shook his head; but at the same instant he looked at Harkness, whose eyes were upon him. As the woman was about to close the door Harkness sprang up.

"See here!" he shouted. "What's your name! Did you see any thing of a pair of sleeve-buttons yesterday, when you cleaned up?"

At this Mrs. Burtis stepped within the room.

"I did not," she answered, as distinctly and emphatically as ever a question was answered.

"That's odd. I should think you must have," said Harkness. "I left them on my desk, and nobody here knows any thing about them. It's deuced strange, to say the least."

The woman stood still a moment. She seemed not to understand quite the meaning of the words the young man had last spoken. She glanced involuntarily toward her son. He sat twisting his pen and looking down, not at his desk, but on the floor—the next moment without lifting his eyes he went on with his work. He had mastered his indignation. This was none of his business.

"I wish you would just look over your rubbish-heap and see if you haven't brushed them in by mistake," said Harkness. The words sounded more like a warning that the buttons must be forthcoming than a civil request.

"It's the first time, isn't it, gentlemen, that any thing was lost out of this room since I began to take care of it ten years ago? Can't somebody answer?"

"I can, mother," said a voice from the corner; but it was not David's voice. The assurance came from the oldest clerk in the room—and he spoke in his modest, quiet way—he was a poor young man, a good soul, doomed to be a clerk to his life's end—ah! there's many a more ignoble fate than that. "I'll answer for it. Nothing was ever lost here before that I've heard of."

"Thank you, Mr. White," said she. "I can look in the rubbish-box, Sir," turning to Harkness; "but it isn't likely, in a room kept as clean as this is, that I could brush up things like them and not know it."

Harkness nodded twice and looked around the room before he sat down. They all felt that he might as well have said, "I think so myself."

David was in the office working till dark. After all the other clerks had left his mother came up and saw him sitting there. "You can come in," said he; for she hesitated when she looked in, though she saw he was alone. Crossing the room she sat down on the chair before Stopp's desk and leaned on her hand, looking at David. "This is a bad job for me," she said.

"I'm sorry it happened to be Harkness," he answered. "There isn't another one of the clerks that would make such a row as he about a thing like that."

"But they are valuable—diamonds—he said."

"They couldn't have got into your dust-pan any way without your seeing them," said David, looking down.

"They couldn't—no, they couldn't possibly. I've looked the heap over, though. But I should have seen them at first. Why there wasn't rubbish enough to half fill my pail off this whole floor."

"He has such a tongue he will be likely to talk all over the building. It may make it uncomfortable for you."

David's eyes were still bent toward the floor.

"If I am going to have two or three hundred young men looking at me as if I was a thief, I might better leave the place and let somebody else take it."

David considered; then he looked at his mother. "I have been wishing you would give it up this long while," said he; "but I didn't like to say much till I was in the way of doing more for you than I can on my salary. If you should go now, fellows like Harkness would be likely to say that you left to get clear of trouble."

"You couldn't stand that, David, could you? Then I must stay."

There was a great deal more than resignation in these words and the voice that spoke them. Something in her son's face had moved her to speak them—something she was glad and proud to see. For it had come to pass that in her secret heart this mother mourned with bitterness over the thought that she inhabited another world from that of her son. The evenings at home did not balance the days abroad. The hour was at hand, she felt, when this long-dishonored tie of parentage would be proved a really broken link—a fact void of significance. And therefore the humiliation, the anger, and the grief of David, were in fact as balm to her.

"Why, yes," he said, "you must stay, mother. Don't fret. Something will happen for us."

When he began to think of her as a being to be defended, a woman to be respected, other thoughts followed which must have audience; and feelings were stirred which claimed honorable consideration.

A week passed, and the lost property was not recovered. Harkness made himself a nuisance with his searchings and his questionings. One afternoon he was coming out of a jeweler's shop as David passed by.

"If you'll step in here a minute," said he, "I'll show you a pair of buttons like mine, so if you see them any where you'll know them."

It was not strange that Harkness should address Burtis in this manner, for David was the friend of every body; and from the questions he had asked almost daily, Harkness was already thinking that probably no one in the office would have his eye more intent on search and discovery than he.

"There it is," he said. "You would be apt to know the pattern if you saw it again. So should I."

"True," said David, "and I'll be on the look-out."

The very next morning it was known throughout the office that Harkness had found his lost treasures. They were in his desk when he opened it. Great was his surprise, and not a little his embarrassment, when he made this discovery. But from the embarrassment he recovered speedily, for on a closer inspection of the buttons he said: "These are not mine. My initial is not on them." Then that fact circulated, and it was fortunate that the pressure of work was still upon all the clerks. But in the silence of the apartment a great deal of thinking was done. For the most part it was interrogatory. Every young man was questioning concerning his neighbors. Some of the clerks went so far as to take inventories of the characters of their companions, but it is safe to say that the drift of suspicion did not turn in young Burtis's direction.

But he sat in his place as if every eye were upon him. Suddenly a fire seemed kindled in his brain, and his heart grew cold. He wrote on at a rate that would have warranted the office in the dismissal of half a dozen hands had it been possible for mortal to continue at that pace. But by-and-by his heart began to warm and his brain to cool. His pen ceased to fly along the pages. "What am I?" he asked himself again and again; and the only answer that would come, and it seemed not to proceed from himself, was, "her son." "Say so, then," urged the voice. And then the fact began to make itself perceived that suspicion no longer rested on the sub-janitress, but was fastening on he knew not which one of his fellows. He laid down his pen, and looked around him. The clerks were intent on their business. He took up his pen again, that weapon which in his hands had been a weapon of offense, and dipped it in the ink once more. He might as well let things take their course. But no! at the same time that this temptation assailed him he said,

"Harkness."

His voice was not lifted to a high key, but there must have been something uncommon, even startling, in the tone, for every man in the room lifted his eyes, and the attention so far arrested was held.

"I put those buttons in your desk," David continued.

"What for?" asked Harkness, displeased in advance.

"To stop your talk. I don't know what has become of the ones you lost, but my mother was worrying the life out of her on account of your suspicions. I hope you will keep the buttons."

It would be pleasant to add that right on this speech, which electrified as well as amazed the hearers, and there was not a soul in the room that did not hear it, Stopp walked in. He did not. If he had—but he did not!

Harkness looked at David, and was more than a minute in taking his meaning, then his face became very red, and he looked angry and foolish.

"Is the janitress your mother?" he asked, and that was the very question that might have been expected of him. He saw that David had acknowledged her in a sort of desperation, as if compelled to do it; and he sought to hide his own confusion in another's. But David was now perfectly master of himself.

"Yes," he said. "And I'm ashamed to think that you didn't know it before, all of you," he added, looking around.

Harkness said no more, and the clerks all returned to their work. At noon there was of course not a little talk among them. David did not leave the room as he had felt tempted to do. He went to Harkness, and they discussed the business over again, and he actually compelled Harkness to keep the buttons. "Keep them on deposit," he said. "I have more confidence than I had before that the others will get back to you, somehow."

It was the next afternoon, just as the clerks were getting through work, that Stopp came back. The moment he saw Harkness he laughed. His face was bright and smiling before he saw him, for his return was a joyful one. He came not from a bed of death, but from a house whose head was lifted again to bless the Lord of life; and so he walked smiling into the room, but when he saw Harkness he laughed outright.

"I wonder if I should have thought of it if I had left my old clothes behind me," he said; and he laid on the palm of his right hand the sleeve-buttons, gold and diamond, which he took from his vest pocket. "There they've been since I picked them up just as I was going out that afternoon. I thought I should see you in the evening. Did you miss them?"

If Harkness had looked confused when David compelled him to comply with his wish, how did he look now? David came to his relief.

"You got us into a pretty scrape," he said to Stopp. "But no matter. We're all alive; and I'm glad you took them! Mother!" He had seen through the opening in the green baize door the janitress passing by, pail and brush in hand.

And thus she came in. At her son's call why should she not come in? But when she saw the group of men in the middle of the room, for they had all gathered around Stopp and Harkness and David, she stood embarrassed, doubting, anxious to make her escape.

When they saw her so troubled, looking at her son, and from him to Harkness, the young fellows seemed fairly to encircle her by their sympathy, so that she could not escape, and they raised a cheer, and then one of them, in a low voice, said to David,

"Behold thy mother and—thy brethren."

This use of sacred words seemed to have been made by an inspiration—a good many of the fellows began to talk at the same moment, as if to give the rest opportunity to recover self-possession, but nothing that they all said was afterward remembered, except these words which neither the mother nor the son would be likely ever to forget:

"Behold thy mother, and thy brethren."

Yes, to every one with temptation is offered also the way of escape. It is not pleasant to think of what might have befallen David and his mother had they not been permitted to crucify themselves.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A MECHANICAL AGE.—Science certainly advances with gigantic strides. There is scarcely any thing to which the mechanical arts are not applied. From the steam-engine to "the wheel of life," machinery may be said to rule the operations of the world. Every day adds some fresh marvel to the list. We have long enjoyed the comfort of spring mattresses and spring guns, but our readers will scarcely be prepared for the announcement that during the last few days we have actually been enjoying "spring weather!"

SCENE IN AN EATING-HOUSE.—"John, the gentleman wants turtle-soup; order it up quick." "All out, Sir—gone long ago." Astonished proprietor says, "Impossible, never knew that dish to be out;" goes into the cooking-room, mixes fish, beef, tomato, and half a dozen other soups, and sends out first-class turtle. Customer swallows the same, with faith as fixed as the granite on the hills.

"Are you not alarmed at the approach of the King of Terrors?" said a minister to a sick man.

"Oh, no! I have been living six-and-thirty years with the queen of terrors; the king can't be much worse."

PHIL O'LOGICAL.—A student of Trinity, Dublin, who has been recently taking a tour in France, is engaged on a treatise intended to prove that the French provinces are colonies of Dublin. One of the proofs of their Irish extraction is to be found, he alleges, in the fact that they call a brogue a Pat-ois.

A young lady at a fashionable dinner-party pestered Dr. Johnson with a conundrum—a thing which the bluff old philosopher utterly detested. "Why is the letter J like the end of spring, doctor?" was the question, and of course the doctor couldn't tell. "Because it's the beginning of June," was the solution. "Now, Miss, will you tell me why the letter K is like a pig's tail?" sternly asked the doctor. The young lady had to give it up.—"Because it's the end of pork, Miss." The doctor was bothered with no more conundrums.

THE MORNING WALK—YOUNG LADIES' SCHOOL PROMENADING THE AVENUE.—DRAWN BY WINSLOW HOMER.—[SEE PAGE 202.]

THE MORNING WALK.

AMONG the many pleasing customs in vogue in this country is the "Morning Walk" or "Exercise" of the young ladies in attendance on our many boarding-schools and academies; and such scenes as that portrayed on page 201 are daily to be seen in various localities when the season will admit of such exercise. These walks are usually taken every morning, and are sometimes repeated in the evening. In the North these walks are generally taken immediately after breakfast and before the assembling of the school. In the South they are the prelude to breakfast and follow the evening prayers. In this is because the sun grows uncomfortably warm at an early hour in the morning. In the South these walks are not confined to the young ladies of school; but frequently the entire population of the country villages may be seen on the streets enjoying the morning or evening promenade.

Our artist has represented one of the many schools of New York city, under the lead of the teacher, passing through Madison Square. There are frequently to be seen at a time thirty or forty of these young and beautiful girls, representatives of the well-known and fashionable schools of MRS. HOFFMAN, MRS. MACAULAY, MRS. BARRE, MISS HASKIN, MISS CONNYNGHAM, MISS BALDWIN, MISS LOCKTAM, MRS. PEEBLES (Madame CHEGARY), Professor VAN NORMAN, Rutger's Institute, besides those of hundreds of others not so generally known.

A HAPPY DAY.

TO-DAY I'm glad, and life has overflowed,
Not in a wild joy, but a quiet gladness;
Joy-springs have well'd within me to the brim,
Then slowly subsided, to be silent tears.

I have been happy; and to say this much
In round acknowledgment, without reserve,
Is something worth to one of earthly mould
Life runs so roughly o'er Time's rocky bed,
And fate and circumstance so bend the stream
In devious course, that few find flowers,
Uncaught and unexpected by the way.
A deep, calm pool, where golden sunbeams lie
Unbroken on the slowly-flowing wave,
Is such a scene of quietness and peace so glad
The weary soul, that straight away she throws
Her cares like garments off, and on the wave
Floats peacefully, and counting time or tide.

Thus have I found this most delightful day,
And rested with a rest that banished
Heart-weariness, and gave the soul new life.

God must be nearer to the flowery fields,
The hills and dales, the brooks and waterfalls,
Than to the city, with its cold, hard streets,
Where human forces are the graves of smiles,
And care sits brooding o'er a thousand hearts.

I would not choose to have the stream of life
From first to last all calm and rippleless,
For broken waters sing a lovely song,
And valor grows on obstacles o'erthrown.
There's strength in mountains, and we need be strong
With all the work there is for man to do
Between his birth and death, God helping him.
While some but sweet-voiced workers know true rest
Or guess the meaning of a holiday.
The wretched idler, half asleep by day
And half awake by night, scarce lives at all;
His fruitless days are dull, and every sense
Is dull and weak; and time drags heavily
That should go ever lilting lightly on,
Unheard, unfelt, and only passed away;
While he who meets his work with cheerfulness
And does his duty with ungrudging heart,
Taking it up as heritage from God,
Appointed and accepted by His hand,
Though weary often when the day is done,
Yet has no still a conscience in his breast,
And no misgiving nor source of sleep,
That he has recompense in that alone,
Though not always in that; for labor bears
Within itself a great reward, a charm,
Which only those who do the lowly can know
Who sweat in heart and muscle for God's sake.

A HAIR CHAIN.

THE Thursday afternoon choir meeting at the Paleyville church was over, and those attending rose from their seats in the front pew to crowd on the broad top step by the church door. They were looking toward the sullen red sunset; to-ward it, but not at it, for across the front-seated meadow Albert Tailor was coming; and as he saw them waiting he swung his axe upon his shoulder and stepped briskly forward to join them.

It was Julia and Carrie Moore and Dr. Hale. Dr. Hale was the chorister then, and altogether the leading spirit in the musical part of the community. Julia Moore played the little organ that had lately been purchased secretly for the Paleyville church. She had been away all summer learning instrumental music, and Albert, notwithstanding all his cheerfulness, had been lonely during her absence; for ever since they had been engaged to each other he had been a frankly acknowledged engagement between them, and he, whether plowing or harvesting, or overseeing the work on his many acres, associated every thing with thoughts of her.

Since her return from town disinterested friends of the parish had been constructing Albert with the agreeable, gentlemanly Dr. Hale, whose singing was so popular, and who so often called at Mr. Moore's to practice new music or to practice with Miss Julia, and discussing the probabilities of such a proud, lady-like person as Julia preferring her plain, unassuming lover. But as Julia Moore was not one whose business people liked to tamper with openly, their suspicions had been cautiously referred to the little, impulsive, outspoken Carrie—Julia's cousin and adopted sister; and Carrie had indignantly denied their truth, and warned them of injustice to her cousin. All the more vehemently perhaps because of a half-acknowledged thought that they might be true.

A real farmer-looking man was Albert Tailor, and not a specimen of the handsomest of his class either, Carrie reluctantly admitted, as he joined them at the foot of the steps. Short, only a few inches taller than Julia, but then Julia was tall; with a face tanned very brown, and then such pitifully light hair. "But he has beautiful gray eyes though," she sighed; "they almost make his face handsome; and he is so smart as Dr. Hale, only Dr. Hale says splendidly, and appears so well every where." Dr. Hale and Julia would be a fine-looking couple if she married him, and she half believed she would.

"Dr. Hale is going to spend the evening with us, Albert, and I expect you—to listen to our music," said Julia, quietly.

"A good listener is quite as desirable as good music." Dr. Hale's black eyes shone and were smiling, from his six-foot stature, his undeniable good looks, and his speckless, spotless, faultlessly-fitting suit, to the careless-looking, home-spun Albert.

"How very complacent!" thought Carrie, angrily. "I wish Albert would resent it and decline their cool invitation."

"I shall be sure to come," said Albert, with hearty good-nature.

The three turned loiteringly toward home: Carrie lagging yards behind the others to gather the yellow and crimson and brown leaves that maples by the road-side. She was thinking bitterly of every body, and almost angrily of herself, just now, when Albert's manly nature had made her entirely unlike herself. Two hours ago, when they were walking up to the church, Dr. Hale had called her attention to the gorgeous autumn picture that the woods on the hill, with the soft, hazy sunlight caught on their foliage, presented. And Carrie, going a hundred times that day had stopped to gaze at them, almost exclaiming, "Praise the Lord!" from very fullness of joy, and now she had been almost impatiently that she had not learned to go into raptures over yellow leaves. And he only looked at her as if he thought the fashionable young lady-boarder had lost command of her senses.

Lost command of her self, Dr. Hale had been better friends. He had called her plain, puny, at first; but when he had watched her changeable face in company, and on the mountains abundant of mirth or pleasure, he had felt his cool blood thrill, and his pulses quicken with the contagion of the bright, changeful face. And more than twice there had been tones or looks that Carrie could not, if she would, forget.

But Dale Julia could not; her sweet face and graceful ways, and hundred-and-one charming songs; thinking, talking, and seemingly caring for little but music. Dr. Hale's admiring bodily interest by her enthusiastic devotion to it, and taking from her cousin the thoughtful attention she had won. "But I am not the only breaking as to care for that," thought Carrie, stoutly, "only I don't like to think of Albert."

They had reached the house, but she did not want to join them, so she went on picking up the brilliant leaves without looking toward them.

"Your cousin is forgotten when she said about yellow leaves, or she also did not intend to be believed," said Dr. Hale. "I sometimes think," he continued, in a low tone, "that Julia agrees, "that I do not understand her; she is not read at a glance, I see."

Carrie has some peculiarities. She is subject to extremes; to unreasonable ones sometimes; but nobody who knows her well can help loving her," said Julia, warmly.

"I believe you," replied Dr. Hale, earnestly, and he looked reluctantly back as they walked on again.

Carrie walked slowly on, making many good resolutions as she unconsciously arranged her bouquet, and as unconsciously listened to the conversation of the two behind her, and she would not be provoked to ill-untrued rudeness again. In the generous reaction that always followed her vexation she felt all things forgiven but if they had neglected her somewhat, she had always counted it with cool indifference: why should she be so bitter? And was capable of managing his own affairs without her assistance. So she joined them at the gate, carrying her gorgeous bouquet as a peace-offering; but they were absorbed in a musical discussion, and only noticed it with a thoughtful courtesy. Carrie felt the old indignant blood rise to struggle with her miserable resolves as she followed them into the house.

And now the parlor lamp was lighted. Mrs. Moore, upon household duties intent, bustled here and there, and Julia's mother, a pleasant, stout, but grandmother, with her snowy cap and busy knitting-needles, and Mr. Moore, who had just removed his new shoulder-braces from around the new piano—a novelty yet and the pride of the house—to hear the singing. All the new songs, and Dr. Hale's favorites, and Julia's, Carrie's, and by some familiar time-honored hymn, in which Mr. Moore joined with his heavy bass, and grandmother's quavering, old voice, was unacquivered her trembling as sol la. In the meantime Albert came in and stood by Julia's side, watching her slender fingers moving over the keys.

All tired of it at last but Dr. Hale and Julia, who lingered at the piano, talking of something in the vocalist of many varieties as they un-disconcerted. Mr. Moore sat back in his great arm-chair asking Albert about his work.

"And so you are going to clear off that swamp, eh? and drain it? I don't know how you'll make it with your new-fashioned notions; I reckon I'll stick to the old way a while yet."

"I'm going to try it five years, and if I can not make it pay for the improvements, and pay me for my time, I'll give up farming. But you see I am confident that I can. I expect to be a farmer, therefore I study my profession."

"Well, we shall see. You are pretty head strong and thorough. I shouldn't wonder if you made it," said Mr. Moore, approvingly.

"I think the worst of farming is the dull monotony of it," said Carrie. "I be romance and poetry of it are all imaginary. And what is worse, we grow dull and rusty ourselves. We are away from the busy world, and without that friction of society that makes even very drossy people seem superiors when we meet." She was mentally comparing Albert with Dr. Hale.

"I don't agree with you entirely," said Albert. "I have found inspiration from the woods to-night that has mystery and romance, if not poetry enough attached to it, to make a large-sized work of fiction. Something," he said, taking a parcel from his pocket, "that I require all your ingenuity to explain." Carrie drew her chair toward him eagerly, and Mr. Moore and grandmother looked interested.

"I want to tell you about it first," he said, glancing around toward Julia. "The boys felled an old ash to-day; and as it seemed rather sticky, I told them that they might split it into rails. In the first cut from the butt they found a place where the tree had been bored into and filled up again, so long ago that the wood and bark had grown over it all solid. In the tree there we found this"—undoing the parcel.

"Hair!" exclaimed Carrie, with a start. "Why, what—how—who could have put it there?"

"That is the question," said Albert, smiling. "Let's see it," said Mr. Moore, coming forward.

"Coarse, and black, and heavy; and almost as much as I have on my head," said Carrie, lifting it daintily with the ends of her fingers. "I can't you believe it is human hair."

"It looks like it, certainly. What do you think, mother?" laying it in the old lady's lap.

"I should say it was human hair, and a regular Ingin trick," said grandmother, examining it through her spectacles and nodding her head emphatically. "I know considerable about their ways. Why, when I first came to this country—and the old lady went wandering back to the past.

Dr. Hale and Julia now joined the circle to examine the curiosity. Carrie had quite forgotten her jealousy in her enthusiasm. Her eyes fairly danced, and she talked fast and energetically.

"What will you do with it, Albert? I know what I'd do if it was mine. I'd have it made into rings, and bracelets, and all sorts of curious charms.

"Do you suppose they would possess any magic power?" she added, looking oftener at the radiant face than at the curiosity he was examining.

"Oh, certainly, I should be superstitious enough to consider it a 'mighty medicen.' What do you suppose it was put there for? Julia, what do you?"

"I don't know; some sorcery, I suppose. I haven't had time to account for it yet."

"Yes, Miss Julia, I reckon there's some witchcraft about it," said Albert, looking at her with a hundred reasons. What do you think, uncle?"

"Oh, maybe it was some criminal that they wished to disgrace, as we do our prison convicts."

"Faugh, no! They'd a burnt it then; wouldn't they, grandma?"

"It was some witch that they wanted to rob of power, more likely," said grandmother.

"Yes, grandmother," said Albert; "some benighted, red-skinned Samson."

"That's better," said Carrie, doubtfully.

"A red-haired one, I suppose, from Indian braves and maidens, would be more appropriate," suggested Julia. "Perhaps Dr. Hale will give us such a one."

"Some other time, perhaps. I couldn't think of any thing suitable now, and we haven't heard what is to be done with the wood trees."

"It does not belong to me," said Albert. "Joe Hines claims it by right of discovery; but I'll try hard enough to make a 'charm,' as Carrie suggests."

"Do," said Dr. Hale, "and then offer it for sale to the highest bidder."

"Oh no!" protested Julia. "Have more of a spell attached to it. If you sell it, sell it for all it is worth to you, on conditions that every time it is sold the seller must receive more for it than he gave; and whoever can not sell it so must keep it."

"Oh, that is splendid, Julia! How did you think of it? And now, Albert, don't sell it for a song."

"Carrie don't sing songs, you know," said Julia, mischievously.

Carrie felt no covetousness that spoke then, though. I was afraid nobody would know how to value it properly."

The conversation here quietly folded her knitting and left the room, and Mr. Moore was asleep in his chair, when Dr. Hale and Albert, with a great many last words, went out.

The little discovery that "Tailor's choppers" had made created a stir all over the neighborhood. It was remembered by some of the people that when the Seneca lived on the reservation, about forty years before, there, they used to come up the creek by twos and threes, sometimes a dozen, and camp in the woods there; and a great many curious things were learned about the significance of this relic of them. Perhaps Dr. Hale had heard some of them when he told his promised story at Mr. Moore's a week or two later. It was the evening that Albert brought the unchiselled-of charm, made of the Indian hair; a curiously-braided chain, with mountings of gold; a lady's watch-chain, delicate and pretty. It was a long story of Indian loves and Indian locks, in which the heroic, tragic, and poetic flourished abundantly. It was a maiden's hair. She had been her head in token of desolation at the death of her husband. But being left a wondrously beautiful damsel she was constantly sought after and wooed by the bravest of her tribe. Wearied at last with their importunities she declared that she had lost her beautiful hair, without which she could neither receive nor return their love; and that whoever should restore it to her should claim her as his wife.

Then he gave a lengthy biography of several braves who spent their lives searching for it, telling of the hardships and dangers they met, and finally of their remarkable deaths. Of course, none of them found it—the dark-locked lady didn't intend that they should, but she became a great prophetess; and when she died—which she did at a somewhat advanced period—she declared that this hidden treasure, when found, would be a power of great good or great evil to the possessor of it; that they must search for it unweariedly, but beware who possessed himself of it as dishonest gift; for it would give to one and take from another—be strength to one and poison to another.

Dr. Hale's apparent seriousness added interest to the story, and more than once Julia whispered to Albert, who sat beside her, to notice Carrie's intent, listening head. This was one of Carrie's jubilant evenings. They had no music to keep two lingering at the piano, rehearsing again and again some enchanting, feeble chance of song, singing passionate little love songs, and subjecting two others to the tedious duty of listening, while the unconscious cause of seemingly needless ovations to the party. Julia's languid movements and burning cheeks told quite as plainly as her silent words of her indisposition; but it was Albert who sat by her side, or drew her chair to the fire and received her smiling thanks; while Dr. Hale—for he could admire him in any position but as Julia's lover.

"And now," said Dr. Hale, winding the chain around his fingers as he finished his story, "we shall see who dares to become subject to so dangerous a power by possessing himself of this charm, and who will be the first to realize the misgivings about keeping it by the price he demands."

"You remember our compact," said Albert. "I must see Julia before she leaves Paleyville to me. I shall be very exacting, but am ready to guarantee any offer you will make."

Dr. Hale took from his pocket a curious gold coin, telling fabulous stories of its antiquity. Julia developed a small gold chain from her neck; and coaxingly offered an exchange; while Carrie proffered, one by one, with a great deal of pasade, all her trinkets, and finally, with a very Jewish determination to better them all up at "immense sacrifice" against that single fairy chain.

"Take care, Miss Carrie," said Dr. Hale, warningly. "You will never be able to sell it at a greater price than you offer, and if it should prove your evil genius—"

"No matter. I am willing to venture, to secure you it."

"I see that none of you have a proper sense of its worth," said Albert, waving away the trinkets loftily. "It must be something much more precious that will tempt me to part with it."

While they were yet bantering about the chain and its curse for Dr. Hale, and Carrie, quite forgetting all her troubles, excitedly, as she bade him good-night, "It is really too bad! They spoil every evening by taking you away."

"And I am sorry to go; but your regrets almost console me. This did not sound like mere politeness to the wild, blushing her hand firmly a moment as he bade her good-night. But a moment after he recrossed the hall to remind Julia of their choir practice to-morrow night, begging her not to disappoint him, so earnestly that Carrie was vexed with herself for her shy blushes of a moment before.

"I have been silly enough to be flattered by his words and looks all this evening, and to show that I was piqued," she thought, impatiently.

She did not go back to the parlor, but retired to her room, with her bright evening clouded by unpleasant reflections. By-and-by Julia came, wearing the hair chain around her neck. But Carrie's expression of satisfaction was checked by Julia's saying:

"I hoped he would give it to you, Carrie, for I knew you would care a great deal more for it than I did."

"Indeed I do not want it at all," said Carrie, turning her face away almost angrily. How could Julia care so much for Albert's gift?

The chill November afternoon of the next day found the cousins at the church. Julia, looking very pale and weary indeed, was herself now upon the music she was playing for the half dozen young ladies and gentlemen who constituted the choir that night. Dr. Hale was standing looking, praising, criticising, or joining with the singing, as the case required. Carrie was wandering restlessly about, seemingly decorating the altar, vases, pulpit, and teacher, and their obstinate persistence this cold day. Their altered time had been a long, weary long age, and Carrie was thickening as the sun sank in the west. Carrie had again and again begged her cousin to go home, because of the cold and the darkness, but nobody heeded her.

"Miss Julia, Miss Carrie," said Dr. Hale, noticing her blue, trembling looks. "Have my shawl, won't you? or if you wish to go before it is darker, I will get your carriage home."

This was all kind enough; but Carrie was more vexed than pleased by it. She turned quickly, and looked at the outer door, closed but heavily after her, and the key, which had been left in the lock, fell rattling to the steps. "How careless of them to leave it here," thought Carrie, as she replaced it. A mischievous smile lighted her face as she turned away; she stepped a moment, then reached back and turned the key. "They can't get out until they are unlocked," she said, glancing up at the windows high above the basement wall. "It will be very long before they do." She had quite forgotten the cold now, the quick, beating blood had driven the blue look from her face and lighted it with a little malicious mirth. She would stay there by the door until they came out.

It was growing dark. Pretty soon the music ceased; then followed the sound of a long gossiping conversation, and they came toward the outer door. Then Jimmie Northrop, the round-faced youngster who sang tenor, tried to open the door.

"Locked, as true as preaching! Here, Wood, where is the key to this sanctuary?"

"What"—shaking the door so hard that the key jingled outside—"why, I left it in, and somebody has locked it!"

"That can't be possibie," said Dr. Hale, quickly, trying the door.

"I tell you it is locked, but maybe the bolt was not turned, so that it slipped back when the door shut. I've known it to do so."

"That must be it, of course," said Dr. Hale.

Carrie had thought of a little revenge that they would all laugh over, but she began to be ashamed of it. Dr. Hale was so unwilling to believe that it was done intentionally; of course he knew who would be suspected in that case. If she opened it now, they would know she had been waiting there in the cold, after all her complaints. She had not thought of that before. She must find some other way of letting them out. She waited until they had decided to light the lamps, and continue their singing, hoping to attract somebody in that way, then she walked toward home. Albert would be sure to go there if he saw the light; otherwise, her aunt would be uneasy about Julia, and send somebody. Luckily she met Albert on the bridge. "No, he was not going to the church, but a mile or more beyond; but should stop when he came back, he guessed, if the singing was not over."

How nicely it had all happened! That would not keep them there too long, and no danger of betraying her now. But eight o'clock came, it began to rain, and they had not come yet; then nine—ten—and no Julia; and it rained torrents. Her aunt, who had never before failed to fret and worry if a member of her household failed to report in season, seemed satisfied with Carrie's first suggestion, that Julia had gone home with Mary Wood.

Just as Carrie's remorse and uneasiness had driven her out into the rain to go and release them they came, dripping and cold, up the walk. Albert had been detained, but came along just as they were trying to force open the door.

"In the morning when Julia has got over her terrible headache I will confess it all to her," thought Carrie. But morning found Julia prostrated by a fever, and the next day, and the next she was talking wildly, confusing incidents of yesterday with the half-forgotten ones of childhood; and calling the friends around her by the names of those she had not seen for years.

But through all these long sad days, that she alternately remembered and forgot the others, she always recognized Albert; clinging to him when the other faces grew strange and terrible to her. In him she seemed to have a trusting confidence that, more than Dr. Hale's skillful treatment, or her friends' tireless care, restrained her delirious excitement.

Poor Carrie bitterly accused herself as the cause of her cousin's illness. She confessed it humbly to Dr. Hale in the first of those anxious days. His congratulation that she had escaped from a cold and tedious imprisonment seemed sincere; but she could not be hypocritical enough to accept it. She told him unsparingly of her agency in detaining them. First of her weary impatience, then of her pique at his cool dismissal, and her revenge that had proved so humiliating to her. And Dr. Hale, without seeming so much surprised as she expected, kindly assured her that her cousin's sickness was not the result of her detention or exposure, and that she blamed herself a great deal more than any body could blame her.

She made a much longer confession to Julia after her recovery. Of the first insinuating remarks that aroused her jealousy; then of all the little circumstances that had fretted her; most of all, the light estimation in which Julia held Albert's gift—the magic chain that had been for weeks forgotten. And Julia quite as frankly admitted that her own selfish devotion to her music was quite as unreasonable. "But," she said, looking at Carrie with a curious smile, "a suspicion has just occurred to me."

That evening Dr. Hale, in one of his unprofessional calls, met Albert Tailor at Mr. Moore's. It was their first social evening together since that one weeks before, when they had contested for the chain.

"I am afraid it was not fairly bought; at least it brought you misfortune and sickness," said Dr. Hale.

"Indeed it was," Julia replied; "but since it has proved so disastrous I have decided to let you have it."

"In consideration of what?" he asked, in surprise.

"In consideration of life and health, for which she is greatly indebted to you," said Albert, warmly.

"And, as that is more than I gave for it, it is fairly yours," added Julia.

"But how do we know, if you do not tell us what you gave?" persisted Carrie.

"Oh!" said Julia, her pale cheek coloring a little, "I did not get it for a song, but for a kiss."

"I have not the courage to keep this," said Dr. Hale, taking it from the table where Julia had left it when she bade them good-night. "I am afraid of its baneful influence. I shall try to sell it."

"For more than you gave for it?" asked Carrie. "You can not."

"I can. But whoever buys it of me can never sell it. Do you dare?"

The hair chain is an old one now. Mrs. Hale has worn it for years, and since she can not sell it she intends to wear it out, she says. It has been a talisman to her, always preventing suspicion and jealousy.

PARISIAN GIPSIES.

VERY few Parisians are aware of the existence in their city of a band of these gipsy "Bohemians." As a general rule it is only in the artist's studio that they are to be found and recognized. They flit from place to place, sometimes in France, sometimes in Germany, for they come for the most part from Alsace, at other times making an excursion into even more distant lands, but every now and then the wanderers return to Paris, and there they have certain quarters where they meet and talk among themselves in that strange tongue of theirs, which still keeps alive a dialect of India in the heart of Europe. One of the most interesting of the band is the Père Lagrène, a noble-looking old man of sixty-eight, with finely-cut features of the eagle type, and a picturesque mass of tangled hair and beard. Many of the artists of Paris know him well, for he gains a scanty living by sitting to them as a model, and those who are well acquainted with the modern French school of painting have doubtless seen him figuring on canvas from time to time as Lear letting his hoary locks stream on the wind, or as Isaac stretching forth trembling hands of benediction, turning up to heaven the sightless eyes of Belisarius, or leaning on the arm of Antigone amidst the sacred groves of Colonos. A true nomad, he has no fixed dwelling-place, but has solved the difficult question of obtaining a cheap lodging in Paris by inhabiting a little carriage which belongs to him, and which he stables on any waste piece of ground which offers him an undisturbed footing.

The girls of this gipsy band are all of striking appearance, and their manners are very natural and pleasant. Their brows are lightly puckered by a frown which is cousin-german to a smile; a sort of timid independence gives a peculiar ring to their voice. They are most charming from about three to twelve or fourteen years of age. Their hands and feet are almost always delicate and finely-made, signs of their belonging to a thorough-bred race. And, indeed, there must be something very exceptional in the race to which they belong to have enabled it to preserve its individuality as it has done, among so many changes and during so long a period. Even when the children are the offspring of a mixed marriage, the Oriental cast of features generally prevails. One of the young women, Madeleine Landauer, is well known in Paris as an artist's model, being specially employed in the Princess Mathilde's studio.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE artists of Dodworth's Studio Building gave their fourth and last reception for the season on Saturday afternoon, March 7. A large number of ladies and gentlemen indicated by their presence their appreciation of art in general, and their interest in these artists in particular. They circulated freely through the rooms thrown open for inspection, and were received most courteously. It is impossible in a single paragraph to attempt any detailed description of the artists, their works, or even their studios, which latter are often interesting subjects of observation to the casual visitor. Nor will one find it the best way to spend the time to visit all the rooms open in one afternoon. To study a few pictures carefully is more satisfactory than to give a hasty glance at hundreds.

Among many beautiful paintings worthy of admiration, Mr. Hart's "Peaceful Homes" attracted our special attention. It is a large picture—just completed—ideal, in so far as that it represents no particular "homes;" but the materials for its conception and grouping were gathered in studies among the beautiful scenery of Connecticut. It is emphatically a restful picture. Mr. Fairman's works are of the brilliant kind. A little girl stood admiring them by our side, and counted, as she said, "five suns." He certainly is remarkably successful in representations of sunrise and sunset scenes. In Mr. Augero's studio "The Landing of Columbus" stood on the easel, labeled "Sketch for a Drop Curtain at Pike's Opera House." Miss Greatorex's room was a study in itself, adorned as it was with all manner of pretty, tasteful ornaments—in addition to the oil-paintings and pen-and-ink sketches—which latter are very beautiful, and attracted much attention. Mr. Lazarus's portraits are very fine; Messrs. Colman, Brevoort, Smillie, and others, exhibited recently completed works of much beauty. Among Rogers's groups we lingered long. A new group has been recently finished called "The Council of War," representing President Lincoln, General Grant, and Mr. Stanton consulting over a map. Mr. Lincoln, sitting in an arm-chair, holding the map, forms the centre of the group; Stanton, with spectacles in one hand, stands on the right; and Grant, pointing to the map, on the left. Mr. Rogers has in hand another group, which promises to be a gem of its kind—subject, "Courtship in Sleepy Hollow; Ichabod Crane and Katrina Van Tassel." Although but roughly modeled as yet, the expression on the faces is exquisite. Mr. Rogers himself is a very genial man, and cordially gave his visitors much information about his modes of work.

It is not worth while to be too economical. Even if you happen to live in the vicinity of a navy-yard, or an old battle-field, it don't always pay to use bomb-shells for andirons, or old guns for pokers. But a lady in Mississippi, not long ago, wishing to build a fire, and having no andirons used a pair of bomb-shells, relics of the war, for the purpose. The shells were loaded, and of course exploded. The lady was considerably injured, but declared the disaster occurred because it was Friday. She has resolved never to use bomb-shells for andirons on Friday again.

A novel and laborious enterprise is now in progress on what is known as the "Colt Estate," in Hartford, Connecticut. An Artesian well is being sunk, with the intention of conveying it down until it penetrates the bowels of the earth, and strikes the region of hot water! The hot water is wanted for the purpose of warming the extensive green-houses on the premises. This is the second attempt which has been made. The first boring was abandoned at a depth of 270 feet. This one has already been drilled out to the depth of about 710 feet, and is making slow progress at the rate of half a foot a day through the hardest rock ever encountered by the contractor. So hard is the rock that it dulls the drills at the first blow, and they have to be drawn up and sharpened every time after they have been allowed to fall upon the rock, which is a kind of iron-stone. The hole is five inches in diameter. Wooden shafts, thirty-two feet long, are coupled together and the drill attached, the whole moving by a walking-beam and steam-engine. The hard rock, several feet thick, is now believed to be bored very nearly through.

A Massachusetts paper complains thus:

"DON'T.—People WHO send us 'communications' for publication ARE 'requested' not to 'quote' and underscore SO MUCH. THIS is about the way A good deal of 'matter' would LOOK if we 'printed' it as WRITTEN."

And a contemporary in affliction adds:

"To which 'request' TEN THOUSAND compositors 'most earnestly' ADVANCE their 'request' that Names and Places be PLAINLY WRITTEN, and the stroke of the J always carried BELOW the line."

It is stated that Bethel, Conn., has neither rum-shops, paupers, poor-house, nor town-debt—the entire deficiency resulting from the want of the first-named. If this statement is true Bethel ought to be put into a museum as a natural curiosity.

The "Aerotator," a machine for navigating the air, invented by a Mr. Hutchings of St. Louis, is said to have been pronounced a success by the best aeronauts of America. A huge machine is now in course of construction, which promises to turn in any direction, at any height, at the will of the navigator. The first trial will take place near St. Louis, with the wonderful feat of jumping out of a balloon at the height of two thousand feet from the earth; and, as the inventor proposes to accomplish this himself, he has great confidence in his own invention.

Western papers say they find it necessary to announce marriages in advance because the married life is so short afterward that friends do not get fairly notified of an engagement before they see that an application for divorce has been filed.

"Truth is stranger than fiction." Such barbarous cruelties as have been inflicted on a young child in Brighton, England, could scarcely be imagined. According to the London papers the hapless little boy, only six years old, has been living with his aunt for some months past, his mother being poor and a widow. When first seen by a magistrate, the child had more than fifty wounds and scars upon his body. He stated that a poker was heated red hot, and he was burnt with it every night. The inside of the child's ears were masses of sores, from which the matter was discharged. The bridge of the nose and one finger were broken. The child was very emaciated, its bones coming nearly through the skin. The aunt, of course, denied the charge—but somebody is fearfully guilty.

There have been numerous "last men" of the Revolutionary War. The very last one reported hails from Ohio. He is one hundred and four years of age, having been born in Virginia, a few miles from Mount Vernon, February 6, 1764. He was at the siege of Yorktown when in his eighteenth year, but never obtained a pension until a year or two since, when it was granted to him by a special act of Congress. He is now nearly helpless, his hearing bad and his eyesight nearly gone, yet he can walk on crutches. He has been a great tobacco-chewer all his life, to which his premature decay is probably attributable!

In "old times," somewhere about 1735, a "Beef-steak Club" was organized in England. The rules for treating a beef-steak were thus set forth:

Pound well your meat until the fibres break;
Be sure the next you have, to broil the steak,
Good coals in plenty; nor a moment leave,
But turn it over this way, and then that.
The lean should be quite rare—not so the fat;
The platter, now and then, the juice receive,
Put on the butter—place it on your meat—
Salt, pepper, turn it over, serve, and eat.

Not a bad recipe for nowadays.

The city of St. Paul, Minnesota, having sent to Europe recently 80,000 rat-skins in one lot, the people are patiently awaiting a fall in the price of imported European kid gloves.

Iowa must be a dangerous State to live in—at least, some parts of it. A short time ago a young man living in the town of Jasper was engaged in reading the Bible, when his mother, seventy years of age, asked him a question. Seized by a sudden frenzy, he sprang upon the old woman and choked her to death. He then told his wife to send for a neighbor to tie him, and exhorted her and the children to get out of the way as soon as possible. They took his advice, and the crazy matricide was arrested soon afterward.

Woodville, Mississippi, has been thus described: "It is the most quiet place I know; there's no quarreling, or rowdyism, nor fighting in the streets. If a gentleman insults another he's quietly shot down, and that's the last of it." Never having visited Woodville, we can not vouch for the truth of the description.

The ordeals which Fashion imposes upon its most devoted followers are severe in some instances. A fashionable full-dress dinner-party, recently given in this city, lasted five hours. There were thirty guests present; eight courses, and a dozen different kinds of wine were served. The silver on the table was valued at ten thousand dollars.

It is said that the most costly dresses for ladies which are made in Paris go to Russia, but that nowhere is elegant clothing so soon ruined. An English exchange remarks that a young Muscovite belle will think nothing of getting into a narrow, open drotsky and rushing about, with her train spread over the wheels, through the winter sludge till it is spoiled. Perhaps it is only by similar reckless expenditures that the European nobility hope to secure themselves against "vulgar imitation." For just now they are exercised upon that subject. Recently, at a ball in Nice, a Russian princess wore diamonds valued at one hundred thousand dollars. But so did the wife of M. Hartman, who made his fortune by inventing the Magenta dye; her diamonds were as rich and as valuable as the Princess's; and the high and noble are quite disgusted.

The Pope of Rome has issued a decree against profane language and extravagant dress. He complains that much evil is wrought by the Roman ladies dressing for church as if they were going to the theatre or to a ball; and announces that "women with extravagant head-dresses shall in future not be admitted to the communion-table." Very good; but what is to be done about the gorgeous Pontifical robes, the gay clothing of Cardinals, and all their costly decorations?

The nicknames given to some of the most prominent cities of the United States are familiar to many; but others are not so well known, and a list of certain ones may be amusing. New York is called Gotham; Boston, the Modern Athens and the Hub; Philadelphia, the Quaker City; Baltimore, the Monumental City; Cincinnati, the Queen City; New Orleans, the Crescent City; Washington, the City of Magnificent Distances; Chicago, the Garden City; Detroit, the City of the Straits; Cleveland, the Forest City; Pittsburg, the Smoky City; New Haven, the City of Elms; Indianapolis, the Railroad City; St. Louis, the Mound City; Keokuk, the Gate City; Louisville, the Falls City; Nashville, the City of Rocks; Hannibal, the Bluff City; Quincy, the Model City; Alexandria, the Delta City.

DEATH OF CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS.

THE engraving of the DEATH OF CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS, which we give on page 204, is from a painting by ROBERT FLEURY, now director of the French Academy at Rome, and among the greatest of living painters. He has been adjudged, on account of his mastery and knowledge of all the technical part of painting, as in all respects the best man to fill the important position he now holds. He is celebrated for his power of throwing into one great picture, such as his "Charles V.," the spirit and character of a whole historic period. He has been compared with DE LA ROCHE; but both in color, and infinitely more in sentiment, he falls into a lower rank than that great painter.

The incident which has been selected by the artist is one of the famous death scenes of history. After COLUMBUS had fallen a victim to the intrigues of the jealous Spanish courtiers he was carried in chains to Spain, and after lying for some time in prison was released, but neglected. The indignation which was expressed throughout Spain at the treatment of the great discoverer forced King FERDINAND to give COLUMBUS command of four small vessels and a commission to search for a passage through the Sea (now Gulf) of Mexico. On his return from this voyage to San Lucar he was allowed to remain in seclusion and disgrace. At the age of seventy years, broken in body, although in full possession of his mental faculties, having, in his own words, "no place to repair to except an inn, and often with nothing to pay for his sustenance," the discoverer of the New World died repeating the words, in Latin, "Lord, into thy hands I commit my spirit."

I STOOD on a tower in the wet,
And New Year and Old Year met,
And winds were roaring and blowing;
And I said, "O years, that meet in tears,
Have ye aught that is worth the knowing?
Science enough and exploring,
Wanderers coming and going,
Matter enough for deploring,
But aught that is worth the knowing?"
Seas at my feet were flowing,
Waves on the shingle pouring,
Old Year roaring and blowing,
And New Year blowing and roaring.

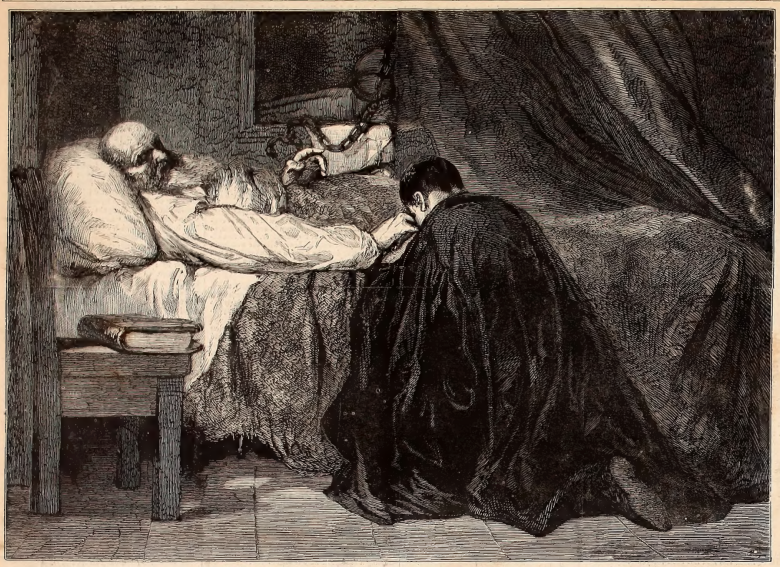
THE OLD SEAT.

See Illustration on next Page.

DEAR Lady Clara Vere de Vere,
How strange with you once more to meet,
To hold your hand, to hear your voice,
To sit beside you on this seat!
You mind the time we sat here last?—
Two little children-lovers we,
Each loving each with simple faith,
I all to you—you all to me.

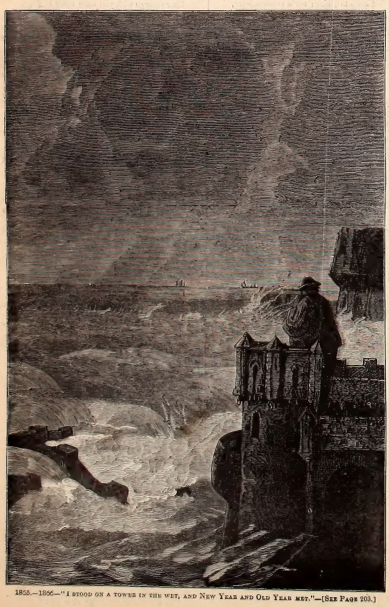
Ah! Lady Clara Vere de Vere,
We sit together now as then;
I press your hand, you meet my glance,
We seem as if we loved again.
But in my heart I feel the truth,
The dear old times have passed away;
The love that once possessed our souls
We do but simulate to-day.

Since last we met, my Lady Vere,
You've grown in years and culture too,
And, putting childish things away,
Have ceased to be sincere and true.
Naught caring for a single soul,
You spare no trouble, reck no pain,
To add another name unto
The bead-roll of the hearts you've slain.



To you, my Lady Vere de Vere,
What is it that a heart may break?
You had no hazard in the game—
He should have played with equal stake.
You did but seek to while away
The slow hours of an idle night;
The fault lay with the fool who failed
To read your character aright.

But, Lady Clara Vere de Vere,
You make your wares by far too cheap;
Your net claims all as fish that comes
Within the limit of its sweep.
You sit beside me here to-day,
You try to make me love again;
But I am safe the while I think
You've sat thus with a score of men.



Still, Lady Clara, Clara, dear,
Beneath your finished mask I see
The gentle heart, the honest mind,
That made you once so dear to me.
Your voice is still as sweet as then,
Your face is still as pure and good:
I see the graces of my love
All ripened in her womanhood.

If some day, Clara Vere de Vere,
You weary of the counterfeit,
And look with yearning back upon
The old times linkèd with this seat—
If you would change your fleeting loves
For one true love for evermore,
Then we will come and see this place,
And sit together, as of yore.

But meanwhile, Lady Vere de Vere,
Of me win all renown you may;
A plaything fresh my heart for you,
A new world for your sovereign sway.
Bring all your practiced charms in play,
Shoot all your darts, they can not hurt;
For when we meet I clothe me in
The proved chain-armor of a flirt.

"DIOGENES SEEKING AN HONEST MAN."—[FROM THE PAINTING BY SALVATOR ROSA.]

THE CHIEF OF CYNICS.

SALVATOR ROSA, in painting his famous picture illustrating the classical story of DIOGENES, which we reproduce on this page, has accepted the modern version which represents the old cynic as searching for an honest man. Cynical as he was, it is hardly probable that DIOGENES harped much about honesty, as among the earliest of his youthful transactions was a swindling operation by which he debased the coinage of his native land. To escape the punishment for this crime he fled to Athens, where he at once set up as a philosopher. In the original of the legend of his search LAERTIUS says nothing about an honest man, but represents DIOGENES as perambulating the streets of Athens, carrying a lamp, and exclaiming, "I seek a man." He meant unbottedly, by the term a person morally and physically perfect. It was a safe philosophy to profess and a useless search to enter upon. The present-day followers of the old cynic are no wiser in their aspersions or more successful in their search than their old original. The "school of Diogenes" forms a very numerous class in the present day; there are to be found in every society numbers of cynical men who go about doubting virtue, laughing at wisdom, and decrying manhood; but, as a general rule, they have not attained to high character as philosophers, and do not materially retard the advancement of the world. People have come to regard them as a sort of inoffensive evil to be endured, and when one offends with expressions of his doubts he is smiled at and pitied as a dyspeptic.

The chief circumstance which the general public recollects of DIOGENES, besides the incident which we illustrate, is the account of his ordering ALEXANDER THE GREAT to get from between him and the sun. The incident has done very great service in a moral way in illustrating to youthful minds the impotency of the great ones of the earth, but it has also served to give a great many a false notion of the character of the "philosopher of the tub." In the first place, he was a notoriously dissolute youth and a dishonest young scamp. He had to fly from Sinope, where he was born, for complicity with his father in what we would nowadays call counterfeiting. In Athens he found himself very poor, and, making a virtue of necessity, he proclaimed himself a follower of ANTISTHENES, who had established a school which preached the "magnificence of poverty," and the members of which practiced living little better and no cleaner than beasts. LEWES has summed up DIOGENES's character in the "History of Philosophy," in the following words: "Poor, he was ready to advocate the philosophy of poverty; an outcast, he was ready to separate himself from society; branded with disgrace, he was ready to shelter himself under a philosophy which branded society."

He ridiculed and despised all intellectual pursuits which did not directly and obviously tend to some immediate practical good. He abused literary men for reading about the evils of ULYSSES, and neglecting their own; musicians for stringing the lyre harmoniously while they left their minds discordant; men of science for troubling themselves about the moon and stars, while they neglected what lay immediately before them; orators for learning to say what was right, but not to practice it. On a voyage to Ægina he was taken prisoner by pirates, and carried to Crete to be sold as a slave. Here, when he was asked what business he understood, he answered, "How to command men." He was purchased by XENIADES of Corinth, over whom he acquired such influence that he soon received from him his freedom, was intrusted with the care of his children, and passed his old age in his house. He died at Corinth at the age of nearly ninety years.

Wolcott's Pain Paint—see it stride
Over mountains, valleys wide;
It is spurred on by Grit and right,
Like a giant in his might.

Opposition down will tread,
Breaking every chain that they spread.
Pills and Physic overturn—
Common to the great concern.

Envy hisses in her lair,
Bloodshot eyes that vacant stare
In amazement at the sound—
Wolcott's Pain Paint all around.

Pills and Plasters you hit by Wolcott's Pain Paint once you try:
Pain removed without delay
Suits the aged—so they say.

Pain in body, limbs, all over,
Pain in head, face, teeth, or side,
Pain in liver, kidney, or shoulder,
Paint with Pain Paint, joy betide.

Druggists are selling Paint so fast
It keeps freely—does not hust:
Renew their stock—lay in a store—
And still the people call for more.

What a doleful sound do these words convey to arrant quacks, who make Physic and Cayenne Pepper or Turpentine and Blisters for a finish. Dr. WOLCOTT, at 170 Chatham Square, stops all pain at no cost. He condemns all pills, physic, or medicine of any kind taken in the stomach, and shows most conclusively, by his Paint, that all we swallow overloads and always sick and complaining. He proves beyond all denial that all pain can be removed by an application of PAIN PAINT, whether the cause of pain be inside of the body or on the surface. It certainly relieves more from inflammation, and PAIN PAINT removes inflammation from any part instantly, quicker, and in a more timely safer than any other known remedy. It never smarts, burns, or blisters, in the safest extreme, but a small puny infant or aged person that can be used. It invigorates the whole system, and cures the most hopeless cases of paralysis of the longest standing. Relief comes at the very first application. Druggists sell ten times more PAINT than any other remedy, at 25c., 50c., $1, and $2 per bottle, plus 50, equal to a dollar. Dr. WOLCOTT is also the inventor of the only standard remedy for Catarrh and Cold in the Head, the Australian balsam, which has the written endorsement of over 100 physicians and chemists of New York. If a remedy is of value let it be proved at once. Turpentine and Blisters have been utterly failed, and very few fools are silly enough to purchase a heating liniment for the purpose of curing local and inflammation. Dr. WOLCOTT has offered the manufacturers of these worthless nostrums, of a age ago that they will prove in public that they can remove pain for ten persons in one hundred who apply: $1000 more that they will produce a remedy that removes all pain as soon and as thoroughly as PAIN PAINT.

The people pause for an answer.

Pills and Plasters begging go,
Our people will not buy.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St. (Post-Office Box, No. 5643), New York City.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 10 days, and have the money refunded.

Through the system of agencies we have established in every country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional cost of transportation) as if they came to purchase them at our salesroom in this city.

Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a club say how much tea or coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write out their names and the amount each wants, and when the club is made up, send the names and orders to us. We will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost, so there need be no confusion in their distribution. Where a club is made up from a large distance, we allow for the cost of transportation the members of the club can divide equitably among themselves.

The funds to pay for the goods ordered can be sent by drafts on New York, by post-office money orders, or by express, as may suit the convenience of the club. Or, if the amount ordered exceeds $30, we will, if desired, send the goods by express to be collected on delivery.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary package for Clubs of less than $30.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large business is done, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-third by sending directly to "The Great American Tea Company."

BEWARE of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our Establishment, or copy our name under the title of our name.

We have no traveling agents, nor do we employ any others to sell our goods. We sell at our Stores only.

Post-Office orders and drafts make payable to the order of the Great American Tea Company. Direct letters and orders to the

Helmbold's Extract Buchu,

ESTABLISHED UPWARD OF 18 YEARS,

During which time Millions of Bottles have been sold, and its virtues attested by

HUNDREDS OF THOUSANDS.

NOTICE TO THE PUBLIC.

In the year 1840 the writer of this article embarked in the drug business in the city of Philadelphia; and, while thus engaged, made several experiments in regard to the most desirable mode of preparing fluid extracts. His efforts being successful—his articles being approved and used by the medical faculty—he was desirous of placing them before the public; but hesitated for some time before concluding to resort to newspaper advertising, knowing of the prejudices existing against using advertised medicines. But, through the advice of friends and those who had used the preparations, this objection was overcome.

Commencing in a small way, after eighteen years' exertions the popularity of my articles has extended to all parts of the United States, and widely through foreign countries, and this in the face of much opposition. Every means has been resorted to by unprincipled dealers since their merit and success have been known—such as advertising larger bottles at less price, censuring all other preparations, and even copying my advertisements; but I am happy to state that, out of the many who have resorted to this, none have been successful.

Knowing that many may read this article who are unacquainted with me, I deem it proper to state those of my native city whose names are known in all parts of the world.

For further information, see remarks from largely manufacturing chemists in the world, Journal Pharmacy, Dr. Keyser's letter, Dispensatory, United States, &c.; Professor Dewees' valuable works on the Practice of Physic; Remarks made by the late celebrated Dr. Physick, Philadelphia; Remarks made by Dr. Barnum McDowal, a celebrated physician, and member of the Royal College of Surgeons, Ireland, and published in the Transactions of the King and Queen's Journal; Medico-Chirurgical Review, published by Benjamin Travers, Fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons; and most of the Standard Works of Medicine.

A QUESTION TO THE READER.

If you were about to embark in the medicine business, would the merit of our article or your confidence in advertising inspire you so to do, and would you devote years of application to school, a thorough investigation? I will take upon myself the responsibility of answering that question, although I have heard thousands remark that "it is not necessary in order to advertise." I have never yet seen any but would hesitate.

Many intelligent and persevering men have been induced to embark in the business, believing they had this essential element, have expended thousands of dollars in bringing it before the community, but, to find in a short time that their article was not successful in a majority of cases, and failure was the inevitable consequence.

Advertising does not make merit—it does not make money; however, it makes merit known, and merit makes a reputation and money.

I full well know that there are thousands who are envious of the success of others, and who are ever ready in a complimentary manner of the merits of our article or of the enterprise of any; but I will remark that I do not believe that there is a druggist or physician in the United States, or the world, who, if he had as good a remedy as mine, would hesitate to pursue the same course adopted by me.

My Buchu is not a patent medicine, and I withhold no knowledge of ingredients. The remedy is perfectly safe. My laboratory and the mode of preparation have been inspected by thousands of physicians and druggists who expressed themselves gratified.

The science of medicine, like the Doric column stands simple, pure, and majestic, having fact for its basis, induction for its pillar, and truth alone for its capital.

I contend there is no business where these qualifications are more requisite, as medicines are brought in contact with the intellectual dirigents every where. It is often remarked that their lives are in our hands, and be of no advantage to another. How mistaken the idea.

A blood purifier for one is a blood purifier for all.

A diuretic for one, a diuretic for all.

A narcotic for one, a narcotic for all.

A purgative for one, a purgative for all.

And as much so as whatever article it may be one is wholesome food for all, with no more difference than that some constitutions require more than others, and that persons in disease are given to despondency—expecting in a few days or weeks, and perhaps with a single bottle of medicine, to be restored to health, if not to youth and beauty. These ludicrous notions seldom recover, lacking patience. They give nothing a fair trial, considering a few dollars expended for the benefit of their health a waste of money. The same individuals may have been years in breaking down their constitutions, and have probably expended thousands of dollars in dress and dissipation, and thought nothing of it. Such forget that good health is true wealth.

With upward of 50,000 recommendatory letters and unsolicited certificates, I have never resorted to their publication. As the case may be, they will appear in a few remarks, trusting they may be appreciated.

I am, to afflicted and suffering humanity,

Their humble servant, H. T. HELMBOLD,
Manufacturer of Helmbold's Extract Preparations.

FROM THE LARGEST MANUFACTURING CHEMIST IN THE WORLD.

I am acquainted with Mr. H. T. Helmbold. He occupied the drug store opposite my residence, and was successful in conducting his business where others had not been equally so before him. I have been favorably impressed with his character and enterprise.

A CASE OF TWENTY YEARS' STANDING.

Philadelphia, Pa., June 28, 1867.

H. T. HELMBOLD, DRUGGIST:

Dear Sir,—I have been a sufferer for upward of twenty years with gravel and bladder and kidney affections, during which time I have used various medicinal preparations under the advice and counsel of the most eminent physicians, experiencing but little relief. Having seen your Buchu preparations extensively used, I consulted with my family physician in regard to using it, and was advised by him to do so. I have used several bottles of advertised remedies, and had found them worthless, some quite pernicious. In fact, I despaired of ever receiving relief, and determined to use no remedies hereafter unless I knew of a personal case. It was through mere accidence that I was induced to use your remedy. I was advertised that it was composed of Buchu, cubebs, and juniper berries. I was not afraid of results ago, at which time I was confined to my room.

From the bottle I was astonished and gratified at the beneficial effect—and after using it three weeks was able to walk out. I felt much like writing you a full statement of my case at the time, but thought my improvement might only be temporary, and therefore concluded to defer, and see if it would effect a perfect cure, knowing that then it would be of greater value to you, and more satisfactory to me.

I am now able to report that a cure is effected after using the remedy for five months.

I have not used any now for three months, and feel as well in all respects as I ever did.

Your having being devoid of any unpleasant taste and odor, a nice tonic and invigorator of the system, I do not mean to be without it whenever occasion may require its use in such affections. M. MCCORMICK.

Should any doubt Mr. McCormick's statement, he refers to the following gentlemen:

Hon. Wm. Bigler, Ex-Governor of Pennsylvania.
Hon. Thos. B. Florence, Philadelphia.
Hon. J. C. Kunz, Judge, Philadelphia.
Hon. J. S. Black, Judge, Philadelphia.
Hon. D. R. Porter, Ex-Governor of Pennsylvania.
Hon. Ellis Lewis, Judge, Philadelphia.
Hon. R. C. Grier, Judge United States Court.
Hon. C. R. Woodward, Judge, Philadelphia.
Hon. W. A. Porter, City Solicitor, Philadelphia.
Hon. John Bigler, Ex-Governor of California.
Hon. E. Banks, Auditor-General, Washington, D. C.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

DR. KEYSER is a physician of over thirty years' experience, and a graduate of the Jefferson Medical College, and of the University of Medicine and Surgery of Philadelphia.

Pittsburg, Pa., August 11, 1865.

MR. H. T. HELMBOLD:

Dear Sir,—In regard to the question asked me as to my opinion about Buchu, I would say that I have used and sold the article in various forms for the past thirty years. I do not think there is any form or preparation of it I have not used, or known to be used, in the various diseases where such medicate agent would be indicated. You may be aware, as well as myself, that it has been extensively employed in the various diseases of the bladder and kidneys; and the reputation it has acquired, in my judgment, is warranted by the facts. I have seen no end used, as before stated, every form of Buchu—the powdered leaves, the simple decoction, tincture, fluid extracts—and I am not forgetful of my preparation of that plant at all equal to yours. Without wishing to say more than I ought, I think, to give me the right to judge of its merits; and, without prejudice or jealousy, I give yours pre-eminence over all others. I value your Buchu for its effect on patients. I have cured with it, and seen cured with it, most diseases of the bladder and kidneys than I have ever seen cured with any other Buchu, or any other proprietary compound of whatever name.

Respectfully yours, &c.,
GEO. H. KEYSER, M.D., No. 140 Wood Street.

A CASE OF INFLAMMATION OF KIDNEYS AND GRAVEL.

Glasgow, Mo., February 4, 1868.

MR. H. T. HELMBOLD:

Dear Sir,—About two years ago I was troubled with severe inflammation of the kidneys and gravel, when I resorted to several remedies without deriving any benefit whatever; and, seeing your EXTRACT BUCHU advertised, I procured a few bottles and used them. The result was a complete cure in a few days. I regard your EXTRACT BUCHU as decidedly the best remedy extant for any and all diseases of the kidneys, and I am quite confident that it will do all you claim for it. You may publish this if you desire to do so. Yours respectfully,
EDWIN M. FOUTS, (Merchant, Saddler & Cut.).

EXTRACT OF BUCHU.—It is no patent medicine, but simply an extraction of the vital principle of an herb which grows spontaneously at Cape Good Hope, Africa, and of whose medical qualities there is no more real diversity of opinion as to its virtues in those cases for which it is recommended. Helmbold, the great chemist of New York, only claims for his article a superior mode of extracting the value of the plant and not impair its vital principle. Every one who has visited his mammoth laboratory pronounces it one of the most extensive and compact establishments in the world, and justly regard it a great addition to the science of medicine. He makes no secret of his process, but cordially invites the public to visit his store and see for themselves. If you want a pure and strong extract, buy Helmbold's Buchu and Sarsaparilla.—Editorial from Daily Advertiser, Boston, Mass.

MR. H. T. HELMBOLD:

Two bottles only of the package of your valuable Buchu preparations I received have been used by the children, and with perfect success. In the case of our little Lieutenant, a 3-year-old, under our charge, they were many a Superintendent and Matron of Boarding-schools and Asylums a great amount of annoyance and many a poor child suffering more from sickness than habit may be spared punishment that is (not knowing it is a weakness instead of a bad habit) meet out to the patient, and I shall endeavor to bring before universal use in this part of the country. Please forward three dozen large size same as before, 1.00 per ex-press. I am, Sir, very respectfully yours, &c.,
M. F. A. NOYRIAS, Surgeon in charge of Hospital.

CERTIFICATE FROM A DISTINGUISHED MIDWIFE.

MR. HEMBOLD: Philadelphia, Aug. 18, 1865.

Sir,—I have used your EXTRACT BUCHU with many of my patients, and can speak of it in the highest terms in every case, and consider it a valuable remedy, and one that should be in the hands of every midwife.

Very truly yours, REBECCA STANTON, M.D.

For the satisfaction of all, see Medical Properties contained in the Dispensatory of the United States, of which the following is a correct copy:

"BUCHU.—In odor is strong, diffusive, and somewhat aromatic, its taste bitterish, and analogous to that of mint. It is given chiefly in complaints of the Urinary Organs, such as Gravel, Chronic Catarrh of the Bladder, morbid irritation of the Bladder and Urethra, diseases of the Prostate, and Retention or the Incontinence of Urine from a loss of tone in the parts concerned in its evacuation. It has also been recommended in Dyspepsia, Chronic Rheumatism, Cutaneous Affections, and Dropsy."

TO PHYSICIANS.

New York, Aug. 18, 1865.

Allow me to call your attention to my PREPARATION OF COMPOUND EXTRACT BUCHU. The component parts are BUCHU, LONG LEAF CUBEBS, JUNIPER BERRIES.

MODE OF PREPARATION.—Buchu, in vacuo, Juniper Berries, by distillation, to form a fine gin. Cubebs extracted by displacement by liquor obtained from juniper berries, containing very little sugar, a small preparation of spirit, and more palatable than any now in use. The active properties are by this mode extracted.

Buchu, as prepared by druggists generally, is of a dark color. It is a plant that emits its fragrance; the action of a flame destroys this (its active principle), leaving a dark and glutinous decoction. Mine is the color of ingredients. The Buchu in my preparation predominates, the smallest quantity of the other ingredients are added, to prevent fermentation; upon inspection, it will be found not to be a Tincture, as the Buchu is in excess of spirit, nor is it a Syrup, and, therefore, can be used in cases where fever or inflammation exists. In this you have the knowledge of the ingredients and the mode of preparation.

Hoping that you will favor it with a trial, and that upon inspection it will meet with your approbation,

With a feeling of confidence, I am,

"IMPROVED BRONZE ALUMINIUM HUNTING-CASED WATCHES"
(The qualities and remembrance of this new metal are such, compared to gold, that even judges are deceived) and "ROSKOPF'S PATENTED PEOPLE'S WATCH."
TRADE MARK.
The Improved Bronze Aluminium of which my watches are made is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. It has seriously occupied the attention of Scientific men, and has not only elicited forth the eulogiums of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition, and even been favorably noticed by receipt of His Holiness Pius IX., authorizing its use in the manufacturing of Church goods.
The qualities of this metal are such that it is surpassed by none, if we except gold itself, and that only on account of the extreme value of the latter. Further details will be found in my circular, which will be sent postpaid on demand.
My watches are made of three sizes, all huntingcased—one small for ladies or lads, and two for gents. The movements are well finished, carefully put together by skilful workmen, and perfectly regulated. I can therefore warrant them excellent time-keepers. These goods being manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to sell any of the above sizes at the extremely low price of $15 00. None genuine unless bearing my trade-mark as above. A full assortment of all kinds of Jewelry always on hand.

THE MODEL-MAKER.—DRAWN BY A. R. WAUD.—[SEE PAGE 210.]

THE MODEL-MAKER.

On our front page of this issue is an engraving from an admirable drawing by A. R. Waud, representing a model-maker engaged in his workshop, a scene which will be of interest because of its familiarity to thousands of our readers.

The model-maker is to many branches of manufacture what the artist is to wood engraving, what the architect is to the builder. He furnishes the designs from which others work. Model-makers are employed not only in the construction of small or miniature representations of the structure of various machines, as is the model-maker in our engraving, but in making moulds for castings in iron, plaster, etc. The huge cannons employed during the war, the great steam and locomotive engines which are daily seen in peaceful operation, the sewing-machines, and the thousand and one inventions which give life and support to the industrial classes, are cast or welded from the models of the model-maker.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE LAW.

THERE is a persistent assertion made in some quarters that the President is not to be tried for an offense of the highest possible character, the insinuation being that he should, therefore, not be tried at all, or that his trial is a work of mere party desperation. It is very true that the President is not charged with such an offense as endeavoring to convey the forts of the United States into the hands of a foreign enemy, but he is charged with the deliberate violation of a law, with the usurpation of the powers of the other two branches of the Government; and his character and career compel every candid man to regard the offense as tentative merely; nor do we suppose any such man doubts that, had he been allowed impunity in setting aside the law, under any pretense whatever, his next step might have plunged the country into terrible confusion. The plea which he incessantly urges that he merely wished to test the constitutionality of the law is entitled to precisely the same respect with the declaration of a royal motu proprio that, "From considerations of affection for my beloved people, and from regard for public order, the freedom of the press is abolished." Men who mean mischief are not in the habit of saying that they mean it.

It is said that the President had been shorn of power, that he had been rendered harmless, and that there was therefore all the less reason for impeaching him, except for the highest possible offense. But how had he been shorn of power? Merely by the laws of Congress, of which the Tenure-of-Office law was one. And for what is he impeached? For violating one of those laws. Unwilling to be restrained, and resolved, if possible, to exert all his force for mischief, the President tries to set aside the laws, and naturally begins with the one which he considers the weakest, and which he believes the country will regard as the most unimportant. It is urged that he can neither control the purse nor the sword. But what have been all his efforts to get a creature of his own into the War Department, and to summon Sherman or Thomas to Washington, but attempts to discover whether he could not control the sword? If he could put Rousseau, or Steedman, or Granger into the War Department, would he hesitate to do it, and for what purpose would he place either of them there? It is childish to argue that the President is bound by the law when he is impeached for violation of the law. It is equally trivial to insist that the law is an unimportant one. It is the violation of law that is in question. It was upon a rate of thirty-one shillings and sixpence that John Hampden made his stand against the ship-money. If the King could not dispense with the law, it was as illegal to attempt the collection of a penny as of a million pounds. If the President may disregard or violate the least law, all the laws are at his mercy.

In the case of the President the constitutionality of the law is not now mooted. Is the Tenure-of-office Bill a law? If so, does it include the present Secretary of War as one of the officers who can not be removed without the consent of the Senate? If so, did the President remove him without consulting the Senate? These are the questions. If they shall be answered affirmatively, what reply is it to say, even could it be proved, that the President meant no mischief? The best and wisest man in the Executive Chair could not be allowed to use his discretion in obeying the laws any more than the best and wisest Congress could be allowed to dispense altogether with the Executive. But when a man who has the confidence of no party whatever, who is merely upheld against the dominant party by a political opposition which despises him, whom nobody trusts or respects, and from whose action the baffled rebellion hopes to pluck a tardy victory—when such a man in the Executive Chair assumes to violate laws at his pleasure, under whatever plea, he can not expect an immunity that could not be wisely granted to the most trusted and beloved citizen.

THE BANCROFT TREATY.

While Mr. Seward has forfeited the respect and sympathy of those who were once his warmest political friends, and has no influence whatever in the great work of reconstruction, he is yet steadily laboring to associate his name with foreign diplomatic triumphs. He has gratified his old fancy for territorial expansion by the bargain with Russia for Alaska; he sees the British Government not unlikely to settle the Alabama claims upon honorable terms to the United States; and under his direction, Mr. Bancroft, Minister to Prussia, has negotiated a treaty which settles some disputed points of the rights of adopted citizens upon which the United States have hitherto had a great deal of correspondence with Prussia.

It is in some such manner that our difference with England upon the question of allegiance will probably be settled. It must become a subject of treaty, and will so pass into international law. Great changes in the traditions and policy of nations are not wrought by the peremptory opposition of other nations. They are the result of experience, of reason, of necessity, and the thousand forms of expediency. If one nation, for its own advantage, dogmatically declares a public principle which the advantage of another nation compels it to deny, and a practical question arises under the difference, there must be compromise, total surrender upon one side, or war. Now the age is not favorable to the categorical international method. Nations proceed to adjust differences by discussion and compromise rather than by a prompt ultimatum and war. They approach changes of policy slowly, and vacate old claims with deliberation. General Banks or Mr. Robinson may insist that Congress shall pass an emphatic law which directly clashes with the laws and habits of other nations, and require that its extremest letter shall be at once rigorously enforced. But wiser men understand better the conditions of international progress, and know that the change which the law seeks can not be peremptorily wrought.

Thus Mr. Bancroft's treaty, which has been approved by the Council of the North German Confederation, secures more than the Prussian Government has hitherto been willing to concede, but it does not secure the whole American claim. By Article 1 of the treaty the North German Confederation agrees to regard Germans who have been naturalized in the United States, and have lived here for five years, as native-born citizens of the Republic. But Article 2 excepts from the provision of Article 1 those who owe reparation to the Confederation for any misdemeanor committed while still a subject. Now, as every Prussian without distinction, upon reaching a certain age, is held to owe military service to the government, the evasion of which is the most serious misdemeanor, if he emigrate before the term of that service has expired he is, it seems to us, still liable to Prussia under the treaty. It is possible that the text of the treaty may correct this view; but, unless it be very distinctly expressed, it can not be assumed that Prussia has renounced one of its most cherished principles.

Nor is this principle wholly unreasonable. If the United States say that, whenever a Prussian deliberately chooses this country as his home, and willingly submits to all the duties and penalties of the law and to every condition of citizenship that the Government imposes, he shall be regarded exactly as a native citizen every where in the world, Prussia replies that she is of necessity a military power; that she has Austria on one side and France upon the other; that her existence depends upon the ability of all her subjects to bear arms; that her local law requires all Prussians born within her allegiance to serve for a certain time in the army; and that if any subject evades this obligation he can not be released from it by the law of another country, unless civilized nations propose to return to the condition of barbarism. Here is a strong case and a vital difference. Are we in a position to insist that Prussia, or the German Confederation, shall renounce its own doctrine and conform to ours?

Certainly we are not; and hence the extreme propriety of reaching our object by a treaty rather than by a dogmatic legislative assertion and acts of hostility. We say that we are not in a position to insist that Prussia shall adopt our doctrine or fight; because, as we have formerly shown, the United States really have no doctrine upon the subject. We have a popular cry and a general vehement assertion; but when Mr. Banks spoke in his late bill of the doctrine which the Government had "maintained" he was compelled to strike out the word, and finally to withdraw the bill, because we have "maintained" no doctrine whatever. Indeed the rule of law in this country is substantially the view held by Prussia. Prussia declares that expatriation is possible only by consent of the Government; and Chancellor Kent says that, in this country, "the better opinion would seem to be that a citizen can not renounce his allegiance to the United States without the permission of Government to be declared by law, and that there is no existing legislation in the case."

Mr. Jenckes, of Rhode Island, during the debate upon Mr. Banks's bill, which was withdrawn, very wisely proposed to put the United States in a position to speak of its principles upon the subject of expatriation and perpetual allegiance by declaring definitely what those principles are. He introduced a substitute, asserting that the right of expatriation and of naturalization under specified conditions are a part of the public law of the United States, and providing that wherever those rights were contravened by other nations the Executive should immediately inform Congress for its action. This is beginning at the beginning. But it is rather bold to suppose that our declaration will fundamentally change international law. It will lead to discussion; from discussion will spring negotiations and treaties, and in that manner what is called international law or the comity of nations will be modified. Reason, patience, and toleration are as indispensable in public as in private affairs.

MEN AND PARTIES.

Those who adhere to a political party for some better theory which they have associated with it are gradually compelled to acknowledge that a party must be judged by the policy which its majority approves and adopts, not by the principles which a few members may insist upon asserting. It is not the traditions of a party which can save it, but its practical measures. When the Democratic party in this country became a machine by which the perpetuity and ascendency of slavery were to be secured sincere Democrats left it. It was useless to say that it was a free-trade party, and a party that asserted the strict limitations of government, and was a State-rights and decentralizing and anti-bank party; because the paramount political question was neither of those, but was the controlling power of slavery; and the Democrats who believed that the system and the extension of slavery were fatal to free government and the national welfare joined the Opposition.

The result was that the moral sentiment of the country deserted the Democratic party, which became under the despotic leadership of the Southern chiefs a mere conspiracy against free government and human nature. Its sole object was the maintenance of the supremacy of slavery, and its methods included suppression of free speech, mobs, vigilance committees, and a vast and systematic demoralization of the public mind, naturally and inevitably culminating in a fierce and prolonged rebellion. Until that rebellion was suppressed or victorious the only practical question was the war; and until the nation, convulsed by the war, is pacified and restored to a normal condition, the practical measures upon which parties must divide are those immediately connected with that pacification.

There are therefore now the party of those who inflexibly opposed the subserviency of the Democratic party to slavery, who steadfastly supported the war against the supremacy of slavery in the government, and who are resolved that the defeat of the party supporting that supremacy shall be secured in the reconstruction of the country. This is one of the present parties. The other is the Opposition, composed of all the miscellaneous elements of hatred, ignorance, and discontent—the hatred of a baffled faction, the ignorance of those who are swayed by appeals to the basest passions, and the discontent of politicians out of power; of those who, pinched by the necessary consequences of a tremendous war, hold the dominant party responsible for the suffering occasioned by the rebellion; and of those who are impatient of the extravagances of some of the leaders of the dominant party, and by the occasional crudity of some measures they propose.

This Opposition, calling itself the Conservative or Democratic party, is the residuary legatee of all the passions and prejudices that were generated by the long slavery contest. Its present policy is contemptuous injustice toward those whom the war freed, in the hope that an appeal to the jealousy of race, added to the reaction that follows any prolonged tension of public feeling, may restore it to power. It tries to claim free-trade as one of its passports to public favor, although some of the ablest and most conspicuous free-traders are not less eminent Republicans, and the subject is one upon which party lines are not, and can not yet be, drawn. It talks about the strict limitation of government, but not so ably as many of those who are radically opposed to it upon the paramount question. The only point which is peculiar to this Conservative or Democratic party is hostility to equal rights. That is the subject upon which alone it is fully concentrated. Upon this all its orators are equally eloquent, and its newspapers equally humorous. "Shall this not remain a white man's government?" shouts the Reverend Henry Clay Dean, and the New York World gives endless columns of painful burlesque of the "Pan African" Conventions.

It is in the extreme examples that the tendency of the Democratic party must be studied. They show the party intention and drift. They reveal the sentiments and purposes which more plainly appear as the party believes itself ascending to power. Thus if, personally, Fernando Wood is distasteful to many of his political associates; if he sometimes speaks a little more plainly than they think to be politic, he is only excessive in the party direction. If Mr. Wood asperses the living General Howard upon an authority "which I was very careful to say I would not guarantee," the New York World constantly insults in the coarsest manner the memory of the dead President Lincoln. If Chauncey Burr says that a hundred assassins would have disposed of the Radicals, the Albany Argus asks whether the knot must be cut by the sword. If Vallandigham derides the cowardice of the Democracy, the whole Copperhead press ridicules "loyalty" and "loyal" men.

Indeed both parties now, as before the war, may be profitably studied in what are called their fanatics. In Congress to-day Fernando Wood and Thaddeus Stevens may be considered the opposing representatives. Mr. Stevens says that with free schools and universal suffrage he will trust the future. Intelligence and equal rights—those are the objective points of the dominant party. Caste, and ignorance, as its necessary condition, are the policy of the Opposition. Let any man compare the character and scope of the arguments and appeals made by the two parties. Those of the one are to the noblest principles, the most generous emotions, and in support of a policy which is of the plainest necessity, and of practical utility. Those of the other are to the lowest passions, and in favor of a course which all experience, and our own immediate history, show to be fatal to the national welfare. When the condition of public affairs allows a party to strengthen its political position with the moral sentiment, it will be impregnable among intelligent men. But if it disdain that source of strength it will inevitably lose power.

STABILITY OF THE NATIONAL CREDIT.

Time has shown that the French Government made an unfortunate mistake when, in 1865, it refused our invitation to invest in United States bonds, and chose to subscribe its $100,000,000 to the Italian loan in preference. Those bonds cost her 70, and are now in the market at 45, while our bonds, which might have been bought at 45, have gone up to 78 or 80, with a prospect of their being eventually worth par in gold. The truth is, that United States securities have acquired such popular confidence, both at home and abroad, that even the most alarming symptoms of political turmoil fail to shake their stability. Political squabbles, in Congress or out of it, have lost their great significance, and cease materially to affect the market; for experience has taught that bluster and vaporing are characteristic of our representative men, and that fierce conflict of opinion does not necessarily contain the seeds of serious result.

The most serious source of danger to the public credit lies in the spirit of repudiation, which is insidiously taking hold of the popular mind, and which wily politicians of both parties take pains to foster, in view of the approaching Presidential canvass. It is certain that the element of discontent is small as yet, and that the popular sentiment of the country is largely opposed to repudiation. Thousands of well-meaning, unreflecting persons favor the payment of the Five-Twenty interest in currency who would scorn the thought of repudiation. They do not see the seductive proposition in that light. But how long will the industrial and material interests of the country sustain the agitation of equivocal schemes for evading honest obligations? How long will Government Bonds maintain their present standing in the world's markets under the increasing pressure? The London Times says that holders of American securities are already beginning to be alarmed by the debates about consolidation of the debt, or the payment of it in paper currency. It is natural they should be. Our own people are scarcely less apprehensive. The market for Governments showed more weakness under the announcement of Senator Sherman's new Funding Scheme than it did under the prospect of impeaching the President. There ought, perhaps, to be no serious apprehension that any such measure can be legalized by Congress; but the excitement which the bare suggestion creates in commercial circles, and the perceptible growth of the elements of discontent at the West, make it apparent that the stability of the public credit is more likely to be shaken by impolitic financial measures than by mere political agitation.

There is less occasion now than ever before to listen to the special pleas of would-be repudiators, and less reason than ever for resorting to any such expedients as Senator Sherman's. We need no "compromise measures" with those who are disposed to be dishonest. A great deal has been done, since the war closed, to extricate the country from its financial embarrassment. The February statement of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that the aggregate net debt of the United States at that date was $2,527,315,373, of which $1,935,000,000 has been funded. The March statement shows a still farther decrease in the debt of $7,485,758.

The unfunded debt has been reduced to about $716,000,000, the whole of which, with the exception of the greenbacks, fractional currency, and gold certificates, are so arranged as to be readily funded; and it is believed that in scarcely any possible contingency can any part of this unfunded debt cause embarrassment to the Treasury. This encouraging result has been obtained by arduous labor and great ingenuity. In the face of this remarkable display of interpretive force, and in view of the present political agitation, the moment is singularly chosen for instituting attacks on the public credit. The effect of these Western wild-cat schemes can not be otherwise than extremely mischievous in their mere suggestion and discussion, and if enacted by law, must result in national bankruptcy.

THE LEGISLATURE AND THE NEW STATE CONSTITUTION.

AMONG the important reforms in the proposed new Constitution of New York is the reorganization of the Legislature. At present the Senate is composed of thirty-two members, who are elected every two years, and who retire together. But in nothing more than in practical legislation are experience and stability essential. The members who come to the capital, new to legislative life and unfamiliar not only with the method of managing details but even with the general subjects to be managed, are at a disadvantage which perplexes all public business and peculiarly exposes the members themselves to unscrupulous influences. The difficulty is obviated by providing that the terms of office of all the Senators shall not expire at the same time. The provision finally adopted by the Convention, and which is now to be submitted to the people, divides the State into thirty-two Senate districts, each of which is to choose one Senator, and the term of office is to be four years. Half of the members first elected are to retire at the end of two years; the others at the end of four. This secures a permanent element, in the Senate of the Union. Half of the members are necessarily experienced; and the improvement upon the present system is considerable.

A still more searching reform, however, was sought by a large part of the Convention, and at one time it seemed probable that it would be adopted. This was an increase in the size of the district and a reduction in the number of Senators. The theory of a Senate in our Legislature is that it is a Conservative body which the possibly rash and hasty action of the other House may be restrained and corrected. It was with this view, doubtless, that a noted clergyman in Albany, when praying at the opening of a morning session of the Senate, at a time when the House was especially tumultuous and discordant, fervently besought the Almighty that he would enable the tranquil wisdom of a few "to baffle the dispersive counsels of a multitude." But nothing can be more clumsy nor futile than a second body elected by the same constituency. The Senate, which does not represent like the House of Lords in England a separate estate of the realm, which is not constituted solely with a view to its purpose, it is to pass in review the action of the other House, and therefore, as far as practicable, it should be different in its origin and duration, in order to secure that independence and deliberation which are indispensable to the proper discharge of its functions. If it be elected by the same constituency and for the same term as the other House, it is but a repetition of it, subject to precisely the same local and personal influences. Its especial intention is defeated.

The Senators of the Congress of the United States is distinguished from the House of Representatives by its small number, two from every State; by the extent and character of the constituency, which is the whole State; by the manner of election, which is by the State Legislature; and by the duration of the term, which is three times as long as that of a Representative. There seems to be no good reason why the general constitution of the United States Senate should not serve as a model for that of this State; and it was proposed that the State should be divided into eleven or twelve districts, each to elect a Senator for a long term, with a provision that one of the number should annually retire together. This plan would secure all the objects sought in a Senate as wisely as any arrangement, but it was defeated apparently because of an opinion that it was not really democratic, and evinced a doubt of the wisdom and ability of the people to select their representatives. If this argument were of any weight it was sufficient to abolish the Senate altogether. The discussion was animated and the vote very close. The result was the compromise we have mentioned, which, as an improvement upon the present regulation, we hope will be adopted by the people.

The new Constitution proposes also to return to the old election of members of the Assembly by counties instead of by districts, as now; it increases the number of Representatives to one hundred and thirty-nine instead of the present per diem. The election by counties will, of course, prevent for some time the return of any but Democratic representatives from the county of New York. It is possible now to send at least one or two of the other party. The division of the State into thirty-two districts also makes the districts of the Senators in the counties of New York and Kings smaller than those of the Assemblymen. The county of New York, for instance, will furnish six Senatorial districts. This is an anomaly which it was difficult to avoid.

There seemed to be no very strong wish in the Convention to increase the number of members of the Assembly. Indeed, a multitude is not so prompt or efficient a working body as a comparatively small one. The general argument for a large Assembly, drawn from the consideration that it takes much more money to bribe six hundred men than a hundred and thirty, is so startling as to suggest the opinion that reasonable men will immediately perceive that no corporation can afford to pay individually one hundred and liberally as it might a hundred and thirty, and to graduate their expectations and demands accordingly. In other words, if the community is corrupt, and the number of the Legislature is unnecessarily large, by considerations of executing a public duty with ability, rapidity, and fidelity, but by reference to corruptibility, it makes very little difference whether the majority be larger or smaller. Nevertheless, there is a very profound and universal impression in the State that the Legislature is not impeccable. The fact was usually denounced as a false impression by Senator HENRY C. MURPHY and Senator FOLGER, who are generally regarded as the leaders of their respective parties in that body. Indeed, Senator FOLGER, upon one occasion, declared that it was unfair to repeat so slanderous an allegation as if there could be any truth in it, and most vehemently denied the wholesale charge of venality against the Legislature, rather to the amused consternation of Mr. ERASTUS BROOKS, who had jolted the Senator at the moment, but who, upon resuming, did not seem to be in the least convinced.

Nor, indeed, was the Convention. For, upon Mr. OPDYKE'S proposition, it placed in the new Constitution a very stringent provision against official corruption; making it incumbent upon District Attorneys to prosecute upon report or removal for negligence. All public officers are also required to take an oath as a guard against bribery at election: so that in entering upon his office the Governor and all the Judges of Appeals, as well as every minor servant of the State, must swear that he has not paid nor offered to pay any thing valuable, nor made any promise of influence, or reward a vote. This is a solemn testimony to the extent of public corruption which is melancholy enough. But the Convention had to deal with it as it proves to be facts, and with the very positive conviction of the public mind upon the subject; and the provision is has made can not fail to be effective. Upon the whole the public judgment will undoubtedly be that the changes in the Legislative article, although not radical, are improvements upon the present system.

THE PRESS AND LIBELS.

THE Press is naturally interested in the two recent trials of suits against newspapers for libel. It is very important that the limits of editorial discretion, in regard to comments upon persons and their conduct, should be exactly defined; and we have come nearer to such precision by the verdict in each of these cases. In the one, the NEW YORK SUN reprinted from another paper a letter concerning a married woman. Her husband promptly sued. The responsible editor apologized and corrected the misrepresentation, but maintained the truth of his case. There was no question of the falsity of the story and of its injurious character, but it was held that there was no malicious intention; that the matter might be fairly open source as a matter of public news; that ample apology and reparation in kind, so far as possible, had been made; and that, finally, that the editor in charge was an agent, and his conduct could not impute malice to the proprietor, who was the defendant in the suit.

In this case it seems clear that the husband should have sued the original author of the slander; and the story being as false as it was injurious, the editor may well be sorry and ashamed that he had been to impress upon our fraternity the truth that we must be very careful before we publish stories, however "spicy," which are clearly most damaging, and may be totally false. It is not the fair office of the Press to gratify an inane and insatiable personal curiosity and fondness for mysterious gossip. It is the duty of an editor to discriminate. All facts are not lawful news. In the very case of the persons concerned in the story which the SUN reprinted, of what possible interest to the public is the conduct of the lady, who is in no sense a public character, and who was very unfairly made a subject of gossip at the time of her marriage? We think this consideration might properly have restrained the reproduction of the paragraph in question; although that is, perhaps, a question of editorial taste and discretion with which the law should not interfere. The verdict was entirely just under the circumstances, and it is not original libeler who should be punished.

The other case was that of a conductor upon the New Jersey Railroad against the Nation, for its comments upon the careless management of the train at the time of the killing of Professor DWIGHT. The defense was, that there was no malicious intention in the comments; that they were not in themselves libelous; and that they were not personally applied to the conductor. The facts were, that there was undoubtedly culpable carelessness in the management of the train; that Mr. DWIGHT lost his life in consequence; and that the Nation, in strict pursuance of its duty as a public journal, exposed the conduct of public agents to whom the lives of hundreds are daily intrusted. If this is not the duty of a journal, what is? If it had charged the conductor personally with the negligence that led to the catastrophe, it must, of course, have proved its allegation. But it did not: it spoke in general of the management; the conductor said it meant him; and the Judge charged that the Jury had only to decide whether the conductor were the person intended. The Jury did so, and, if so, to determine the amount of damages to be awarded.

But suppose we should say that last week there was another accident upon Mr. GOULD'S CHARLICK'S Long Island Railroad—the Hunter's Point station of which was last year, but we hope no longer, a manure-yard; that by the accident one person lost his life, which is true, and that others are hopelessly maimed; that we are told the cause of the accident was the rottenness of the sleepers, and that in our opinion it is an extreme disagreeable and dangerous road—suppose we should say all this, would the Judge charge that we had libeled Mr. GOULD, or that the director of Mr. HUNTER published a statement of the circumstances of her father's death, in which gross negligence upon the part of the management of the road was charged? The conductor of that particular train was the immediate agent of the management, although he may have been, as no doubt he was, entirely personally innocent of the catastrophe. Comments upon culpable carelessness in management might seem, therefore, in a general way, to be libels upon him. But no one would seem to libel the Presidents and Directors of the Road; and if the jury had so decided, the whole corrective and restraining power of the Press over the management of railroads would be lost. As a rule, railroad companies and officers have very little respect either for the fidelity or comfort of passengers; and if communications like those of the Nation should be judged libelous, the public would suffer very much more than it does now.

We hope it is not libelous to publish an extract from a letter that we have received from one of the passengers in the train that was so fearfully destroyed at Angola: "The Press and the public ought to be broken rails, wheels, and bentaxles, and charge the balance to God Almighty.....In my opinion there is but one cause for this horrible murder, and that is the wild and reckless manner the train was run. Had the train passed over this bridge at the rate of speed usually run over bridges on this road this awful catastrophe would never have happened. To run trains through stations, over switches, bridges seventy-five feet high at the rate of forty miles an hour, and killing by the car-load can be but one result, and that is murder in the most dare death in such a way." The train that was thrown from the bridge was three hours behind time. Nothing but the fear of Courts will bring railroad management to reason.

CONNECTICUT.

THE political campaign in Connecticut has opened under the best auspices. The steady stand of New Hampshire shows our friends over the border that the reaction is stayed, and that it is the height of folly to abandon a party whose principles and policy are wholly approved because of discontent with an occasional illnature of expression or expression. The people of New Hampshire knew that they must support either the policy of Congress, which is reconstruction of the Union upon the basis of equal rights of all the people, or the policy of the President and the Democratic party, which is the surrender of the late rebel States to the power of their people which is least friendly to the Union.

Moreover, the people of Connecticut know, as those of New Hampshire did, that the favorite candidate of the Democratic party for the Presidency is Mr. PENDLETON, who, during the war, was a sympathizer with the rebel States which should be allowed to depart, and who now advocates repudiation of the debt which was incurred in the successful effort to prevent their departure; a debt which is held by millions of persons of moderate means all over the country, as well as in Europe; while the deliberate repudiation of it, under whatever fine name, would justly make the United States a by-word of scorn throughout the world.

The people of Connecticut also know that the first want of the country is repose, and that there can be no repose so long as the President withstands the will of the people, as expressed by their lawful representatives, and constantly stimulates the hopes of the most reckless and desperate classes in the Southern States. The necessary financial and general legislation is incessantly perplexed by the necessity of watching the President and baffling his intrigues. He declares his interpretation of the Constitution to be the only possibly correct one, and deliberately defies Congress, pretending his veto after Congress by the constitutional vote of two-thirds has passed the law. Do the people of Connecticut approve this course? Do they think that the proper remedy for the Executive refusal to enforce the laws until he has at his leisure consulted the leisurely judgment of the Supreme Court is right? These are questions which the people of New Hampshire asked themselves, and although every kind of cajolery and coercion was brought to bear upon them, they answered that they would in a government founded upon equal rights to the rule of a disaffected oligarchy: the momentum honor to swindling new-comers who rounded the Government; and the national welfare, which springs from harmony in the government and intelligent loyalty among the citizens.

The Democratic party of Connecticut have nominated men whose characters are worthy exponents of their principles. Mr. DEWELL, the candidate for Governor, whose position we are not elsewhere in this paper, is a sturdy, sagacious, honorable business man, whose interests are identified with the prosperity of his State. Mr. HOLCOMBE, the candidate for Lieutenant-Governor, is the eldest son of the late Rev. Dr. WATLAND, heir of his father's remarkable ability and staunch character. With such leaders success seems to be sure of general congratulation, and defeat no dishonor.

The men of Connecticut will not forget that New Hampshire was thoroughly canvassed and knew every voter; and that on election-day every body took care that every body else voted. The same resolution and zeal will secure the same happy result. To recover the State from the reaction, and to place it in the great line of States which is already marshaling for the national advance and jubilant triumph of next November, would be a victory which would cheer the heart of every lover of peace and justice in the land.

The freedmen of South Carolina are rapidly educating themselves at their own expense. There are now in the State 200 public schools, twenty-four of which are of the higher class. There are 138 teachers—101 white and 37 colored—with an estimated attendance of 7700 pupils, and an average actual attendance of 5034. Of the pupils, 4000 are over 18 years of age, and in the different stages of advancement, a large proportion being able to read well. The sexes are nearly equally divided, there being 3599 males, and 4170 females. Forty-one Sunday-schools have been established in connection with the day-schools, and are attended by 3071 pupils. These schools are entirely those that come under the immediate control of the Bureau. The Superintendent reports, that he has on the list of pupils to nearly double the number given, or say 10,000 in all contemplated. In his report he says only 20,716 children of all colors and sexes attended the public schools of South Carolina. During the past year the expense to the Bureau for educational purposes in South Carolina was $136,000. The whole amount now has been refunded by the tuition fees paid.

FOREIGN NEWS.

In the debate in the English House of Commons on March 17 it was stated that Fenian organizations had been established in Canada, and were receiving aid in British army serving at home. LOBBY OF THE WHITE HOUSE AT WASHINGTON.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

THE IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

IN our last issue we gave an account of the summoning of President JOHNSON to attend his trial, and his plea before the Senate, which was made through his counsel on March 13. At that time the trial was postponed for ten days in order to give the President and his counsel time to prepare for his defense. During the intermission little of interest occurred, and the Senate reassembling as a court on March 23 the trial was at once begun. The next issue of the Weekly will contain full and elaborate illustrations of every important scene of this great trial. The present Number contains on this page scenes in the lobby of the White House, a fac-simile of the tickets of admission to the Senate, and an illustration of the President and his counsel making their preparations for the trial.

The lobby of the White House is always a place of interest, as it is seldom that some man of note or notoriety is not to be found dancing attendance there. Of late these halls have been less frequently attended than formerly, and one of the results of MR. JOHNSON'S attempted coup-d'etat has been to show him how faithless his Southern and Democratic friends are. Most of those who are to be found lounging in the lobby awaiting admission to his presence are either individuals who have "axes to grind," or inquisitive people who wish to study the great man's looks in time of trouble.

A ticket of admission to the Senate was found absolutely necessary to the preservation of order during the trial. The Senate galleries will seat only about 900 persons, and at least 5000 persons in Washington would gladly attend daily. The rules for the trial authorized the use of the card, which we illustrate.

The counsel of the President, so far as has been decided upon, consists of MESSRS. HENRY STANBERY, BENJAMIN R. CURTIS, J. L. BLACK, WILLIAM M. EVARTS, and THOMAS A. R. NELSON. MR. STANBERY is most famous for the peculiar arguments which he advanced to sustain one or two of the President's vetoes, and to justify his refusal to enforce the Reconstruction laws. MR. EVARTS is the only Republican employed by the President. Judge BLACK is called by Republican politicians at Washington the "brains of the Opposition," and his influence is recognized at the White House and the Democratic side of the House of Representatives. MR. NELSON is from MR. JOHNSON'S home district.

CHAPTER I.

I AM indebted to my dear parents (both now in heaven) for having had habits of order and regularity instilled into me at a very early age.

In that happy by-gone time I was taught to keep my hair tidy at all hours of the day and night, and to fold up every article of my clothing carefully, in the same order, on the same chair, in the same place at the foot of the bed, before retiring to rest. An entry of the day's events in my little diary invariably preceded the folding up. The Evening Hymn (repeated in bed) invariably followed the folding up. And the sweet sleep of childhood invariably followed the Evening Hymn.

In later life (alas!) the Hymn has been succeeded by sad and bitter meditations; and the sweet sleep has been but ill exchanged for the broken slumbers which haunt the uneasy pillow of care. On the other hand, I have continued to fold my clothes, and to keep my little diary. The former habit links me to my happy childhood—before papa was ruined. The latter habit—hitherto mainly useful in helping me to discipline the fallen nature which we all inherit from Adam—has unexpectedly proved important to my humble interests in quite another way. It has enabled poor Me to serve the caprice of a wealthy member of our family. I am fortunate enough to be useful (in the worldly sense of the word) to Mr. Franklin Blake.

I have been cut off from all news of the prosperous branch of the family for some time past. When we are isolated and poor we are not infrequently forgotten. I am now living, for economy's sake, in a little town in Brittany, inhabited by a select circle of serious English friends, and possessed of the advantages of a Protestant clergyman and a cheap market.

In this retirement—a Patmos amidst the howling ocean of popery that surrounds us—a book from England has reached me at last. I find my insignificant existence suddenly remembered by Mr. Franklin Blake. My wealthy relative—who, that I could add my spiritually-wealthy relative!—writes without even an attempt at disguising that he wants something of me. The whim has seized him to stir up the deplorable scandal of the Moonstone; and I am to help him by writing the account of what I myself witnessed during my sojourn at Aunt Verinder's house in London. Pecuniary remuneration is offered to me—with the want of feeling peculiar to the rich. I am to reopen wounds that Time has barely closed; I am to recall the most intensely painful remembrances—and this done, I am to feel myself compensated by a new laceration, in the shape of Mr. Blake's check. My nature is weak. It cost me a hard struggle, before Christian fortitude completely conquered sinful pride, and self-denial accepted the check.

Without my diary, I doubt—pray let me express it in the grossest terms!—if I could have honestly earned my money. With my diary, the poor laborer (who forgives Mr. Blake for insulting her) is worthy of her hire. Nothing escaped me at the time when I was staying with dear Aunt Verinder. Every thing was entered (thanks to my early training) day by day as it happened; and every thing, down to the smallest particular, shall be told here. My sacred regard for truth is (thank God) far above my respect for persons. It will be easy for Mr. Blake to suppress what may not prove to be sufficiently flattering in these pages to the person chiefly concerned in them. He has purchased my time; but even his wealth can purchase my conscience too.*

My diary informs me that I was accidentally passing Aunt Verinder's house in Montagu Square, on Monday, 3d July, 1848.

Seeing the shutters opened, and the blinds drawn up, I felt that it would be an act of polite attention to knock and make inquiries. The person who answered the door informed me that my aunt and her daughter (I really can not call her my cousin!) had arrived from the country a week since, and meditated making some stay in London. I sent up a message of kind inquiry, declining to disturb them, and only begging to know whether I could be of any use.

The person who answered the door took my message in insolent silence and left me standing in the hall. She is the daughter of a holder old man named Betteredge, long, for aught I know, in my aunt's family. I sat down in the hall to wait for my answer—and having always a few tracts in my bag I selected one which proved to be quite providentially applicable to the person who answered the door. The hall was dirty and the chair was hard; but the blessed consciousness of returning good for evil raised me quite above any trifling consideration of that kind. The tract was one of a series addressed to young women on the sinfulness of dress. In style it was decently familiar. Its title was, "A Word With You On Your Cap-Ribbons."

"My lady is much obliged, and begs you will come and lunch to-morrow at two."

I passed over the manner in which she gave her message, and the dreadful boldness of her look. I thanked this young castaway; and I said, in a tone of Christian interest, "Will you favor me by accepting a tract?"

She looked at the title. "Is it written by a man or a woman, Miss? If it's written by a woman, I had rather not read it on that account. If it's written by a man, I beg to inform him that he knows nothing about it." She handed me back the tract and opened the door. We must see the good seed somehow. I waited till the door was shut on me, and slipped the tract into the letter-box. When I had dropped another tract through the area railings I felt relieved, in some small degree, of a heavy responsibility toward others.

We had a meeting that evening of the Select Committee of the Mothers'-Small-Clothes-Conversion-Society. The object of this excellent Charity is—as all serious persons know—to rescue unredeemed fathers' trowsers from the pawnbroker, and to prevent their resumption, on the part of the irreclaimable sex, into the society here, because my precious and admirable friend, Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite, was associated with our work of moral and material usefulness. I had expected to see him in the board-room on the Monday evening of which I am now writing, and had purposed to tell him when we met of dear Aunt Verinder's arrival in London. To my great disappointment he never appeared. On my expressing a feeling of surprise at his absence my sisters of the Committee all looked up together from their trowsers (we had a great pressure of business that night) and asked in amazement if I had not heard the news. I acknowledged my ignorance, and was then told for the first time of an event which forms, so to speak, the starting-point of this narrative. On the previous Friday two gentlemen—occupying widely different positions in society—had been the victims of an outrage which had startled all London. One of the gentlemen was Mr. Septimus Luker, of Lambeth. The other was Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite.

Living in my present isolation, I have no means of introducing the newspaper-account of the outrage into my narrative. I was also deprived, at the time, of the inestimable advantage of hearing the events related by the fervid eloquence of Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite. All I can do is to state the facts as they were stated, on that Monday evening, to me; proceeding on the plan which I have been taught from infancy to adopt in folding up my clothes. Every thing shall be put neatly, and every thing shall be put in its place. These lines are written by a poor weak woman. From a poor weak woman who will be cruel enough to expect more?

The date—thanks to my dear parents, no dictionary that ever was written can be more particular than I am about dates—was Friday, June 23, 1848.

Early on that memorable day our gifted Mr. Godfrey happened to be cashing a check at a banking-house in Lombard Street. The name of the firm is accidentally blotted in my diary, and my sacred regard for truth forbids me to hazard a guess in a matter of this kind. Fortunately, the name of the firm doesn't matter. What does matter is a circumstance that occurred when Mr. Godfrey had transacted his business. On gaining the door he encountered a gentleman—a perfect stranger to him—who was accidentally leaving the office exactly at the same time as himself. A momentary contest of politeness ensued between them as to who should be the first to pass through the door of the bank. The stranger insisted on making Mr. Godfrey precede him; Mr. Godfrey said a few civil words; they bowed, and parted in the street.

Thoughtless and superficial people may say, Here is surely a very trumpery little incident related in an absurdly circumstantial manner. Oh, my young friends and fellow-sinners! beware of presuming to exercise your poor carnal reason. Oh, be morally tidy! Let your faith be as your stockings, and your stockings as your faith. Both ever spotless, and both ready to put on at a moment's notice!

I beg a thousand pardons. I have fallen insensibly into my lamentably-lofty style. Most inappropriate in such a record as this. Let me try to be worldly—let me say that trifles, in this case as in many others, fell to terrible results. Merely premising that the polite stranger was Mr. Luker, of Lambeth, we will now follow Mr. Godfrey home to his residence at Kilburn.

He found waiting for him, in the hall, a poorly clad but delicate and interesting-looking little boy. The boy handed him a letter, merely mentioning that he had been intrusted with it by an old lady whom he did not know, and who had given him no instructions to wait for an answer. Such incidents as these were not uncommon in Mr. Godfrey's large experience as a promoter of public charities. He let the boy go, and opened the letter.

The handwriting was entirely unfamiliar to him. It requested his attendance, within an hour's time, at a house in Northumberland Street, Strand, which he had never had occasion to enter before. The object sought was to obtain from the worthy manager certain details on the subject of the Mothers'-Small-Clothes-Conversion-Society, and the information was wanted by an elderly lady who proposed aiding largely to the resources of the charity, if her questions were met by satisfactory replies. She mentioned her name, and she added that the shortness of her stay in London prevented her from giving any longer notice to the eminent philanthropist whom she addressed.

Ordinary people might have hesitated before setting aside their own engagements to suit the convenience of a stranger. The Christian Hero never hesitates where good is to be done. Mr. Godfrey instantly turned back, and proceeded to the house in Northumberland Street. A most respectable though somewhat corpulent man answered the door, and, on hearing Mr. Godfrey's name, immediately conducted him into an empty apartment at the back, on the drawing-room floor. He noticed two unusual things on entering the room. One of them was a faint odor of musk and camphor. The other was an ancient Oriental manuscript, richly illuminated with Indian figures and devices, that lay open to inspection on a table.

He was looking at the book, the position of which caused him to stand with his back turned toward the closed folding-doors communicating with the front-room, when, without the slightest previous noise to warn him, he felt himself suddenly seized round the neck from behind. He had just time to notice that the arm round his neck was naked and of a very brown color, before his eyes were bandaged, his mouth was gagged, and he was thrown helpless on the floor by (as he judged) two men. A third rifled his pockets, and—if, as a lady, I may venture to use such an expression—searched him, without ceremony, through and through in skin.

Here I should greatly enjoy saying a few cheering words on the devout confidence which could alone have sustained Mr. Godfrey in an emergency so terrible as this. Perhaps, however, the position and appearance of my admirable friend at the culminating period of the outrage (as above described) are hardly within the proper limits of female discussion. Let me pass over the next few moments, and return to Mr. Godfrey at the time when the odious search of his person had been completed. The outrage had been perpetrated throughout in dead silence. At the end of it some words were exchanged, among the invisible wretches, in a language which he did not understand, but in terms which were plainly expressive (to his cultivated ear) of disappointment and rage. He was suddenly lifted from the ground, placed in a chair, and bound there hand and foot. The next moment he felt the air flowing in from the open door, listened and felt reassured that he was alone again in the room.

An interval elapsed, and he heard a sound below like the rustling sound of a woman's dress. It advanced up the stairs, and stopped. A female screen rent the atmosphere of guilt. A man's voice below exclaimed, "Quick!" A man's feet attended the stairs. Mr. Godfrey felt Christian fingers unfastening his bandage, and extracting his gag. He looked in amazement at two respectable strangers, and faintly articulated, "What does it mean?" The two respectable strangers looked back, and said, "Exactly the question we were going to ask you."

The inevitable explanation followed. No! Let me be scrupulously particular. Sal volatile and water followed, to compose dear Mr. Godfrey's nerves. The explanation came next.

It appeared, from the statement of the landlord and landlady of the house (persons of good repute in the neighborhood), that their first and second floor apartments had been engaged, on the previous day, for a week certain, by a most respectable-looking gentleman—the same who has been already described as answering the door to Mr. Godfrey's knock. The gentleman had paid the week's rent and all the week's extras in advance, stating that the apartments were wanted for three Oriental noblemen, friends of his, who were visiting England for the first time. Early on the morning of the outrage two of the gentlemen strangers, accompanied by their respectable English friend, took possession of the apartments. The third was expected to join them shortly; and the luggage (reported as very bulky) was announced to follow when it had passed through the Custom-house, late in the afternoon. Not more than ten minutes previous to Mr. Godfrey's visit the third foreigner had arrived. Nothing out of the common had happened, to the knowledge of the landlord and landlady down stairs, until within the last five minutes—when they had sent the three foreigners, accompanied by their respectable English friend, all leave the house together, walking quietly in the direction of the Strand. Remembering that a visitor had called, and not having seen the visitor also leave the house, the landlady had thought it a very strange thing that the woman should be left by herself up stairs. After a short discussion with her husband she had considered it advisable to ascertain whether any thing was wrong. The result had followed, as I have already attempted to describe it; and there the question of the landlord and the landlady came to an end.

"WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST PREVIOUS NOISE TO WARN HIM, HE FELT HIMSELF SUDDENLY SEIZED ROUND THE NECK FROM BEHIND."

* NOTE. Added by Franklin Blake.—Miss Clack may make her mind quite easy on this point. Nothing will be added, altered, or removed, in her manuscript, or in any of the other manuscripts which pass through my hands. Whatever opinions any of the writers may express, whatever peculiarities of treatment may mark, and perhaps, in a literary sense, disfigure the narratives which I am now collecting, not a line will be tampered with any where, from first to last. As genuine documents they are sent to me—and as genuine documents I shall preserve them, indorsed by the attestations of witnesses who can speak to the facts. It only remains to be added, that "the person chiefly concerned" in Miss Clack's narrative is happy enough at the present moment not only to brave the strictest exercise of the Law of Libel, but even to recognize its unquestionable value as an instrument for the exhibition of Miss Clack's character.

An investigation was next made in the room. Dear Mr. Godfrey's property was found scattered in all directions. When the articles were collected, however, the damage was amazingly little; chairs, purse, keys, pocket-handkerchief, note-book, and all his loose papers had been closely examined, and had then been left untouched to be resumed by the owner. In the same way not the smallest morsel of property belonging to the foreigners of the house had been disturbed. The Oriental noblemen had removed their own illuminated manuscript, and had removed nothing else.

What did it mean? Taking the worldly point of view, it appeared to mean that Mr. Godfrey had been the victim of some incomprehensible error, committed by certain unknown men. A dark conspiracy was on foot in the midst of us; and our before-time innocent friend had been entangled in its meshes. When the Christian hero of a hundred chivalric victories plunges into a pitfall that has been dug for him by mistake, oh, what a warning it is to the rest of us to be unceasingly on our guard! How soon may our own evil passions prove to be Oriental noblemen who pounce on us unawares!

I could write pages of affectionate warning on this one theme. (Ah, ha! I am my normal self to improve—I am concerned to narrate. My wealthy relative's check—henceforth the incubus of my existence—assures me that I have not done with this record of violence yet. We must leave Mr. Godfrey to recover at Northumberland Street, and must follow the proceedings of Mr. Luker at a later period of the day.

After leaving the bank, Mr. Luker had visited various parts of London on business errands. Returning to his own residence he found a letter waiting for him, which was delivered by having been left a short time previously by a boy. In this case, as in Mr. Godfrey's case, the handwriting was unknown, but the name mentioned was the name of one of Mr. Luker's customers. His correspondent announced (writing in the third person, and signing by the hand of a deputy) that he had been unexpectedly summoned to London. He had just established himself in lodgings in Mr. Luker's Cottenham Court house, and he desired to see Mr. Luker immediately, on the subject of a purchase which he contemplated having. The gentleman was an enthusiastic collector of Oriental antiquities, and had been for many years a liberal patron of the establishment in Cottenham Court. Oh, when shall we ourselves from the worship of Mammon! Mr. Luker called a cab, and drove off instantly to his liberal patron.

Exactly what had happened to Mr. Godfrey in Northumberland Street now happened to Mr. Luker in Cottenham Court. Once more the respectable man answered the door, and showed the visitor up stairs into the back drawing-room. There, again, the illuminated manuscript, on a table. Mr. Luker's attention was absorbed, as Mr. Godfrey's attention had been absorbed, by this beautiful work of Indian art. He too was aroused from his studies by a tawny naked arm round his throat—by a bandage over his eyes—and by a gag in his mouth. He too was thrown prostrate, and searched to the skin. A longer interval had elapsed than had passed in the experience of Mr. Godfrey; but it had ended as before, in the persons of the house suspecting something wrong, and giving up peace as to what had happened. Precisely the same explanation which the landlord in Northumberland Street had given to Mr. Godfrey the landlady in Alfred Place now gave to Mr. Luker. Both had been imposed on in the same way by the plausible address and the well-polished purse of the respectable stranger, who introduced himself as acting for his foreign friends. The one point of difference between the two cases occurred when the scattered contents of Mr. Luker's pockets were being collected from the floor. His watch and purse were safe, but (less fortunate than Mr. Godfrey) one of the loose papers that he carried about him had been taken away. The paper in question acknowledged the receipt of a valuable of great price which Mr. Luker had that day left in the care of his bankers. This document would be useless for purposes of fraud, inasmuch as it provided that the valuable should only be given up on the personal application of the owner. As soon as he recovered himself, Mr. Luker hurried to the bank, on the chance that the thieves who had robbed him might ignorantly present themselves with the receipt. Nothing had been seen of them when he arrived at the establishment, and nothing was seen of them afterward. Their respectable English friend had (in the opinion of the bankers) looked the receipt over before they attempted to make use of it, and had given them the necessary warning in good time.

Information of these outrages was communicated to the police, and the needful investigations were pursued, I believe, with great energy. The authorities held that a robbery had been planned, on insufficient information received by the thieves. They had been plainly not sure whether Mr. Luker had, or had not, handed the treasure-paper to his precious gem to another person, and poor polite Mr. Godfrey had paid the penalty of having been unfortunately appealing to him. Add to this, that Mr. Godfrey's absence from our Monday evening meeting had been accounted for by consultations of the authorities, at which he was requested to assist—and all the explanations required being now given, I may proceed with the simpler matter of my own little personal experiences in Montagu Square.

I was punctual to the luncheon-hour on Tuesday. Reference to my diary shows this to have been a checkered day—much in it to be devoutly regretted, much in it to be devoutly thankful for.

Dear Aunt Verinder received me with her usual genial kindness. She was in good spirits after a little while that something was wrong. Certain anxious looks escaped my aunt, all of which took the direction of my humble self. I never saw Rachel myself without wondering how it can be that so insignificant-looking a person should be the child of such a remarkable mother as Sir John and Lady Verinder. On this occasion however, she not only disappointed—she really shocked me. There was a total absence of all lucklike restraint in her language and manner most painful to see. She was possessed by some fever—all exclusively which made her thoroughly look when she laughed, and sinfully wasteful and capricious in what she ate and drank at lunch. I felt deeply for her case before I knew what the true state of the case had been confidentially made known to me.

Luncheon over, my aunt said: "Remember what the doctor told you, Rachel, about quieting yourself with a book after taking your meals."

"I'll go into the library, mamma," she answered. "But if Godfrey calls, mind I am told of it. I am dying for more news of him, after his adventure in Northumberland Street." She kissed her mother, and left us. My aunt looked my way. "Good-by, Clack!" she said, cavalierly. Her insolence roused no angry feeling in me. I only made a private memorandum to pray for her.

When we were left by ourselves my aunt told me the whole story of the robbery in Montagu mound, which, I am happy to know, it is not necessary to repeat here. She did not conceal from me that she would have preferred keeping silence on the subject. But when her own servants all knew of the loss of the Moonstone, and when some of them recognized Rachel's picture, found their way into the newspapers—when strangers were speculating whether there was any connection between what had happened at Lady Verinder's country house, and what had happened in Northumberland Street and Alfred Place—concealment was out of the question, and perfect frankness became a necessity as well as a virtue.

Some persons, hearing what I now heard, would have been probably overwhelmed with astonishment. For my own part, knowing Rachel as I did, I was prepared to hear something more than ordinary. If the Moonstone, apart from her childhood upward, it was her own property. And if she had taken it, what then? Why, then she had taken it. I felt sorry for her case before I knew what it was, and I only made a private memorandum to pray for her.

The one thing that did shock me was the course my aunt had taken under the circumstances. Here surely was a case for the police, if ever there was one yet! Lady Verinder had thought it a case for a physician. All my poor aunt's early life had been passed in the society of the medical profession. The natural result again! Oh, dear, dear, the natural result again!

"The doctor recommends plenty of exercise and amusement for Rachel, and strongly urges me to leave this house as much as possible from dwelling on the past," said Lady Verinder.

"Oh, what heathen advice!" I thought to myself. "In this Christian country, what heathen advice!"

My aunt went on: "I do my best to carry out the doctor's wishes. But this strange adventure of Godfrey's happens at a most unfortunate time. Rachel has been incessantly made a subject of remark in the matter of it. She left me no peace till I had written and asked my nephew Ablewhite to come here. She says she has confidence in that gentleman's advice on Rachel's part. She is keeping a secret from you and from every body. May there not be something in these recent events which threatens her secret with discovery?"

"Discovery?" repeated my aunt. "What can you possibly mean? Discovery through Mr. Luker? Discovery through my nephew?"

As the word passed her lips a special providence occurred. The servant opened the door, and announced Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite.

THE SQUIRE'S TEMPER-TRAP.

IN SEVEN CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER I.

THAT Taffey was a Welshman no one who had ever made an attempt to spell the locality in which he had been born and bred would venture to deny. But we can accompany the lyrist no further. Taffey was not a "thief." The piece of beef which formed his Sunday's dinner was very rarely filched from any house but my lady-elect's. Taffey stole nothing but the hearty good-will and liking of every body that knew him. He was a merry, jolly fellow, on working-days, as you would desire to see; but when he came out on the Sabbath, close-shaven, and in a shirt as white as his own conscience, Kendleham Abbey, Kendleham itself, safe never permitted any thing of a more exciting nature until after morning service), there are, I am warranted in saying, dukes—I request the expression, dukes—who have appeared to less advantage.

Taffey was, in fact, a blacksmith. The sedulous care of farriage (if there is no such word, there ought to be) was held to have attained its climax in the shoeing of Taffey. Dull nature should select model hoofs, art could do no more to supply her deficiencies. His plates might be worn off in the thing rounded between the wearer's hoofs and the hard Welsh roads but a wafer bright as silver, bending into a ring for your wife's little finger, yet they were never lost nor loosened. It was an often-quoted saying of the squire's (uttered, I fear, rather in envy than admiration, alas, but never formally recanted), that if he, Theophilus Hurbandine, of Libwydcoed, in the shire of Flint, were to ride his charger in Grosvenor Square, he would, nevertheless, send down every horse in his stable to be shod, as usual, by David Taffey.

Taffey loved his business. Business returned his affection. That shed of his was never vacant for half an hour together.

"Bless the brutes! Wheer they comes from I do' know—nather why they comes to me so duly," would Taffey say, sweeping the accumulation from his brow with the dingy turban formed by his tucked-up sleeve. And still the stamping of impatient hoofs, the shouting of uneasy tits went on from morning till night; the fire never ceasing its roar, the little crowd of idlers round the half-door never at all more diminishing, as lit boys stood in their fathers' places with their fingers, like those fathers', in their mouths—their eyes eagerly watching the sparkling feast of fire into another generation.

It will be readily believed that Taffey was a man worth the knowing. Not only was he a man to drink, are almost always thriving men. So, I have observed, are millers. And whereas, nine times in ten, the miller's characteristics about to be taken, your miller has a lovely child with blue eyes and a skin white as her father's meal-sacks, so, in like manner, the blacksmith had a blooming daughter, with a cheek as brown as, though considerably smoother than, that of her sire.

Ah, me! that same girl known of from Libwydcoed to Aberthwy. Her hair was of the color of the horse-chestnut fresh from its brown coat—not over-curled, with regard to the blush with which, among many other pretty things, she returned from market excursions, on something that resembled a bale of berskins or castors, but was popularly believed to be a pony within—as touching, I say, that blush, I can only aver that, were it not a sin, I would gladly wish that natural rose for six months certain than be gifted with a diamond forever from the hands of the most accomplished dispenser of fine-bred lies ever compounded a Bond Street wash.

Next to her father Jane Taffey, and when you had sufficiently admired her little supple figure, you would probably find yourself attracted by Katy's foot—not the dainty development of the fascinations of a pair of bright steel buckles once the property of her grandmother, which it was her whim to wear, as of the symmetry of the member they adorned, and the light decisive tread, displaying a grace no dancing-mistress could have taught. Katy was unconscious of her very exist. The folks about her admired before they knew why.

As she grew up, this peculiar grace—it was almost a queenly manner and consequent reserve of her the ride of "my lady," invented, it was believed, by her father himself; and by this she was generally known among condescending and participative of what was to follow. Fairy godmothers have still adherents in Wales, and it was by no means the first time that a group from the friends that the benignant influence which had conferred such attractive gifts upon "my lady" in infancy would in due course bring forth from the expectant prince or other eminent person destined to claim Katy for his bride.

The last morning of March, the finally of Mr. Taffey being situated just within the porch of the little village church, its occupants were usually among the first to be astir in Kendleham. But they were not well lekit and popular to be suffered to escape unobserved. Overtaken and surrounded, pleasant were the conversations that ensued around a certain stile at which Mr. Taffey's Sunday route diverged from the village way, and led across the meadows toward a little farm he rented from the squire, Mr. Hurbandine aforesaid.

Many were the greetings from the passer-by, and none more cordial than from the squire himself, who, walking between his handsome haughty-looking sons, suspended a rather animated conversation in which he was engaged with the elder, in order to exchange a word of kindness with his humble friend.

"Trot up to the place to-morrow, Taffey, if you have half an hour to spare," he turned to add, "and speak about Ten-Tree Meadow. Never mind Hardham; you and I will settle the matter between us."

Taffey bowed, but, though he was pleased with the squire's affability, his countenance was somehow overcast, as he gazed after them.

The sons of Mr. Hurbandine, of Libwydcoed, were thought to have inherited, with their mother's patrician blood, something of her patrician pride. She was a Vaux of Vaussour. If we have been at once a Vere and a Vaussour might well have turned an ordinary brain. Something had affected the poor lad's brain; and, as one of fairies was that her veins were filled with the bright-red Proustian hue, it might be fairly concluded that pride of ancestry was not devoid of blame.

Lady Geraldine was now at rest with a select and polished circle of her acquaintance, who enjoyed a mausoleum all to themselves, in a picturesque corner of the ancestral domain, where a rank of stately yews and cypresses, overawing the stalwart lackeys who had once kept aloof the tide of common humanity, shut exactly out the vulgar little lych-yard church, to which were merely intrusted the marble virtues, and granite honors of the departed V. V. s.

The squire was a good deal of a man. Assuming none of those mysterious responsibilities wealth is supposed to bring, lived much among his tenantry, and made his forty thousand a year as serviceable to the interests of the land and its cultivators as his lights permitted. Of course he was in Parliament—a back bencher, conservative, and—need it be added?—voted with his diminishing party like a man. Reports are silent as to his oratorical display. He had the wisdom, as a wise seldom is to be little short of calamity—that of giving way to gusts of sudden passion. Gentle in their intensity, and therefore more grievous to witness by the disproportion to them of the exciting cause. Those paroxysms were unfortunately rare in the man, and the squire's subsequent remorse, not to mention the profuse liberality with which he strove to atone in some measure for the wrongs his passion had inflicted, went far toward reconciling those about him to the occasional interruption of harmony.

Lady Geraldine was the only magician who could control these paroxysms. This was not by reason of her exalted rank. The squire had no armchairs relative to Vere-Vaussour, and made many of the race welcome to his halls; but he saw no more in them than ordinary (sometimes very ordinary) gentlemen and gentlewomen. Jack Hornidge, whose genius resided exclusively in a colonel's uniform and "leaders," was the same distinction that was paid to the most illustrious of Lady Geraldine's lineage.

In the very height of the squire's fury his lady had been seen to raise her thin, white hand without a word. As if stunned with the dint of some fell weapon, her husband would sink down, like has its virtues, and Lady Geraldine suffered none to see that when, in lifting her hand, the kerchief slid from the wrist and bared the arm. In the first passionate outburst after their marriage Hurbandine had seized his wife's arm with such unconsidered violence that her head-dress, unchanging, cut into the delicate flesh, causing a painful wound and an indelible scar. This was the revelation made by the momentary action of the unresponsive fury, could strike down the manly squire, shocked, shamed, discomfited.

Hence was it that Lady Geraldine, with all her pride, was a favorite with those who saw how promptly this soothing influence was exercised by a meek and gentle heart. Hence was it that she became, as we have said, insane, the loss of her benign interposition was felt by not a few. For Hurbandine, as he had been known to say, even the respect due to a landlord could always overcome the resentment excited by that landlord's bearing in his hair-trigger rages.

When the squire and his sons passed them, as described, the younger, Hochford, had joined in the sire's grumble at the "confounded" or rather saucy smile and a glance, a trifle more prolonged than was absolutely necessary, at the blushing Katy. Now, as she had, the while, her head bowed yet looked, but strode haughtily forward, hardly checked by his father's momentary pause.

"Something wrong with the shoe again," remarked Mr. Taffey, moodily, as he turned away. "I Wants a nail somewheer. 'Tis Mr. Rochford, I'm afraid."

"Well, now, I don't think there's so much harm in him," said Mrs. Taffey, on whose frank, buxom face the slight expression of evil or suspicion looked so little at home that it was instantly detected. "I declare to goodness, no. A nicer-mannered, freer-spoken, merrier-laughed—"

"Hallo! here's a bust of elokence!" ejaculated Mr. Taffey, stopping short in his mechanical attempt to admire the speaker. "Why, Maggie, you've been a-borrern of David Apreece! You're a good creetur, you're, my conscience! But, Conseekently, when you has to find fault, you does it by praising thiesen too much, and saying nothen, for less, o' theer! Ah, that's Katy Vaus, you'll find, my lass, triumphantly, for his fine vanity was a supposed gift of divining character! "And who is that?? Why who could it be but Mr. Gerald? And what's he done for to offend you? That's how I'd speak it, Conseekented the worthy smith, with, it must be owned, less point than usual, his interrogative look proving that he did not read it off.

"I never said he done any thing," replied his wife: "I only said, Edard, that a nicer-mannered, freer-spoken, merrier-l—"

"I know wot you said," retorted Mr. Taffey. "Question is, wot you didn't say! Freer-spoken! He's a—trot on, a little, Katy, as I've decreed deal too free with some of us, specially such as wears caps and ribbinges. Merry? Course he is. He's a joke to him a thing Katy'll reads it. He'd better take to another line o' business, and not be hanging 's much about the village, turning the heads— Did you see your nice-mannered gent making eyes at—at that's ?" (Mr. Taffey gulped something, and shot out his brawny fist in the direction of Katy's twinkling heels) "making the lass turn as red's a peony!"

"I saw it, but I'm not afeard," said the mother. "She don't like it. That's all."

"When I was young," observed Mr. Taffey, "when a young 'oman turned as red's a rose, she did like it."

"It's not him—Mr. Rochford. There!" said his wife, "I outs with it. Why, you blessed old babby! can't you see? It's Mr. Gerald!"

"Whe-ee-ew!" whistled the student of character; "here's a kittle full! And very hookedfishes they are. Come, how is it all, old 'oman? Queer that I, as reads things quicker than most, shouldn't have put my finger on what you see's the girl's rank by that haughty, stuck-up fellow, wot despises his own father 'cos he won't born a lord? Is that it?"

"Well, that's a little of it," replied his wife. "I don't think but 'tis all on his side. Why, when they passed, just now, the young squire didn't give her so much as a look!"

"I see. Do you think, old 'oman, nobody has eyes in their heads but you? He don't care a rusty nail for her. That's how I reads it," said Mr. Taffey.

"You reads it upside down, then," replied his helpmate, "or p'raps you doon't read far enough. That means, he do like the girl; that he's afeerd of's father; that Mr. Rochford knows it, and likes to be the child or he does not. Then, they do say that Mr. Rochford an't best friends with his brother. Now, he's the squire's favorite, and if there come any trouble to-day between the father and t'other, which's temper's as bad, one as t'other," explained Mrs. Taffey, "Mr. Rochford might come for to favor, and if Katy—"

"That's like readin' to the end of the volhum, and a little further," replied Mr. Taffey. "Well, and the lass, for short of it's this: I 'ont have these town swells—no, narrer one of 'em, squire or lord—a-dancing 'our 'ousen' our Katy. I'm going up to squire to-morrow—you heerd'n ask me—about Ten-tree Meadow, and if I don't tell—"

"Never be such a suggestion!" exclaimed his wife, in great alarm. "Squire have been very bad lately, that's certain. Something have gone wrong, maybe; his furies worse than they was ever know'd to be. Nobody's sure of him, poor gentleman. One moment as smooth as butter, the next like a mad thing. Don't think of speaking to him—now don't ye, Edward."

"Take the admonition, oh vicine (that is, oh my neighbor, in dooce 'r vicinity!)," piped a small voice at Mr. Taffey's elbow. It was that of Mr. David Morgan Apreece, the village schoolmaster. "I isn't ahe good reasons wor?"

"Well, she's summut in that line o' business," replied Mr. Taffey, guardedly; "specially when the wind's west. We was just talking of the squire. My missis have heerd he's been in his tempers, horrid."

"Let him get another wife," said Mr. Apreece.

"A wife!"

"While my lady lived," continued the schoolmaster, "the squire's tantrums were few, and over directly. They never got beyond her. She caught 'em, like rats, or such vermin, and turned 'em out when they couldn't hurt each body. My wife called her the squire's temper-trap."

"I've seen her shut him up," said Mr. Taffey, "in less than half a jiffy! She only with her hand. Curiousest thing I ever see! I wanted to try it on my missis, but she doon't give a man a chance."

"Get the squire married, and all's right again," said Mr. Apreece.

"Well, I'm goin' up to hall to-morrow," said Mr. Taffey, "and, if squire asks my opinion on the pint o' marriage I'll give't him hot and strong. I can't speak fairer'n t'other, 'cos it don't belong to Ten-tree Meadow."

"Do your best, then," said Mr. Apreece, laughing. "Here I must leave you, neighbors."

CHAPTER II.

As they neared the little farm-house, a figure that had been dimly noticed flitting—let us rather say lazily loitering the tree-tops among, in sight, in the stalwart person of young Thomas Fullalie. Even in his well-brushed velveteen coat, not wintered in the pattern or nap which that it might have passed for an attempt to epitomize the flora of South Wales, Thomas looked every inch the hardy yeoman. That he was in love with Katy, and had as much hope of winning her as of allying himself with the reigning house of Britain, was written legibly upon his broad face.

Sharp-sighted Mrs. Taffey probably knew that, and, if she did not warn off the unlucky Thomas, her reasons were manifold. The matter had not been presented to her official notice. The attachment was of long date, and Fullalie could attempt by a person of Mr. Fullalie's artful disposition and polish, style to win such a fly as Katy, deserved all the punishment disappointment could entail. Finally, the rumor that rather offended Fullalie's white feather prowess was county-wide, was keeping company (or persuading himself that he did so) with Katy Taffey, was sufficient to warning off many troublesome youths inclined to venture too near that pretty Catherine-wheel.

Thomas, however, was human. He was also practical. Unlike those troubadours who preferred obdurate mistresses—else what would become of their melodious despair?—Mr. Fullalie saw no fun in unrequited passion. He had now been for nearly two years dancing—or, to speak more accurately, prowling—about Miss Taffey. Jokes, he had reason to apprehend, were being cut at his expense. Thomas had resolved to bring matters to a crisis of some sort; and, accordingly, throwing an extra amount of splendor into his attire, and of sullenness (meant for dejection) into his broad visage, he marched, as we have seen, upon the foe.

At the first sight of the van-guard—Katy—Thomas was thrown into such disorder that he fell back upon the plantation, but, rallying, was the first to commence the action.

"Mornin', Miss."

"Good-morning, Mr. Thomas," said Katy, showing the pearls to such in such wise that Thomas's teeth danced in his head. "You'll dine with us? Father's just behind." And she vanished into the house.

Thomas encountered the main body with his usual dark and sullenness.

"Mornin', Mrs. Taffey. Mornin', Mr. Taffey."

Greetings exchanged, Mrs. Taffey remarked, in the friendly cooing voice of a mother to a cousin, "You'll take a snap with us, Mr. Thomas?" And, without waiting for an answer, followed her daughter.

A dreadful feeling that this one, of many "snaps," might be his final one in that house kept Mr. Fullalie silent for a moment, when the smith said:

"The women woon't be ready yet a while. Come and look at the cow-'us I've run up t'other side the slush."

Thomas glanced at his own apparel, and thought that this agricultural excursion might have been more happily timed. There's a reason for every thing. Slush and cow-house are excellent things in their way, but do not harmonize well with an exalted condition of mind; nor is their aroma, though healthy, suggestive of tender and sentimental. But the opportunity was too good to be lost. The two gentlemen walked away.

Thomas's great fair blue eyes would have opened wider still had he known that the cowhouse was a myth, and the smith no more intent than himself on calling his Sunday best in the locality he had described. Mr. Fullalie had been the last subject of conversation between Mr. and Mrs. Taffey, as they concluded their walk, and the former, like Thomas, had taken a resolution. Mr. Fullalie had been enough "about the place," and the wonder was that Katy's daughter's feeling, and drew a wide distinction between an honest, though misplaced, affection, and a fine gentleman's passion for a pretty beauty, resolved to warn off Thomas, for his own good, as he would have done the squire's sons, in Katy's interests.

Both strode on for a moment in silence. Then Thomas, fearing that the slush, to which they were unaccustomed, might injure, might interfere with the dialogue, commenced it.

It was a peculiarly well-known to his friends, that though Thomas Fullalie had been in conversation with one of them for an hour, he always commenced any new and interesting topic with a repetition of the morning greeting; consequently,

"Mornin', feather, said Thomas.

"Mornin', Thomas," responded Mr. Taffey, then making, so to speak, a bat at the subject, added, "but I'm not thy feather, nor an't like to be."

"Now, don't ye say that," said Thomas, in a choky voice.

"I say it, and I mean't; and 'tis for your sake I doos say't," returned his companion. "Come now, my lad, here's good two year you've been tryin' to get a word with our young horse, and she won't have it at no price."

"That ben't fair, I do say," said Thomas, warmly. "I've never had yo feather 'fore her face, and she never—"

"If you'd called me your grandmother 'mould 'a been all the same," replied the plain-spoken smith. "Katy wean't ha' none o' thee."

"If Mrs. Taffey and myself were to—"

"Stop a minute," said Mr. Taffey, halting suddenly. "Putt the twitch on Katy to make her marry the man she don't want? Not if I knows it. Now, lad, I don't want to quar'l wi' thee. 'Twas natteral thou liked'st our lass—equal natteral she didn't take to thee. For though there be a kist o' good in thee, when one gets at it, thou'rt a bit thick in the rind. When Katy marries, it'll be somebody different from thee. Coom, now, you says to yourself, 'Taffey's right,' you says. 'I'll go wheer I'll be cared about, and be looked up to, and be made a fuss of, and have trouble took concernin'," concluded Mr. Taffey, argumentatively. "That's how I reads you."

Mr. Fullalie did not answer, for though there had sunk upon his breast, and his eyes were fixed upon his gorgeous waistcoat. It seemed to him that even the unconscious garment had been affected by the shock, and that the roses and sunflowers shot up a lurid, angry glow, as if they said, "Thomas, Thomas, what is for this than such as we were wrought and worn?"

What other thoughts passed through his brain we (who has been singularly unsuccessful in attachments) can not say. But when Thomas did look up, his face was such that the smith started involuntarily, and asked him what was the matter.

"Matter! nothing," said Thomas, with a grin. "Nothin don't turn a man the color of a blind turnip!" remarked Mr. Taffey. "Coom, my lad, take it like a man. No use in a man cuttin' marry our Katy, that we shouldn't be good neighbors," said the worthy smith. "Coom, let's trot home. I think we needn't go to the cowhouse?"

"I think not," said Mr. Fullalie.

"Then coom to dinner."

"I've had dinner enow for one day," replied Thomas. And the expression that had shocked the smith came back into his face. Mr. Taffey did not press his invitation.

At the turn up to the farm-house they parted.

"You'll coom up to forge to-morrow, lad, with a smile on your face, 'stead of a glower like bottled thunder; and you'll say, 'All right, Taffey, I'll never heed.' That's how I reads you," said the smith. "But don't coom early. I'm going up to squire's."

The other turned round suddenly.

"Going up to squire's! What for?"

"That's tellin'," replied Mr. Taffey, joconsely, and without any real desire to make a mystery of it. "Fraps about a meadow, or—or *that*rage," he added, smiling, as the suggestion of the little schoolmaster occurred to him.

Young Fullalield looked at him fixedly for an instant, then, without speaking, turned and walked away.

"Going to quit's'e? To talk o' marriage?" he muttered. "Whose marriage? He'n't ? They call her 'my lady,' and they 'spect to make her one. I'll spoil that game. And Thomas shot back at the farm where his lost love was innocently boiling leeks for the Sunday dinner a glance so fiery that it might have ignited the thatch above her.

CHAPTER III.

MR. TAFFEY, on presenting himself next morning at the hall, was shown into the study. The squire had been called from his countenance, and gave way to an approving smile.

"Ten-tree Meadow is yours from Lady-day," he called out to the smith. Mr. Taffey's nose was visible within the door. "That's settled. Now come and look at this."

Mr. Taffey did, and expressed his decided opinion that the young lady was a nice, modest mannered young woman, sure enough, while the gentleman had a good deal fall in the back, and blood (the thought) about the pasterns.

"Right, Taffey," said the squire.

blood, well, the wonder was, was a gentleman which is more," he muttered, "then I would say of all his kin. He lost, to Miss Sukey Bubbs, his father's daughter, his heart, which was supposed to be about the size of a marrowfat pea. But I proved bigger: he married her."

"Good luck to you!" cried the honest smith, as cordially as if the pair had been just starting on their wedding-tour. "They was happy, I hope, Sir?"

"Merry as grasshoppers their livelong days," said the squire. "They've been dead thirty-five years, but all the fun of the family died out of it with Sukey Bubbs, that is, Lady Vavasour. He cotton't upon that. They've been a dull lot since, proid as peacocks, and as worthless," he added, sinking his voice as before. "Our blood is the color of water. They've been a dull lot.

"Well, I don't think but that pyrtelieve bceding in-and-in an't no good in the end," remarked the smith. "A cross that do give substance—"

"That's a nice-browed lassie of yours, Taffey," said the squire, suddenly changing his topic.

"So I've heerd 'm say," returned the smith, trying to look as if he hadn't quite made up his mind as to what was coming.

"Blue eyes and cherry lips are rather abundant in our neighborhood, I think," continued Mr. Rochford, as if he were used to tell the Llwydcoed girls were as good and modest as they were pretty."

"They're good mothers," said Mr. Taffey, significantly. "That's how I reads it."

"Right. They can not be too careful. Dangers every where," remarked the squire. "Those young fellows, boy-gardeners and the like, who do me the honor to come down, with my sons, to recruit their health and frames with wholesome food and twelve o'clock bed, won't disdain to chuck a country chit."

"I've known a-got of 'em, I'm sure, squire!" said Mr. Taffey, his eyes glistening with his own warm speech.

"Kind?"

"Seeing 'is a game we don't play at in these parts," explained the smith; and gnardsmen's ladies ain't going to be hard on our lads, if they come to disgrace."

"You speak warmly. Have you any thing to complain of in the way?" demanded the squire.

"Yes, Sir, I have," was the frank reply. But then he hesitated.

"Out with it, man!" said Mr. Hurbandine, his face assuming the expression recognized as indicative of an approaching "squall."

While Mr. Taffey stood, silently debating whether he would speak what was in his mind or no, the squire pointed to a writing-table.

"Pen and ink there scrawls. Do you know the hand? No," he continued, hastily; and, striding across the room, he scrambled up the letters, and flung them in a heap on the fire.

"Look you, Taffey, sundry maudlin individuals, whose names I don't care to see on hoist's labor to decipher, accuse me of sanctioning (I presume, by my non-interference) acts of impertinence and familiarity on the part of my London guests—my sons, I take it, included—which, if persisted in, may lead to painful consequences, and, at the least, entangle the very reverse of those affairs which have hitherto happily subsisted between the tenantry and the hall. This in plain English, and with a view to common and significance, is the purport of the letters I have destroyed. Tell me all about it."

"Isn't such as I can tell, squire," replied Mr. Taffey. "However, what I does know I'll say. First place, I can't make out who's been and written them letters. There's not many of us as does much in that way, 'cept my wisdney."

"Your what?"

"My neighbor," translated Mr. Taffey, "David Apreece. It wasn't him. He an't the man for to write any thing he 'oodn't put his name to; and in very big letters, too, specially his capital A's. It's a great thing, squire, is dedication."

Mr. Hurbandine admitted that it had its advantageous side; but, at present, willed Mr. Taffey to keep to the point. Had he, or not, reason to believe that the villagers had taken offense at some indiscretion on the part of the visitors at the hall? And what did he, Taffey, mean by saying that he himself had cause to complain?

Thus urged, the smith blurted out the truth.

It so happened that the valley and hamlet of Llbwydcoed were, as the squire had hinted, rather celebrated for the beauty of the rustic maidens. Katy, in fact, was but the rose of cottage class, boasted respectable descent; and all, as is noticeable in parts of the principality, showed tokens of a ruggedly and independent race, especially toward those who used them with what they regarded as undue familiarity. The manly squire opposed and pettied this feeling; and nothing was more calculated to evoke his anger than any complaint like those addressed to him by his anonymous correspondents. We can not be surprised that Mr. Taffey, aware of this, confessed, with a reluctance and embarrassment unusual with him, that there was something in the alleged grievance that needed to be put to rights. Gentlemen of polished aspect, with whiskers of ugly gold, shooting-coats of fashionable design, and highly condescending manners, had discovered picturesque beauties in the little hamlet, which had excited less observant visitors. A lounge and a smoke in the immediate purlieus of Llbwydcoed had grown to be an agreeable necessity with the squire's male guests. A familiarity with danger leads to contempt of it. Despite their well-known desire to offend—for the rustic belles soon began to notice, without alarm, the Honorable Tom Castleton's singular predilection for their cottages, and, perhaps, without resentment, my young Lord Leatherhead's humble request for information respecting the manufacture of goat's-milk cheese. What lovelier could there possible be in youths who, even in depraved London, could maintain a pure and healthy appetite for such fare and exercise? But they did not follow up the story pace by pace. The curly whisker and the flattering tongue carried the day with the best part of Llbwydcoed. Jealousy, the sweet-hearts, jealousy and distrust succeeded to gratified pride. There had been one or two serious disturbances (one, we believe, fatal) in the village, that, among other individuals "cantioned," my Lord Leatherhead had been openly denounced at the public-house to which resorted, and where; while the Honorable Tom Castleton was in the receipt of almost daily invitations of a public character, which it had become exceedingly difficult to decline.

Such was the substance of Mr. Taffey's representations, which could scarcely be called in question in his own words, without retarding the narrative. As he spoke, the gloom deepened on his hearer's face, and a dark flush, like that which raised his eyes for an instant and dropped them again, showed that a storm-burst was at hand. He was striving against his own will to restrain it.

"You—you spoke of yourself, Taffey," he said, in a stifled voice. "Let me understand that one of those leaping jack-puddings have insulted her—your pretty Katy, I mean?"

The smith's forehead flushed. He hesitated.

"Speak out, man!" said the squire. (An idea seemed to flash upon him.) "My sons! Do they—do either of them—dare—I see it in so. Which?" he thundered, starting up.

His imperious tone roused the spirit of the stalwart smith.

"Mr. Rochford, then," he shouted, in a voice as loud as the squire's, "since you wast have it. He's dawdling and dodging about our place more than I and my missis like—or the girl, either, for that matter. I was thinking of speaking to one or other of 'em; and now you've heerd it, why, take notice on it."

And Mr. Taffey caught up his hat.

Nothing excepts a man's passion more effectually than the unexpectedly finding his interlocutor in a greater passion still.

The squire grew pale and quiet, and re-seated himself in his chair.

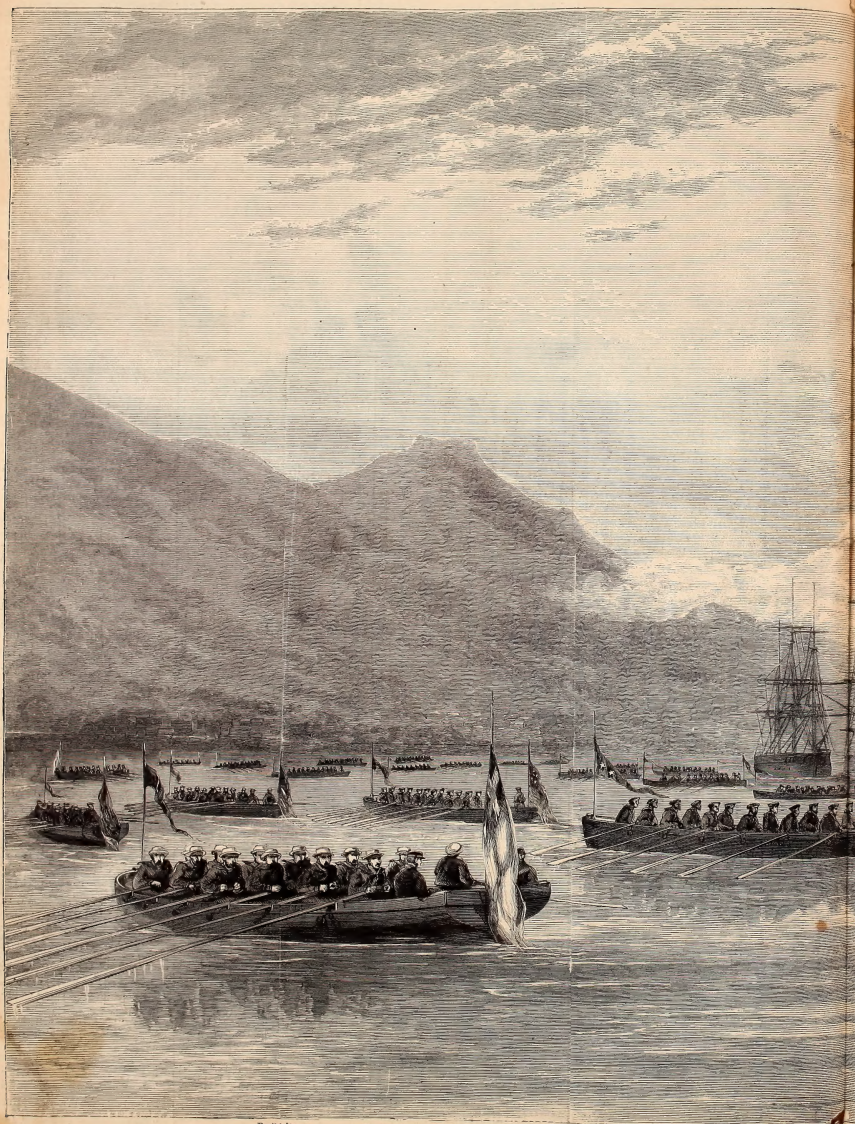
"Leave me now, my man. Go to old friend," he continued, quietly. "I will see to this matter. There shall be no more cause of complaint. I have known your pretty Katy as a child—believed, as she is known and prized in all the county. She and I have been friends from her cradle. Sukey Bubbs—Lady Vavasour, I should say—was Katy herself at fifteen. No fopling that bears my name, and is ashamed of it, shall turn her pretty head, and torment her with his airs. Leave me, my assessment of an idle hour! Leave it to me."

"Twas as precious near a blow up between us as ever I see," thought Mr. Taffey, as he walked home; "but I've settled matters, I round, which's summut. Now, I'll go and tell missis."

"Now, Edward," said his wife, "what's been a-going on a-surgery, I should think," remarked Mr. Taffey.

"You've arranged that matter with the squire?" inquired the schoolmaster, with a smile.

"What matter, wissiney?"



"About his marrying again, you know."

"He was talkin' of summut else," replied Mr. Taffey, "but, now you speak of it—"

He stood still suddenly, and looked in the other's face with a curious expression.

"Now I speak of it—" prompted Mr. Apreece.

"I've seen oalkelier things come to pass," said the smith. And they parted.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE ADMIRAL HENRY H. BELL, OF THE ASIATIC SQUADRON OF THE UNITED STATES

TED STATES NAVY, AT HIOGO, JAPAN, JANUARY 14, 1868.—SKETCHED BY FREDERICK G. S. MELBYE.—[SEE PAGE 218.]

THE JAPANESE REVOLUTION.

THE latest news from Japan indicates that the revolution organized to oppose the liberal and civilizing policy of STOTS BASHI, the late TYCOON, in regard to foreign intercourse, and which was inaugurated simultaneously with the opening of the new treaty ports of Hiogo and Osacca, is of the most serious character, and one which is to affect in greater or lesser degree the commercial interests of every country trading with the East. And in view of these geographical situation and present commercial and maritime subvenues in that direction, it particularly interests the people of the United States. The loss of Admiral BELL by drowning on the bar of Osacca also serves to direct the attention of our public to the facts of the Japanese revolution.

The agitation of the question of foreign commercial intercourse was begun in Japan many years since by the merchants, and it was opposed by the large land-owners. In fact, it is a struggle between commercial and agricultural interests. The late TYCOON, STOTS BASHI, recognized as one of the ablest of Japan statesmen, although the head of one of the principal families of Japan, and a prince of the realm before his accession to the throne, was inclined to the policy of the merchants, and made a treaty with our and European powers, by which he agreed to throw open the ports of Hiogo and Osacca to foreign commerce on January 1st of OUR JANUARY (1863). But the disturbed condition of the Empire at this time prevented, and the opening of the ports was deferred until January 1 1868.

In the mean time the revolutionists were silently preparing to prevent this happy consummation, and as the old Tycoon died for the carrying out of the chief feature of the treaty, the agricultural or Daimios party, under the lead of the Princes SATSUMA, CHOSIU, and TOSA, became so threatening in their demonstrations that STOTS BASHI was compelled in return to stultify a portion of his views to save him the abdication of the throne, and the restoration to it of a dynasty which had been virtually dethroned by the medieval system. This, if successful, changes materially the form of the Japanese Government. Heretofore the TYCOON from his control from the one of foreign which have controlled the country; henceforth the throne heredituy successors enjoy actual control of the country.

The accession to power of the new, or rather the old Emperor, who is called, not the TYCOON, but the MIKADO, has placed the actual civil affairs; and the rival powers began to employ their influences upon him, to win him to their cause. But the friends of the commercial party are to have been the strongest. Instead of changing the former TYCOON'S policy, the MIKADO approved of it, and issued a decree, ranging in 50,000 infantry, cavalry, artillery, and engineers, and employing a number of French officers to instruct the commanders), but made him the secretary of Foreign Affairs as well, and specially instructed him to enforce the terms of the treaty.

Then it was that the Daimios rushed to arms and mustered their army, which nominally consists of 30,000 infantry and cavalry and 40,000 coolies, which will not in reality aggregate nearly so much. SATSUMA and his adherents made a sudden inroad upon the city of Osacca, where he was one of the Mikado is held, and captured the person of the Emperor, who is a child of only nine years of age. The boy-ruler was forced to flee by night, and at once took refuge in Osacca, where he gathered his army about him; and where he at once began the work of organizing a navy and the various issues of this paper. The clearest indication of the success thus far of the commercial party is, that the Emperor has been compelled to remain in spite of the reported successes of the rebellious Daimios, and the defeat and flight to Jeddo of the TYCOON. The last part news brings information of a written assurance of the Mikado that the treaties would be strictly observed.

A brief account of the two ports about which the two parties are contending will be interesting. Osacca is the capital of the Empire, with a population of between 300,000 and 400,000, and a large proportion of the manufactures and commerce of the country are said to belong to foreign. It is laid out with great regularity, and may justly boast of the cleanliness of its broad, straight streets. Several canals, navigated by junks, intersect the city. The houses, generally, are small and mean and decayed-looking, but the whole appearance is due to the worship of Buddha are large and handsome. The most remarkable structure at Osacca, and indeed in Japan, is the CASTLE OF OSACCA. It is an immense fortification 200 years old, and is said to have been built by a contribution of hewn stones from every prince of the Empire. Most of these stones are of colossal proportions, and our artist in that country, Mr. HENRY C. S. MELDVE, says he noticed many which could not have been less than 30 feet long by 20 feet wide and 15 feet thick. The fortifications of Osacca are the first in Japan, and control the capital of the country, which flows for investment to Osacca from all parts of the Empire, just as the same attracts and power in this country gravitates toward New York. It has been well known for years that the business capital of Yeddo, Yokohama, and Nagasaki came from Osacca, and it was this fact which has made the foreign merchants so anxious to get admission to Osacca.

Osacca has a very bad anchorage, and in consequence thereof Hiogo has been named in the treaty as the port of Osacca. It is a small place, with no claims to notice other than in this connection. It has a good anchorage, where vessels can lie in safety in all weathers.

The opening of these ports was accompanied by a deplorable event—the death of Admiral BELL, Lieutenant REED, and several of their boat's crew. MR. MELDVE, who furnishes the splendid illustration on pages 216 and 217 of the funeral of the Admiral, also sends the following account of the circumstances of his death:

In order to inaugurate with appropriate ceremonies the new era in the intercourse of Japan with foreign countries, Rear-Admiral HENRY H. BELL, commanding the Asiatic squadron of the United States Navy, assembled off these ports as ship of war he could command as could be spared from the rest of the station. The Admiral himself, the flag-ship Hartford, Captain Trenchard; the Iroquois, and gun-boats Monocacy and Aroostook, remained at Hiogo to see the ceremonies duly celebrated the day by dressing ship and a salute of 21 guns. The Iroquois and the like number were left at Osacca by the sloop Shenandoah, the booming of whose heavy guns was distinctly heard at Hiogo on the morning.

A few days later the Admiral moved the greater part of his squadron to Osacca, with the double view of impressing the natives by a display of power, and of holding a friendly intercourse with our minister, General VAN VALKENBURGH, then resident at that place. The wind for several days after our arrival blew in heavy gusts from the northeast over the bar, a circumstance upon the bar, which it was necessary to cross in going up to the city. On the 11th the gale had somewhat abated, but although a heavy sea was still running the Admiral determined to cross the bar. Accordingly, at a quarter-past 10 A.M. he left the ship in his barge accompanied by Lieutenant-Commander A. R. BRIDGE, and, and by steam, in two minutes from that time, the vessel turned on the bar, and all thought the danger was past. All subsided but three seamen. The whole terrible catastrophe took place within a few minutes. The officer of the deck had his glass fixed on the boat when she went over. On account of the heavy rolling boats to the rescue, although so heavy a sea was running that no one dare land from the vessel alongside. With equal promptness the other ships sent their boats to the rescue, and it was not for a time than would have been deemed possible, seven or eight of the latter were seen to be pulling away over to the dangerous waters of the bar.

The name Admiral BELL was the first to be rescued and brought on board. His watch was found to have stopped at 10 minutes past 11. Before the catastrophe took place exactly 20 minutes after the left the ship.

The surviving seamen state that as soon as they reached the bar they met a terrific sea on the beach to, and an instant after a still heavier one came on board and turned the boat completely, throwing all hands into the water. The Admiral, accustomed from his youth to the sea, was observed in getting on the bottom of the boat and clung to the keel, until, aided by the next heavy sea on the surf, they were forced to let go their hold. In less than five minutes from the capsizing not one of them were washed off but one man, who had strength enough to maintain his grasp and was picked up by a canoe. One of the men washed off was saved by seizing on one of the floating oars, and two managed to reach the bottom, and was picked up by a canoe. Four English and as many American captains followed as pall-bearers. The Admiral's remains were first from the Hartford, Shenandoah, Iroquois, and Oneida, during the movement of the procession from the ship to the shore, and thence to the place of interment. MR. MARSHALL, the English Episcopal Church was read at the grave in a most impressive manner by the chaplain of the Shenandoah, assisted by the chaplain of the Oneida, and after three volleys had been fired by the marines, the bugler sounded taps to the memory of our departed friends the sad assemblage slowly dispersed to their respective ships.

The following are the names of the men who constituted the crew of the boat: Lieutenant-Commander Henry Erskine, Charles Baldwin, Thomas Davis, Olof Lindberg, Moses Bowden, John Bowden, Thomas Deveney, John Churo, Samuel C. Van Vliet, William Smith, Richard Reed (Lieutenant), and Edward Reddy. Of these Deveney, Churo, and Van Vliet were saved.

JACK OSBORNE'S WOOING.

A TALE OF THE SEA-COAST.

A LOVELY afternoon! The sun was shining brightly forth from an unclouded sky upon the deep blue waters of the ocean, which was gently undulated in very joyousness of spirit; it seemed stirred up by the cool land breeze blowing in upon the land. The exact locality matters not. It was somewhere on the southern part of the well-bound coast of England. The scenery was perfect of its kind. On one side, inland, were waving woods, green fields, and sparkling rivulets, with here and there a cottage, or a country seat. The lofty turf-covered downs were dotted over with numerous flocks of white fleecy sheep, while on the other side of the bay cliffs and dark rocks projected out into the sea, forming a succession of small bays and inlets, in which no doubt abounds the picturesque beauty of that part of the coast.

On the summit of the sunny downs walked a young man in the prime of three and twenty, side by his side, resting on his arm, was a girl worthy to be the presiding goddess of a scene so lovely. She was delicately fair, with bright golden hair, tinged with an auburn hue, and eyes of azure pure as the sea she gazed on, and her costume simple in the extreme. Nature had proceeded up along a valley from a pretty little cottage which lay ensconced snugly amidst a grove of trees, and presented to the high ground between it and the sea from the wintry gales which blow from it. They had walked on for some distance without speaking, when the young lady turned her blue eyes toward the youth, apparently to inquire the cause of his silence. Whether the soft tranquility of the scene influenced him, or the gentle gaze of those bright eyes, it is difficult to say; but he opened his mouth and commenced a series of expressions so incoherent that the maiden herself did not appear to comprehend them, till he concluded by one sufficiently explicit to leave no doubt as to the meaning of the rest. It was, "Fanny, I love you. Will you marry me?"

The words, however, did not, it seemed, give the fair girl the satisfaction it might have been expected they would have done, for instantly and unconsciously withdrawing her hand from her companion, she answered: "I am sorry, Jack, very sorry, to hear you say this. I thought you knew that my regard for you was as a sister for a brother, as I fancied yours was for me—much as would never allow thoughts of marriage to enter your head. You know that I am romantic, as it is called, and you ought to know that I am never likely to give my heart to any man, except to one who can win and reward him as a being superior to myself—except he has done some gallant deed to win my admiration as well as that of the world. No, Jack, utter not those words again; forget that you have pronounced them, as I soon shall, and we shall be happy as we have been always as we have hitherto been, without thinking of such folly." She ceased, and turned away her head.

"Then am I never likely to return my devoted, my unwavering affection?" exclaimed the young seaman in a tone of anguish. "Oh, pardon me for the question!—do you, Fanny, love another?"

"No, indeed, Jack, I do not," she answered with a light laugh—perhaps it was a little forced.

"I will answer your rather impertinent question with the commonplace one. My heart is as free as the breeze which plays upon the ocean. That must satisfy you. You must be conscious that you have not nothing to reclaim it. You are a very good seaman, and a very respectable officer, I have always heard. You can haul ropes, go aloft, box the compass, and steer, and possess all other sorts of nautical accomplishments, I dare say; but you have never boarded an enemy's ship, shot through her sails, or even sent a shot fired in anger, that I know of; you never jumped overboard to save a man, or even a drowning monkey, that I remember of; in fact, Jack, you have done nothing to win a young lady's heart like mine, at all events; and if my sex would but assert their privileges, you would receive the same answer to a like question from all. I am sorry to give you pain, cousin, but I speak what I feel and believe. You never gave her heart except to him who had won it by some noble deed of valor, generosity, charity, or self-sacrifice. Base would be the female characters in the world, and we should hear no more complaints of the degeneracy of the age. And now, Mister Jack, I must return home."

They spoke not another word till they reached the garden-gate of the little cottage in the valley.

"The young lady then put out her hand, saying, quietly:

"Good-by, Cousin Jack. We part friends, as we have always been: so go home, and forget all about it."

Before the young sailor could answer Fanny Ashford had disappeared in a turn of the shrubbery.

Poor Jack Osborne did not, however, follow her advice, for instead of returning to his home, which was some miles along the shore, he lingered long in the neighborhood of the cottage, hoping he could obtain a sight even of the light in her window. He had not determination to tear himself from the spot. He thought over all that had occurred, and he felt that he could not live without her. So completely occupied was he with his own reflections that he did not notice the entire change which had taken place in the weather since the sun had set. He was aroused from his reverie by the heavy rain which fell on his head by a violent gust which came in from the sea, and had it not caught in a black berry-bush close under which he stood probably has been compelled to return without it. The dark clouds were chasing each other rapidly through the sky, the wind whistled with unusual quantity; indeed he soon discovered that a furious gale was blowing, though he still continued wandering around in the same state of mind in consonance with his feelings, till some heavy drops of rain warned him of the folly of his behavior. Slowly and unwillingly he turned his homeward steps. He had not, however, proceeded far when his ears were startled by the dull reports of guns fired at intervals, which announced his signals of distress fired from a ship at sea. He listened attentively, then hurried to the edge of the nearest cliff. Dark as it was, at the same time assisted by his eye to pierce the darkness, till he was certain he could distinguish the flashes, while the reports appeared to come nearer and nearer. Soldiery several guns were discharged in quick succession.

"Good Heavens!" he exclaimed, "she must be on the Black Reef, and every soul will perish.

No. Let me consider the hour? Ah! it is nearly dead low-water just now, and it will be almost smooth inside the reef. If the people on board her think they may launch their boats or a raft, or even swim on shore; but they probably do not. If they wait for the morning, except the gale should moderate suddenly as it has commenced, which there is no prospect of, every soul must be lost."

Thus soliloquizing, Jack Osborne wound his way down the steep sides of the cliffs by a well-known path to the beach. He there found several fishermen, whose cottages were at hand, and who had, like himself, been attracted to the spot by the report of the guns, though it is to be feared that some of them, at all events, had resorted thither more in expectation of the waifs which the sea might cast on shore than for the purpose of rendering assistance to the hapless beings on the wreck.

"Hilo, Tom Harward, is that you, my man?" exclaimed the young sailor as he reached the shore, addressing a stout fisherman who was looking earnestly seaward; "whereabouts is the vessel that was firing just now?"

"On the Black Reef, no doubt, Sir," was the answer.

"And if the people on board her remain there without assistance they will be lost," cried Jack Osborne, in an eager tone.

"It's very true, Sir," answered the fisherman; "but it can not be helped."

"But I say it can be helped," exclaimed the young man in reply to examination. "Now, if you and three other active hands will launch one of your boats and accompany me, we will carry a hawser out to the vessel, and get all the people on shore over the reef before the tide rises. Here are eight sovereigns in my purse, which shall be ours whether we succeed or not: and as for the danger, there's none, if we are quick about the work. Remember, it's now neap-tide and dead low-water, so there'll be no sea at any consequence to hurt us."

"We'd go without the money, Mister Osborne," said another fisherman, who had been attracted to the spot; "but our wives and little ones, and—"

"Well, here's the money—leave that with them, but be quick about it," cried the young officer, impatiently. "There's no danger, I tell you: and you can not be such arrant cowards as to allow a whole ship's company to perish for fear of getting your jackets wet. If you are, I shall go alone, though I fear I shall do little good without help. I suppose some of you will lend a hand to launch a boat that is small. It matters little to any one if I never come back."

"No, no, Mister Osborne, we are not afraid; nor are we to be taunted in this way aloud," answered one of the older fishermen. "But we did not think of the tide being as low as you say. You are right, Master Jack, and I'll answer we get safe up to the rocks. I'll go with you, for one."

"And I," "and I," "and I," cried several others.

Jack selected those who had first spoken, and launching one of the boats in a smooth bit of the bands, steered her boldly through the surf, with a lantern in her bows, toward the dark rocks which they could now see, and which were rising at the same time a line made fast to some posts on the shore. A fierce wind was in their teeth, covering them with the high spray, and the night was otherwise so dark that it was with difficulty Jack could see how to steer; indeed, he seemed guided in a measure by instinct than assisted by his powers of vision. The thought, too, of Fanny, and of her approbation should he succeed in his enterprise, nerved his heart and determined him to risk every peril. Notwithstanding his assertions that there would be no danger, he knew very well that in the undertaking were not to be deterred from proceeding while any hope of success existed. As they neared the reef the wind seemed to blow harder and at length they made out, by the vivid flashes of lightning which every now and then darted from the clouds, the hull of a large vessel, driven completely upon the rocks, and over the afterpart of which the sea was breaking wildly. The masts were all gone, her bowsprit only remaining, and projecting, fortunately, over a ledge of the reef which the water did not wash. The part of several hands were waving in the afterpart of the ship showed that some of her crew, at all events, still remained alive, and at length Jack had reason to suppose that they had been seen.

"Now, my men," he exclaimed, "let us hail them together. It will cheer their spirits, and show them that help is at hand."

And loudly a cheer ascended from the fishing-boat. The cheer was directly answered from the ship. The boat was now so close to the reef that great caution was necessary to prevent her being stayed against it. As the fishermen lay on their oars, consulting as to the best way to avoid the rocks, Jack Osborne determined to undertake the task himself. Throwing off his jacket, he made a rope fast round his middle, and fastening the loose end as soon as safe to the rocks, he plunged overboard. The next instant all was darkness, and the fishermen anxiously waited for another flash of lightning to see the success of his enterprise. A moment afterward a human form was seen clambering over the slippery wood-covered reef. But it again disappeared, and again they were compelled to wait in suspense till a dark object was seen moving toward the end of the bowsprit. While still anxiously looking out a voice from some one in the water hailed them, and in a second Jack Osborne was hauled on board. The rope he had carried, having been hauled on board the fishing-boat, consisted of a thick hawser, was quickly carried to the shore.

In the mean time Jack Osborne had returned to the ship for the purpose of surveying the departure of the people, for the tide was now again rising, and every moment was of consequence. It was, indeed, fortunate for the seamen that he did so, for some of them were even talking of remaining by the ship till daylight before they ventured on a raft. She proved to be a large ship, homeward-bound from the West Indies, and carrying a valuable cargo, with ten guns, a numerous crew, and several passengers. The scene was one of the greatest confusion, for the masts had gone by the board, and the decks were covered with the wreck of the spars and rigging, from the falling of which many of the people were hurt. These latter and the passengers were conveyed on shore in a basket slung on to a hawser, while most of the crew escaped by other ropes which had in the mean time been carried there. So long a time was thus occupied that several, among whom was Jack Osborne, still remained on the wreck, over which the sea had begun to make fearful breaches. At last a more terrific breaker than any came rolling toward them. "Hasten, hasten for your lives!" exclaimed the gallant young officer. The sea struck the ship with an awful crash. Quivering in every timber, she parted in twenty places, and in another instant her broken fragments were dashed upon the beach. Some few unhappy beings, struck by the floating timbers, sank beneath the waves, and their mangled corpses were cast on the shore. Others, though senseless, were thrown upon the beach alive, and among them the gallant young officer who had been the means of preserving the lives of the rest. He was conveyed to the nearest gentleman's house, which happened to be Mr. Ashford's, distant about half a league, where all the passengers and officers were conducted, when Mr. Ashford gladly gave them shelter and entertainment. The next day dead in their coffins of brave preserver, who had been conveyed to their host's own room, and attended by a surgeon, who, to the satisfaction of all, pronounced his hurts not to be dangerous. This was proved when, after a night's rest, he appeared next morning at breakfast, rather paler than usual, but otherwise uninjured. His color, however, quickly returned, and his eyes sparkled with joy when Fanny Ashford entered the room, and, placing her hand in his, forgot to withdraw it.

"Is it to be mine?" he whispered.

"Yes," she answered, "if you value it as a reward of gallantry."

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

We are often warned against trusting to appearance—still appearances being understood to be bright, pleasing, and attractive ones. Poets have made this a fruitful theme of song. We are cautioned to "Trust not the tempter of thine smiling looks," assured that

"All that glitters is not gold," that

"A man ivor noble nod smile, and be a villain;"

and that

"Who does a kindness is not therefore kind;
Who combats bravely is not therefore brave."

These injunctions, written long time ago, it may be well to remember, bearing in mind, however, that nowadays people do not take so much trouble about the matter of an honest design, and that appearances are not every where deceitful. For example, the last relics of civilization have been found—fossil ones and omnibuses—and men desiring this to be distinctly understood, do not pretend to assume "smiling looks," or extend the courtesies of social life in public. Women comprehend the crisis, and do not expect any of those old-fashioned attentions which long time ago were gallantly offered and gratefully received. Indeed, there is so much marked rudeness shown them that they must need to search deeply to find any thing attractive in man in general, as he exhibits himself—for example—the city cars. But woman is said to have a forgiving spirit, and very likely, as she stands, solitary, clinging to the strap (if she can reach it) of a car in which every man has a seat, she may be quoting mentally:

"Within the scuttle's shell encrusted
The proud peril may hide.
Trust me, you'll find a heart of trust
Within that wrigh crusted."

And when a sudden lurch of the car sends her staggering almost into the lap of the unconscious gentleman opposite, she probably continues her musings:

"The plenary excellence, like a ruby, lies
Contains the shining treasure of a soul,
Resplendent shows."

Then swaying to and fro, uncomfortably conspicuous, she casts a glance along the lines of newspapers, shielded faces, and softly murmurs:

"The general voice,
Sounds him for courtesy, behavior, language,
And every part of manly, as simply,
Though unclean, as his unembarrassed brow.
Nature has written 'Gentleman.'"

And, at length, having reached her destination still standing, she closes her poetic meditation with:

"To man's pride,
His highest, worthiest, noblest boast,
The privilege he prizes most,
To show his helpless woman's side!"

Surely, the question may modestly be put: Can a poet be found who will venture to exhibit the gentle side of man, dated 1868? The race called man in former times would appear entirely extinct, and poetry suited to the times is wanted. Genuine courtesy, not merely toward woman, but toward any one, is rarely seen in public places.

A newly-married couple recently stopped at a hotel in Cincinnati while on their wedding-trip. The husband was a jovial, gentlemanly young man, but on one occasion indulged himself in something stronger than water to such an extent that he became quite confused, to say the least. The next day after his frolic he could not account for the mysterious disappearance of about $1000 that he had with him the night before. He told the landlord of the loss, and the landlord sent for the police, who immediately interrogated the gentleman as to where he had been the night before. He frankly stated that the whisky had knocked his memory, and that he could not inform them. While they were talking, the young wife, thinking her little joke had gone far enough, and the desired warning had proved sufficient, came forward and stated that she had the money—had taken it from her husband's pocket, simply to show him how easily the same thing could be done by any body else.

A singular event transpired in Tennessee a short time ago. A well-known gentleman, about eighty-six years old, performed his usual day's work, ate a hearty meal, and retired to rest apparently perfectly well. About midnight he rose from his bed, crossed a small hall, woke up the members of the family, and told them that he was dying, at the same time shaking hands with each one of the inmates, and bidding them a final farewell. He then went back to his room, seated himself in a chair, when his features quickly underwent a change, his limbs relaxed, while a thrill then gathered over her face. He was taken from the chair and placed upon a bed near by, but the spirit of the old man had fled.

The curious district surrounding Yellowstone Lake, in Montana, contains a natural curiosity, reported more wonderful than even Niagara. Just below the lake, the Yellowstone River, which is its outlet, falls over the face of a peak of the Rocky Mountains three-tenths of feet, the spray rising several hundred. A pebble was tlmed by a watch in dropping from an overhanging crag of one perpendicular fall, and is said to have required seven and a half seconds to reach the surface of the river below. The great lake, like all others in the mountains, is thick with salmon-trout, of from five to forty pounds' weight; and where the milky, boiling mineral waters from the geysers intermingle with the pure, clear water from the running streams, these elegant fish can be "corked" up by the boat-load.

"Curtice," the foreign correspondent of the Boston Journal, thinks that there is scarcely another place in the world where the boys and girls of the United States would throw up their hands in such wonder as upon the top of the Great Pyramid of Egypt. In giving an account of a visit there he remarks: "We ascend a steep sand-bank, one hundred feet high, and dismount from our donkeys beneath the shadow of the great Pyramid of Cheops. I almost despair of giving you an idea of its size, and height, as how it looks. It stands on solid rock. It is only when you walk around it, and watch you climb to the top, that you get an idea of its magnitude and height. A great many of the outer stones have been taken away by the Pashas of Egypt to build their palaces, so that the pyramid is not so large as it was at the first. Formerly it was five hundred square and five hundred feet; it is 746 feet on each side and 450 in height. Its area now is a little more than one-fourth the area of Madison Common, or almost 12 acres. Just imagine a pile of masonry—great stones nine or ten feet long, three or four high, and four or five thick—piled up in a graded sled, piled up three or four times higher than the highest tree you know of, or the highest—as high as the steeple of Park Street Church would be if it stood atop of Bunker Hill Monument—or as high as three of the tallest pine-trees to be found in the woods of Maine or New Hampshire. With two Arabs—to pull us up—to keep us from falling in case we should become light-headed, we go up, walking along the stones, picking out the easiest places, stopping now and then to get breath, reaching the top in about twenty minutes."

A recent survey has shown that the Missouri River, near the point of confluence with the Mississippi, has eaten away some 300 feet of the Illinois shore. This encroachment extends four miles. The property by which the channel was shifting to the Illinois side has supposed to be so slow as to be almost imperceptible. This survey proves, however, that if the Missouri gnaws away at the Illinois shore with as long an appetite as it has shown since 1850, in less than a dozen years it will be impossible for any steamboat or vessel of the least tonnage to reach the St. Louis levee. The people of St. Louis are awake to the danger, and the city engineer has already built 2234 feet of dyke between the Missouri shore and Cabaret Island.

A Philadelphia paper states that a woman living in Amesbury, Massachusetts, recently killed a Brahma rooster which had thirteen wicket cocks in its spur, two two-cent pieces, and other indigestible articles. One would naturally suppose that the rooster might have died without any extra assistance. But quite as surprising is the fact that the Vermont State geologist not long since found and stuffed a large bald eagle, in whose crop he found a piece of baltor chain 24½ inches long.

A Chicago chemist of Chicago claims to have made an important discovery by which eggs may be kept perfectly fresh and sweet for years. His mode is founded upon a new theory, the electroizing of the organic constituents of the egg, with a proper combination of chemical agents, thereby suspending the embryotic principle and relieving the germinating heat, thus preventing organic dissolution and generating any unpleasant flavor, or in the least changing the natural taste of the egg.

The maple sugar "season" has come. More than a million and a half gallons of delicious maple syrup, and over forty million pounds of maple sugar are produced in our country in a single year. In the Eastern and Middle States enterprising farmers understand the value of maple groves, and not only make their own sweetening but net considerable money by tapping their trees, boiling down the sap, and "sugaring off." Besides, every body loves maple sugar, and the young folks especially rejoice when "sugaring off" comes.

The French, as a people, seem to have very few secrets, though, and the nearest of them are known to babes them. A story is told of a dancing-party at a Paris hotel which was interrupted by the landlady, who entered the ballroom and said: "My friends, do not dance now; there is a man dying in the room above." But presently she returned with a greenly face, saying: "You can resume your pleasure: the man is dead!" The French possess a state-secret, that of a merry petrification, who, finding he was about to die, caused his workmen to make a number of candles which were burn a short time, and then burst in brilliant corruscations. These candles were to form the pieces, who at the funeral were to dance around the corpse; and while engaged in this solemn duty they were to veat off, to the great consternation of the clergymen.

A very "Peculiar People" exist in England. They call themselves "Peculiar," and their principal characteristics consists in following literally the text in the New Testament which says, "Is any sick among you, let him call for the elders of the Church; let them pray over him and anoint him with oil in the name of the Lord." Consequently, they do not think it necessary to call in medical assistance when ill. Recently a little child was taken sick, and applied to with oil, and prayed over it. The child grew worse. They gave it a little nourishment, and continued to pray, but used no remedies and called no medical assistance. The child died. The matter was brought into court. The parents appeared to feel that they had done all they could for their child. The jury returned a verdict of Not Guilty, but at the same time the coroner severely censured the prisoners for not calling in medical advice.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A GENTLEMAN standing at his door, was asked by a huckster whether he was the man of the house? In a subdued tone he, quietly, replied, "I was."

A SLIGHT MISTAKE.—The French correspondent of a "Daily Paper," in a recent letter, tells us that "there are in France no less than one hundred deaf and dumb."

These figures are, without a doubt—
Excuse us, Sir—"all dumb."
"I'm fall well known by ev'ry "lout"
That utilizes my dumb."

The following letter is a perfect model in its way:

"DEAR BROUGER,—I've got one of the handsomest farms in the State, and have it nearly paid for. Crops are good, prices never were better. We have had a glorious revival of religion in our church, and both our children (the Lord be praised!) are converted. Father got to be rather an incumbrance, and last week I took him to the poor-house. Your affectionate brother."

The young lady who fell dead—in love with a gentleman, immediately revived on being asked to name the day.

A chap says he cured palpitation of the heart by the application of another palpitating heart to the part affected.

THE HUSBAND'S SOLILOQUY.

Lovely woman, sweet and human!
How her wicking ways disarm us!
Bright and witty—what a pity
That her bills should so alarm us!

Charming creature! how each feature
Lights up with ecstatic pleasures!
(Harnden passing, where Dame Fashion
Brings to view her latest treasures!

Silks and laces! how her face is
Radiant as the sunlight dawning;
Eyes are glancing, curls are dancing,
And her brow is like the morning!

Daily shopping—money dropping
Fast from wife and dainty fingers,
Wants explicit—bats exquisite—
How the happy shopper lingers!

Ah! 'tis cruel, when a jewel
Might light up wood home affection,
Thus to splutter, scold, and flutter,
When with bills in that direction!

Woman tender, who can render
Too much joy to match her beauty?
How can sorrow or caress
Half repay her love and duty?

Then, Dame Fashion, put the lash on,
Urge your steeds of darling mettle!
Lovely woman, sweet and human,
Men will bless you, and we must settle!

"That is probably the oldest piece of furniture in America" said a collector of antique curiosities to a friend, pointing to a wrecked-looking table as he spoke. "How old is it?" asked the friend. "Nearly four hundred years old." "Pshaw, that is nothing. I have an Arabic table over two thousand years old." Indeed! "Yes, the multiplication table."

"Didn't you tell me you could hold the plow?" said a farmer to an Irishman he had taken on trial. "So sorry, now," said Mike. "Few could I hould it, and two bosses pullin' it away? Just stop the craytures and I'll hould it for you."

"Caffee, what do you think de most useful ob de pleasures—de sun or de moon?"

"Well, Sambo, I tink de moon orter take de fus rank in dat ar' ticular."

"Why you tink so, Caffee?"

"Well, I tell you: kase she shines by night when we want light, and not shinin' by day when we do not!"

"My dear, what makes you always yawn?"
The wife exclaimed, her temper gone,
"Is home so dull and dreary?"
"Not so," he said, "my love, not so;
But man and wife are one you know;
And when alone, I'm weary."

"I shall die happy," said the expiring husband to his wife, who was weeping most dolefully by the bedside. "If you will but promise me not to marry that old fool of my accursing jealousy, your cousin John." "Make no such rash promise, Sally!" said the experient widow, "I'm engaged to die before."

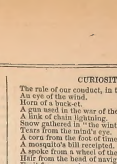
An old bachelor (we don't know whore he lives, indeed) thus entertains a wife. Of course he will find use to suit him:

"I want a wife, a first-rate wife,
A girl that's all my own,
To cook my meals and clear my life,
With smiling word and tone.

"A girl that ne'er will pledge a vow
To say that you are fair,
That's been brought up to milk a cow,
And have some share for her.

"She must be graceful as the bell
Upon the heifer's neck,
And make such butter as will sell
For forty cents a pound."

A certain clerk in a Western village recently made the following comment on Pocahontas. Said he: "Pocahontas was a great man—Pocahontas was a noble, kind-hearted, and true man." "Hold on," cried his companion, "Pocahontas was a woman." "She was, eh?" said he; "well, that just my luck! how am I expected to know? I never read the Bible!"



WANTED.

A blanket from an oyster-bed.
A key to fit a lock of love.
A bellows to blow a man's nose.
A skiff to sail on a mill-pond.
A mule to ride through the valley of death.
A feather from the wing of time.
Some tobacco for the pipe of a steamboat.
Some splinters from the pole of an electric.
Some gravel from the road to ruin.
Some buttons from the mantle of night.
A dog whose bark is like that of a tree.
A sturd for a rock to feed on.
A book on which to hang the clothe of a lecture.
A blacksmith to mend a broken heart.
A hair for the head of a sheet.
Some hay and oats for a nightmare.
A small air-castle to accommodate a large family of invisible spirits.
A portrait of the man in the moon.

CURIOSITIES.

The rule of our conduct, in two joints.
An eye of the mind.
Horn of a buck-et.
A gun used in the war of the elements.
A link of chain lightning.
Snow gathered in "the winter of discontent."
Tears from the mind's eye.
A corn from the foot of time.
A mosquito's bill receipted.
A spoke from a wheel of the chariot of the sun.
Hair from the head of navigation.
Fruit from an axis-tree.
A pair of bellows from an ox.
A frame of mind.

Little four-year-old Carrie went with her aunt to church. The preacher was very eloquent on deliverance, and she was much interested. "Mother," said she, when she came home, "I have heard such a good minister. He stamped, and pounded, and made such a noise; and then he got so mad he shook his fist at the folks, and there wasn't any body dared to go up and fight him."

REV. W. MORLEY PUNSHON, M.A.

YORKSHIRE, which has produced, in almost every department in which Englishmen can attain to eminence, more great and celebrated men than any other county of Great Britain, has long been regarded as the peculiar home of Methodism. It was in Yorkshire that some of the most remarkable successes of the WESLEYS were achieved. More than a century ago the founder of the Methodist societies had already drawn from Yorkshire some of his greatest preachers in the persons of JOHN NELSON and others; and from that time to the present the great northern county has been a soil where his doctrines have been received and made fruitful in the salvation of many thousand other parts of the United Kingdom. The able orator and preacher, WILLIAM MORLEY PUNSHON, whose portrait adorns our present issue, is a native of Doncaster, where he was born in the year 1824. His father was a draper in that town, engaged in a large and prosperous business, and at the same time a prominent and active supporter of the Wesleyan cause. He received his second name after his uncle, Sir ISAAC MORLEY, a gentleman well known for many years in the West Riding of Yorkshire, and who lived to witness the reference to which his nephew and namesake attained. His education was commenced in his native town; but when about eleven years of age he was placed under the care of a gentleman, the son of a Congregational minister, at Hesnor, in Derbyshire, where he discovered a singular aptitude for learning. At this time he was a stiff, chubby lad, with fresh, curly hair, a full proportion of the love of sport, and above all, a most extraordinary memory. He would commit to memory for the mere pleasure of the thing long passages from the "Speaker," and recite them to his school-fellows; and it is said that he could repeat the names of all the British constituencies, with the names of all the members representing them, without a mistake. Notwithstanding these and other indications of remarkable ability, he was not designed by his father for public or professional life, nor does it appear that at this period his mind was drawn out to the vast concerns of the future. At fifteen years of age he was placed at Hull as a clerk in the shipping business, from which post he subsequently removed to Sunderland. When about twenty years of age, in the order of Providence, he was removed to Wadsley, and his residence was with his uncle, the Rev. BENJAMIN CLOUGH. Here he was brought into a congenial atmosphere. Mr. CLOUGH was a man of mark, though not showy endowments. A distinguished Oriental scholar, he had compiled a dictionary of the Bengalese, one of the Eastern languages, which, after forty years, still remains the basis of all similar works in that language. He was also a zealous and self-denying missionary, having been one of the first company of young men sent out by the Wesleyans in the East under the superintendence of Dr. COKE, who died on the voyage, and was buried in the ocean. Mr. PUNSHON has compared a suitable and beautiful memoir of this excellent man, to whom he owed so much. It was under his advice that he made his early attempts at preaching, and in May, 1843, he presented himself for examination in London, as a candidate for the Wesleyan ministry. The writer of this sketch was present at that examination, to which one or two other young men also came up who have since attained to eminence, and well remembers the impression then produced by the appearance and answers of the future orator. At the Conference of 1843 he received his first appointment, which was to Whitehaven, where he spent two years, followed by two years in Carlisle, and three years in Newcastle. This residence of seven years won for him an extraordinary popularity in the far north, his faithful devotion to the department of his work being not less remarkable than his eloquence. Previous to his entrance into the ministry he had published a small volume of poems; and while in Carlisle he made his first literary effort of a religious kind, entitled "Tabor, or the Class-Meeting." This little publication was an indication of that ardent attachment to the peculiar views and discipline of Methodism which has all along been characteristic of Mr. PUNSHON, though in combination with such a breadth of view and catholicity of spirit as he has been claimed again and again by other churches as almost their own. Soon after coming to reside in Newcastle Mr. PUNSHON married the daughter of Mr. VICKERS, of Gateshead. This lady died in 1858, leaving several children. After leaving Newcastle the next six years of the subject of this sketch were spent in Yorkshire, three years in Sheffield, and three in Leeds. While in Leeds he received a call approaching in dignity. It was in January, 1854, that Mr. PUNSHON made his first appearance in Exeter Hall as a lecturer on the subject of the Ten Years' Conflict in Christian Association. The subject was "The Prophet of Nazareth," and the lecture, although inferior to several which he afterward prepared, was yet highly characteristic, and produced a marked impression. He did not appear again in this capacity till the beginning of 1857, when he delivered what was probably, for rhetorical effect, his masterpiece—the lecture on JOHN BUNYAN. This oration was delivered with electrical effect in various places. In 1858 Mr. PUNSHON received an appointment to Bayswater, where the task was assigned to him of endeavoring to raise a new Wesleyan cause and congregation. This, by the blessing of God, which rested upon his labors, he accomplished beyond expectation; and in 1861 he was removed to Islington. During this period several other lectures were delivered by him, which excited remarkable interest, large sums of money being frequently offered and refused for tickets, after as many as could possibly be issued had been sold. One of these, "The Huguenots," was published at a shilling, and from the proceeds of its delivery, Mr. PUNSHON gave a donation of a thousand pounds toward the Wesleyan chapel in Spitalfields. Large sums were also raised for various local charities by means of his lectures. In the mean time he was growing in the esteem and love of the members of his own church, was honored with many tokens of their regard, and, had it not been for the failure of his health, would probably have reached by this time the highest dignity at their disposal—that of President of the Wesleyan Conference. It is impossible to speak too warmly of Mr. PUNSHON's unselfishness and generosity. In 1862, seeing the poor accommodation provided by Wesleyans in several populous watering-places, he undertook to raise within five years, by lecturing and personal solicitation, the sum of ten thousand pounds in aid of a fund for the erection of chapels in those places. Every thing seemed against the project. The cotton famine and the financial panic occurred, his own health failed; and, besides this, nearly £200,000 were raised in the period for the Missionary Jubilee. Yet the promise was fulfilled; and last August, the term of five years being completed, Mr. PUNSHON had the gratification to announce that the pledge had been accomplished! Such manifold labors, however, nearly broke down his health, and for the last three years Mr. PUNSHON has, to a considerable extent, retired from public life beyond the sphere of his own circuit labors.

A new sphere, however, awaits him. He has been appointed to visit the United States and Canada as representative of the Wesleyans of Britain, and to preside at the conferences in the important and rapidly increasing provinces of Canada.

REV. WILLIAM MORLEY PUNSHON, M.A.

During his visit both to Canada and the United States, Mr. PUNSHON will find much in some of the Christian Churches from which, as an Englishman, he may learn, and which on his return he may turn to good account. In Sunday-schools, Day-school State Education, and especially in the cause of Temperance, he will find England is not a little behindhand.

As an illustration of the popular and striking character of Mr. PUNSHON's rhetoric, we quote a passage from a speech delivered in Exeter Hall last year, and which must have been exceedingly effective in the delivery:

"I am disposed for a moment to tell you of a dream I have had. We are not responsible for dreams; and if the fantasies of sleep are wild, the dreamer may be forgiven; but this dream of mine had a startling realness about it, and it haunts me yet. I dreamed of a beautiful island, or perhaps a group of islands, which I thought had arisen from the sea. Tradition said that some three hundred years ago they were all overflowed with water. Indeed, one of them was very largely under water still, and the others bore traces of the flood. The sea roared angrily in the distance, and there was danger, I thought, that it might encroach again; and the inhabitants of the island seemed to think so, for as the land was on a low level they built dykes, as in Holland, and appointed warders, and gave them charge to watch the approach of the waves. For a while all went well. Harvests grew and were gathered upon the reclaimed ground, and there was the hum of industry and the hymn of praise. By-and-by a rumor arose that the sea was getting nearer and higher; and here and there a warder called attention to it; but he was laughed at by his fellows for his pains, and the people took no heed of his words: but I saw with the dreamer's insight, which sees the end from the beginning, the steady onward creeping of the water. At last there could be no doubt about it, the sea was higher and nearer than the oldest islander had ever known: but still it was the summertime, and skies were blue and winds were calm, and men talked a little about the progress of the ocean, but that was all; and certain churches, which the old men remembered to have been many miles inland, were now standing by the very verge of the cliff, and were almost undermined; still men felt no fear. Were not the warders there, and were they not doing their duty? Were not the dykes up, and were not they all secure? By-and-by years rolled away—for dreams, you know, take no note of time—and presently there were tidings that some of the warders had been caught slumbering at their posts; still, men felt no fear. Then there was one part of the embankment which was known to be confessedly insecure, but that part was mainly inhabited by ladies, who did not like the warders to intrude upon their privacy, and it was deemed their breath, and said it was because it was stained with blood and choked with corpses; but it was deemed bad manners to refer to that in company; and it was forbidden for the fishermen to cast their nets in there. Then there were gay bridges here and there, and palaces rose up, and men ate and drank and smiled, and went about their business, careless as the old world while the ark was preparing; and all round and all about, at the doors of the palaces, and on the steps of the churches, worming into every by-way, creeping, in many coils, about the city's heart, there was the same silent, black, deceitful, treacherous water. And it grieved me in my dream to see how foolish men were to let it get so near them, and to threaten them so thoroughly round. For I saw that the winter was coming, and that it needed only the summonses of the storm to swell the tidal waters, until the devoted country was engulfed as in another deluge. Now, I should like to know if there is any interpreter here who can read me the moral of my dream. I have wondered whether it were possible that it had any reference to England. I have wondered whether there is not by one thing in the midst of us at this moment like that stealthy, snake-like, rising, creeping water. I have wondered whether you know, any of you, any thing like it; whether there is a system in the midst of us, which for years has always been simmering, and which has always obtained what it clamored for, which has secured its own close houses from inspection, while it has wormed itself into the very vitals, and got into your work-houses, into your prisons; which has granted an indulgence for twelve months to those who will pay that money, to repay that you may be converted to what they consider to be the true faith; and which yet is a system which has been a curse and a malison to every country where it has prevailed. And so wondering, when I was privileged once more to stand on this Missionary platform, and to make our duties, I humbly think, is to bear testimony to the truth, I have wondered whether it was not my duty to tell this dream to you, and in asking out of it, as men do from unsightly visions, with a sense of shuddering and of fear, I have wondered whether I ought not to summon you—though my words be of the feeblest—to arouse yourselves as the heart of one man, and to let your manhood arise, put upon the whole of you the whole armor of God, and with the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God, and with all prayer and supplication, to watch unto this end, and with all perseverance, and to make supplication for all saints, and for me, that utterance may be given unto me, that I may open my mouth boldly to make known the mystery of the gospel, for which I am an ambassador in bonds, that therein I may speak boldly as I ought to speak. Will you not, in the name of the country that we love, and in the name of the sanctities which are habitually violated, and of the liberties which are put in peril, and in the name of the slaves who are enthralled, in the name of the souls that are deluded, and in the name of the Gospel of Jesus which is hindered, and in the holy name of God—'A barred door to Popery, and no peace with Rome!'"

AMERICAN AND ENGLISH MERCHANT LIFE IN CHINA.

THE mode of life of the English and American residents in Amoy, China, is a curious mixture of hard work and amusement. They live with a splendor in their daily life of which, even on a slight conception here. In the most elaborate dinner-parties in America one seldom sees so much to tempt the palate and charm every sense as is constantly to be seen at the everyday tables of these men.

Yet they work very hard. They rise at six, and after a cup of coffee, a bit of toast, and perhaps some visit, drive to work at their offices—which, by-the-way, are generally in the lower story of their houses—until about nine or half past. A plunge into cool water and an entire change of clothing from head to foot, and they are ready for breakfast. This meal is a very substantial one, being a déjeuner à la fourchette.

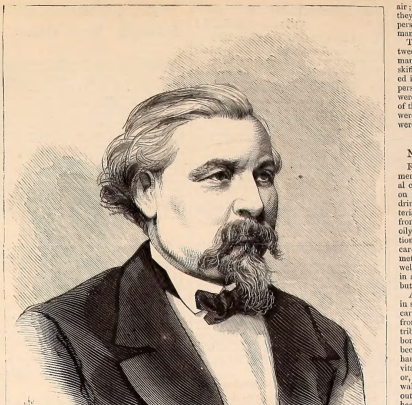
After this meal the merchants resume their work until about one, when "tiffin" is served. This meal is the most peculiar one of the day. It is eaten wherever one happens to be. To partake of it needs no invitation, as one is expected, as a matter of course, to call in a visit or business carries one into another house then his own at tiffin time. It is almost always cold, and answers to our lunch.

After tiffin to work again until about four, when the monsoon of the day begins. They take and dress for dinner, and at five o'clock just below the town, is a hard white sand beach, nearly seven miles long, and here the gentlemen ride until a cool breeze breathes in the approaching wind that blows in an almost unbroken line from the coast of China. Then there is return to the house, as the English house is called, to dress for dinner at seven. If there is no steamer coming ashore, they have their evenings themselves, and read, play cards, talk, etc., until bedtime.

The houses of the foreign residents in Amoy are very spacious and generally in three stories. The lower story, or basement, is used as a sort of store-house or "godown," the next story is used for offices, and the third is the dwelling-house. All the rooms open on broad verandas with windows that are like doors. The rooms are very large, some dining-rooms being forty feet square and forty feet high in the centre. This immense space is very conducive to the comfort of the inhabitants during some months of the year when the weather is very warm. In winter the climate is delightful, clear for months together without a cloud, cold enough to make exercise delightful, and yet warm enough to make being in the open air a pleasure.

HON. MARSHALL JEWELL, OF CONNECTICUT.

THE HON. MARSHALL JEWELL, Republican candidate for Governor of Connecticut, was born in Winchester, New Hampshire, October 20, 1825, and is therefore at the present time forty-three years old. He was brought up in a tan-yard, and worked as a day-laborer till he was eighteen years of age, when he went to Boston to learn the currier's trade. At this time the telegraphic art came into public notice, and Mr. JEWELL gave up his trade temporarily and applied himself to the study of the science of electricity. He was subsequently engaged in constructing and superintending lines between Louisville, Kentucky, and New Orleans.



About the year 1850 Mr. JEWELL went to Hartford, Connecticut, and started the manufacture of leather belting, from which small beginning a very large establishment has grown up—the largest of its kind in the world. He is interested, and has been for fifteen years, in large tanneries in Detroit, Michigan, which supply the home-factory with stock.

In 1859 he made the tour of Europe, and has since been abroad three times on business and pleasure. Last year he spent considerable time at the Paris Exposition. His travels have been extensive, covering all places of interest, and from them he has derived valuable information. His love of art has led him to purchase largely of paintings and statuary; and his private gallery of art is creditable to his good taste and discrimination.

As a business-man, Mr. JEWELL'S undoubted talents have been recognized for years, and he has been, and is now officially, connected with the oldest and most respectable moneyed institutions of Connecticut.

Politically Mr. JEWELL has never sought prominence. His first advent into public life was last year, when the Republicans of his district nominated him unanimously as a candidate for the State Senate. Though not prominent in political life he has always taken a deep interest in public affairs, and during the war was first and foremost as an earnest supporter of the Government. He was a devoted friend of the soldiers, and contributed largely to their support.

While nominated as a party man he is emphatically the candidate of the laboring men and of the soldiers, and it is not surprising that under his lead the Republicans of Connecticut are conducting an active and enthusiastic canvass.

HON. MARSHALL JEWELL, REPUBLICAN CANDIDATE FOR GOVERNOR OF CONNECTICUT.

THE "MAGNOLIA" DISASTER.

THE reopening of navigation on the Ohio River, which has been closed by ice during the winter, has been inaugurated by a terrible disaster. The boiler of the steamer Magnolia, a large vessel plying between Cincinnati and Maysville, exploded on March 18 when twelve miles above Cincinnati, and about eighty of the one hundred and forty passengers were lost. The greater portion of the cabin was carried away by the explosion; and the boat subsequently caught on fire. After the upper works were destroyed, some powder in the magazine of the boat exploded and destroyed all that remained except the hull, which was so badly shattered that it sank.

The scene at the time of the explosion was terrible. Some persons were blown high into the air; others were thrown into the river, where they struggled to keep from drowning. Many persons were scattered over the wreck, horribly mangled, scalded, burning, or already dead.

The Magnolia's yawl-boat, making trips between the wreck and the shore, picked up as many persons as she could carry: and several skiffs sent out from the town of California assisted in rescuing persons from drowning. Several persons jumped into the river from fright and were drowned. Those persons on the after-part of the boat, who were not rescued by the skiffs, were either drowned by jumping overboard or were burned to death.

NATURAL CAUSES OF DEATH.

FROM the commencement of life to the moment of death there are mechanical and chemical changes constantly and uninterruptedly going on in our bodies. For example, we eat and drink for the express purpose of providing materials for repairing the waste of matter resulting from the working of the machinery. A soft, oily fluid is poured into the joints to prevent friction, just as oil is poured into an axle-box of a car-wheel to prevent it from wearing away the metal. Our bones are all frequently renewed as well as our flesh, from infancy to age; but not in a day or an hour. Nature acts persistently, but accomplishes nothing by spasmodic efforts.

As soon as a particle of lime which was held in solution in food is placed in the stomach, it is carried to the heart by appropriate vessels, and from thence conveyed into an artery to be distributed to a point where most needed in some bone. There the little particle is deposited, and becomes incorporated with the substance of the hard structure where it was left. It becomes vitalized in its new connection. An old particle, or, as it were, an old brick is detached from the wall to give place to a new one. It is carried out of the body as useless matter, as its vitality has been expended. So particles are perpetually changing places. The new go in and the old go out. This is vigorous life and health so long as this vital process is regularly performed.

In the lapse of time the vital artisans, such as the liver, spleen, kidneys, heart, stomach, etc., are worn by years of incessant toil, and fail to act with that systematic activity characteristic of younger days. By this relaxing new particles are not sent forward often enough, nor are the effete ones removed quickly, and consequently there is a mechanical irregularity and a chemical one also. Thus, we wear away, and finally die of old age. When disease sets in it is a sudden clog of the wheels, as it were. The vital action by which life and consciousness is maintained can not be suspended, but a moment at farthest, without the hazard of death. When a man is drowned the machine stops. If, however, certain measures are quickly adopted, provided respiration has been suspended but a few minutes, life may possibly be recalled. That is, the heart may be urged into contraction and the lungs once more commence filling and collapsing.

Where there are no violations of the vital laws great longevity is attainable. Few, however, are so careful and discreet as not to trespass upon themselves in some form, the penalty of which is sickness, suffering, and a premature death.

Whales, sharks, and some few of the land animals whose food is invariably easy of digestion, and whose habits, regulated by instinct, are no unchangeable as Nature herself, live to enormously long periods. It is the opinion of some naturalists that the balænæ or right whale of the Arctic regions may reach the patriarchal age of a thousand years. Sharks, whose skeletons are but hard bone bit flexible cartilaginous layers, are also supposed to continue several centuries if not destroyed by enemies.

Notwithstanding the universal desire for life, which is instinctive, we thoughtlessly hasten the approach of the very calamity we so much dread.

With all the light of modern science, in an age, too, remarkable for intelligence, we permit practices daily which we know are destructive to life. Each victim has himself removed from the sphere which threaten others; and acting upon the idea that all others are mortal but ourselves, we at last fall, in our turn, to have before us, to be remembered no more forever.

Youth may reach threescore and ten by simply conforming in those natural laws which govern health and happiness. A deviation is perilous; hence it behooves those who love life to shun every influence which might interfere with the enjoyment of the most valuable of all blessings—a sound body and a clear mind.

One of the most useful and economical productions of the century is HOYT & STEVENS'S FAMILY DYE COLORS, comprising all the staple colors and the most exquisite shades, and so simple that any one can use them with perfect success.

GEORGE ELIOT'S WORKS.

From the London Review.

It was once said of a very charming and high-minded woman that to know her was to itself a liberal education; yet we are inclined to set an almost equally high value on an acquaintance with the writings of "George Eliot." For those who read them carefully they possess the faculty of educating in its highest sense, of invigorating the intellect, giving a healthy tone to the taste, appealing to the nobler feelings of the heart, making the mind emptiness aright, and awakening or developing in every mind the consciousness of a craving for something higher than the pleasures and rewards of that life which only the senses realize, the belief in a destiny of a nobler nature than can be grasped by experience or demonstrated by argument. An reading them we seem to be raised above the low grounds where the atmosphere is heavy and tainted, and the sunlight of truth we struggle through the veils of mist, and to be set upon the higher ranges where the air is fresh and bracing, where the sky is bright and clear, and where earth seems of less account than self, and duty becomes more near at hand. And as by those who really feel the grandeur of mountain climbing, a stone is heard speaking to the heart, which hushes the whispers in which vanity, and meanness, and selfishness are wont to make their petty suggestions; and as for them the paltry purposes of a brief and fitful life lose their significance in the presence of the mighty types of steadfastness and eternity by which they are surrounded, so, on such readers who are able to appreciate a lofty independence of thought, a rare nobility of feeling, and an exquisite sympathy with the joys and sorrows of human nature, George Eliot's writings can not fail to exercise an invigorating and purifying influence, the good effects of which have behind it a lasting impression.

JAMES'S BANKRUPT LAW.

THE BANKRUPT LAW of the UNITED STATES, Nov. 1867, with Notes, Forms of American and English Decisions upon the Principles and Practice of the Law of Bankruptcy; Jurisdiction of the Courts, the Lower and Merchant. By EDWIN JAMES, of the New York Bar. Also, the Provisions of the recent English Bankruptcy Amendment Act. With copious Notes, and an Appendix containing the General Orders and Forms promulgated by the United States Supreme Court. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $4 00; Sheep, $5 00.

The above is a new edition, containing the GENERAL ORDERS, together with the FORMS OF PROCEDURE IN BANKRUPTCY, as PROMULGATED BY THE UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT, with copious Analytical Index.

This important work was prepared by MR. JAMES during the time the legislation in Congress on the subject was proceeding, the main provisions of the law having been carefully explained by him. The novelty of the practice left American lawyers without experience in bankruptcy proceedings. The work is therefore endeavored to supply the practitioner with a treatise on the subject which may be easily consultedly rely. His experience as one of the Commissioners for the amendment of the English Bankrupt Law, and as sucessive London practitioner in Bankruptcy cases, peculiarly fitted him for the task. The author has also endeavored, by the adoption of a clear and methodical style, to render the work a guide to the merchant and the layman.

KINGLAKE'S CRIMEAN WAR.

THE INVASION OF THE CRIMEA: Its Origin, and an Account of its Progress down to the Death of Lord Raglan. By ALEXANDER WILLIAM KINGLAKE. With Maps, Plans, and Portraits. 8vo, Cloth, Beveled ready. Vol. II. will be published shortly. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

We have here a work worthy of the author's reputation, and worthy of the labor, the patience, the industry he must have expended upon it. Like the writings of Roster, of Hallam, of Macaulay, of Motley, it will interpret the age, and will prove for the art of composition, as well as for the subject, a model. It is a work of judgment and not unfrequently of fine thought, such as that of the author; but this does not interfere with the admirable flow of narrative which is the charm of the whole.—London Quarterly Review.

Readers will linger with devout delight over the opening pages of this history. Its clear analysis of the causes of this war, his picture of the campaign, the dramatic force with which he throws the combats, the battle-field, the triumphant defense of Lord Raglan from the foul calumnies which were heaped upon him—the whole tempered by the calm dignity of a philosophical judgment—are all grandly told of these are the magnetic attractions of the work, the dissection of the character of Napoleon III. is absolutely electrical.—New York Evening Post.

HOWE & STEVENS'S
Family Dye Colors.

CAUTION.

All persons who keep HOWE & STEVENS'S FAMILY DYE COLORS for sale can be relied on for fair dealing, for the reason that they cost the retailer twenty-five cents per ounce more than other kinds of Dyes in the market, which he retails them all at the same price; consequently he retails them all at per dozen more by selling them.

We publish this caution to guard our customers against imposition. Accept none but HOWE & STEVENS'S FAMILY DYE COLORS. They are the original inventors of all in-doors dyes, and the only colors that are warranted to please, and made dyeing a domestic art. They have also, since, five years' experience, brought out particular colors, and have been constantly improving the quality of their Dyes. All the colors, both in liquid and powder form, are manufactured by the undersigned, and we can supply our customers with either. The liquids do not require so much time in dyeing; but the powder colors will color more pounds and goods than the same per package. In coloring blacks, browns, and drabs, we would say that we have always given preference to the liquid, unless for rubbers or some very small article.

A HUMBUG.

HOW IT LOOKS.

This Insect
Has a glossy dress,
A brass face,
Sickly mouth,
A hard heart,
Fleshy of back,
A sharp tooth,
Light flanks,
Long legs,
Apt to change places;
Feeds on cooked food,
And bites suspicious.

DR. WOLCOTT has pointed out these pests of society so plainly that none of these vampires have a right to quit their infamous business. But mock-auction shops, lottery-gaffs, quack and brass watch, and jewelry stores, surrounded by their pimps and ringsters, are not the only places of humbugs. Through human instinct and imitation, all Cayenne peppers, tarpentine, barbakoes, ether, &c., will produce inflammation and pain. To purchase such trash to stop pain and inflammation is ridiculous. Fire will not stop heat; a dumb bronze shams the heat, and knows enough to soak in a pool of water, when wounded, to cool and cure inflammation and fever.

Fimes and gumblers try to look innocent, but folks can read their faces plain. Some try to persuade the ignorant that pills, physic, &c., cleanse the blood; pure blood needs no doctor. All other things purge the system, and keep it healthy. It is false equally absurd. Every body knows that it is false, and that no medicine can purify or increase a drop of blood. Food makes blood, bone, and muscle, and is the stuff for it to work on. Every dose of medicine we have ejected, and hurried out of the system as quick as possible. It is an enemy; has a deadly foe. Cosmetics, ill-health, and weakness are the result of dosing; dosing ruins the stomach. Then the living system has enough to do without working herself to death in expelling and killing the pernicious concoctions some poet down the throat. Food she welcomes when she needs it; when she asks for it. A pill-maker knows that vendors stop eating food, and see how long they can subsist on the drugs. Starving, they, nevertheless, keep giving medicines and cordials. What humbug is more transparent? A dog would be insulted if offered such a dose that he would curl his tail downward in scorn, and run away with his nose down. All physical pain arises from inflammation: put out the fire, and you stop pain whatever it is. You can skip pain as well as you can quench fire with water. WOLCOTT'S PAIN PAINT subdues inflammation, heat, and fever; one hundred times faster than ice; thousands have had a practical test of its merits at the very moment of most extreme pain, and they can testify that it has not failed in doing its work. It is simple: it is harmless: it has no stain: it gives no smart: it is for sale by druggists every where; and it is tested free of cost at DR. WOLCOTT'S office, 170 Chatham Square, New York, on every body who suffers, and they never fail of being benefited at the very first application of PAIN PAINT. DR. WOLCOTT is sole proprietor of WOLCOTT'S ANNIHILATOR for Catarrh and Colds in the Head, and has invented the only genuine office remedy for cures, and is well known throughout the city and country as a benefactor to mankind.

THE MASSACRE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW. Preceded by a History of the Religious Wars in the Reign of Charles IX. By HENRY WHITE, M.A. With Illustrations. 8vo. Cloth, $1 75.

Mr. White has performed his task well. His arguments are every where conclusive, ably supported by the results of the researches into the most authentic contemporary histories of the times of which he treats. His language is always forcible, and frequently rises into eloquence. His account of the state of France in the middle of the sixteenth century is admirable and exhaustive. The same praise may be allowed to his descriptions of the characters of the chief personages in the bloody drama which he recounts. We heartily commend the book for the impartial spirit in which it is written. Remembering how hard it is even to think of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew without a thrill of execration, we can not sufficiently praise this conspicuous merit.—The London Athenæum.

Of the state of France from the commencement of the century to the terrible day of St. Bartholomew Mr. White gives a masterly account. From numerous contemporary memoirs and state documents he has collected the details of a picture at once broad in its general effect and minute in its accessories—a picture full of life, color, character, and force. The massacre of Paris is of course the chief feature in the work, and is admirably described, without any pretense of pictorial writing, so much as to say that the whole historic tragedy passes vividly before our eyes, and we behold the grim side of the life of the sixteenth century in all its agents of blood and terror. Mr. White has produced a book full of research, conceived in the most conscientious and painstaking spirit, and written in a nervous and vigorous style. We give the greater part of the praise which it narrates and the principles which it affirms.—London Daily News.

Mr. White has exhibited great skill, great research, and considerable candor in executing his work, and readers of his clear narrative will readily bear testimony to the interest with which the story is kept up down to the awfully tragic close.—Glasgow Daily Herald.

II.

HISTORY OF THE THIRTY-NINTH CONGRESS of the United States. By WILLIAM H. BARNES. Portraits. 8vo. Cloth, $3.

A volume of 616 royal octavo pages, and 18 portraits on steel by the best engravers in the country.

The book contains a full and accurate history of the great measures of the most important Congress that ever assembled, with the biographical sketches of the members, together with characteristic and pertinent extracts from their speeches. The narrative portion of the work is written in clear and concise style, while the sketches, generally brief, are always to the point, and present the views of our wisest statesmen on the great subjects of recent legislation.

III.

DR. SMITH'S SMALLER HISTORY OF ENGLAND, A Smaller History of England, from the Earliest Times to the Year 1868. Edited by WILLIAM SMITH, LL.D. Illustrated by Engravings on Wood. 16mo, Cloth, $1 00. Uniform with Dr. Smith's Smaller Histories of Greece and Rome.

IV.

FIVE HUNDRED POUNDS REWARD. A Novel. By a Barrister. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

It is full of spirit and cleverness: the style is good. It is extremely entertaining; the plot is novel; and the characters are drawn from the life. . . . It is not thus our meets with a thoroughly amusing novel: true to its main characteristics, whimsical without being caricature, and fresh in the incidents and in the mode of handling them. . . . It is decidedly a clever and amusing book.—Athenæum.

Ground Coffee, 20c., 25c., 30c., 35c., best 40c. per pound. Hotels, Saloons, Boarding-House Keepers, and families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize by using our French Breakfast and Dinner Coffee, which we sell at the low price of 30c. per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 20 to 40 per cent. by purchasing their Teas and Coffees at

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St. (Post-Office Box, No. 5643), New York City.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 10 days, and we will refund the money.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city.

Some parties inquire of us how they should proceed to get up a club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a club say how much tea or coffee he wants, and send the money, and amounts plainly to our Price List, and the club is complete, send it to us by mail, and we will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark upon each package the name, so that there will be no confusion in the delivery. Any one can divide equitably among themselves.

The funds to pay for the goods ordered can be sent by drafts on New York, by post-office money orders, or by express, as may suit the convenience of the club. Or, if the amounts ordered exceed $20, we will, if desired, send the goods by Express to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary package for Clubs of less than $20.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-third by sending directly to "The Great American Tea Company."

BEWARE of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our Establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as we have no branches, and do not, in any case, authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office orders and drafts make payable to the order of the Great American Tea Company. Direct letters and orders to the Great American Tea Company,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street, Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

HARPER'S CATALOGUE.

A NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE of HARPER & BROTHERS' PUBLICATIONS, arranged alphabetically, is nearly ready for distribution, and may be obtained gratuitously on application to the Publishers personally, or by letter enclosing Five Cents.

The attention of gentlemen in town or country, designing to form Libraries or replenish their Literary Collections, is respectfully invited to this Catalogue, which will be found to comprise a large proportion of the standard and most esteemed works in English Literature—new numbers and new issues appearing from time to time—which are offered, in most instances, at less than one half the cost of similar productions in England.

To Librarians and others connected with Colleges, Schools, &c., who may not have access to a reliable guide in forming the true estimate of literary productions, it is believed this Catalogue will prove especially valuable for reference.

To prevent disappointment, it is suggested that, whenever a book can not be obtained through any bookseller or local agent, applications with remittance be addressed directly to the Publishers, which will receive prompt attention.

"IMPROVED BRONZE ALUMINUM HUNTING-CASED WATCHES"
(The qualities and resemblance of this new metal are such, compared to gold, that even judges are deceived) and "ROSKOFF'S PATENTED PEOPLE'S WATCH."
The Improved Bronze Aluminum watch is such my watches are made in a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. It has seriously occupied the attention of scientific men, and has not only called forth the eulogiums of the press in consequence of its perfect fine properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition, and even been favorably noticed by rescript of His Holiness Pius IX., authorizing its use in the manufacturing of Church goods.
The qualities of this metal are such that it is surpassed by none, if we except gold itself, and that only on account of the intrinsic value of the latter. Further details will be found in my circular, which will be sent postpaid on demand.
My watches are made of three sizes, all huntingcased—one small for ladies or lads, and two for gents. The movements are well finished, carefully put together by skillful workmen, and perfectly regulated. I can therefore warrant them excellent time-keepers. These goods being manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to sell any of the above sizes at the extremely low price of $16 00. A full assortment of all kinds of chains always on hand.

NICK OF THE WOODS.
NICK OF THE WOODS
IN THE
"FIRESIDE COMPANION."
GEORGE MUNRO & CO. have at an immense expense secured the exclusive right of publishing that wonderful story of Border Life,
"NICK OF THE WOODS,"
in the "FIRESIDE COMPANION," which will be commenced in No. 34 of that popular Journal, issued on April 2d.
"NICK OF THE WOODS"
is the most remarkable and exciting story of the kind that ever appeared, and in the Fireside band from which myriads of Indian Tales have been derived. Some of the characters are unequaled in the whole range of fiction for a certain kind of weird, mysterious interest that hangs around them. For instance, the terrible Jibbenainosay, the "Spirit that walks;" Bloody Nathan, the "Man of Peace;" and Roaring Ralph Stackpole, the "Ramping Tiger of the Rolling Fork," who was equally at home whether stealing red men's scalps or a pale face's horse. The News to read a story of such intense interest, of course, will be universal, and we trust that our friends will order the paper of their newsdealers in season, to prevent disappointment.
The "FIRESIDE COMPANION" is the Best Family Story Paper published. It is for sale by all Newsdealers. Price 6 cents a copy; $3 00 a year; four copies $10 00; or nine copies for $20 00.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. XII.—No. 589.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 11, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

At one o'clock on Monday, March 23, as already briefly announced in this journal, the Senate resolved itself into a Court for the continuance of the trial of the President. The Impeachment Managers on the part of the House appeared, as did the counsel of the President, and the proceedings of the Court were about commencing in due form, when Mr. GARRETT DAVIS, a Senator from Kentucky, somewhat surprised the Senate and the lawyers present by offering a motion which in effect denied the jurisdiction of the Senate in the case. Chief Justice CHASE at once decided the question by ordering the motion to a vote without debate, and it was rejected by a vote of 49 nays to 2 yeas, only the two Senators from Kentucky voting in favor of it.

The counsel of the President then read his plea and answer to the articles of impeachment. This document is very long, filling over four columns of the daily newspapers. Briefly, it is an explicit, emphatic, and detailed denial of every allegation and charge contained in the articles of the House. It denies any intention of violating the Tenure-of-Office or any other law; denies the correctness of the alleged speeches of the President; affirms his right to express his opinion the same as any other citizen; and, in closing, generally denies in toto the entire list of charges.

On the following day, March 24, the replication of the House was filed by the Managers of Impeachment. The House simply reasserted the charges, and announced that it stood ready to prove them true.

J. I. CHRISTIE, MESSENGER OF THE SENATE, RECEIVING TICKETS AT THE ENTRANCE.
[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

The counsel of the President had asked on March 23 for thirty days to prepare for the defense, but this was denied them, and it was ordered that the trial should begin on Monday, March 30. On that day the trial really began in earnest, and has been continuous to the present writing in a quiet, but intensely interesting manner.

Our engravings in this issue of the Weekly which bear upon this highly important event are of the most interesting character. On pages 232 and 233 will be found one of the most valuable engravings which has ever appeared in this journal. It is an elaborate and correct view of the interior of the United States Senate Chamber, showing the details of the architecture and fresco-work, the various departments of the gallery, the arrangement of the desks on the floor of the Senate (thus giving at a glance the positions of the Senators, each of whom is portrayed in his designated seat), and the temporary arrangement made for the accommodation of the members of the House of Representatives, and the managers, and the counsel of the President. In the Weekly for March 14 we gave a large engraving of the House of Representatives, in which the same features were accurately portrayed. This companion picture of the Senate is on the same scale and plan, and the two together represent the two principal chambers of the national capitol more accurately than any similar drawings yet made. The details of the architecture, etc., are made from photographs of the architect's plans; the numerous portraits of the more prominent members of each House are from photographs furnished by Messrs. BRADY & CO., Pennsylvania Avenue, Washington; and the beautiful design and accurate drawing are by Mr. THEODORE R. DAVIS, our artist at Washington.

THE IMPEACHMENT TRIAL—THE MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES PROCEEDING TO THE SENATE CHAMBER.
[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

On our first page will be found two engravings which explain themselves. Mr. J. I. CHRISTIE, the Messenger of the Senate, has been detailed by the Sergeant-at-Arms to receive the tickets of those admitted to the trial, and our engraving illustrates him in the discharge of this duty. When it is known that crowds of old ladies, negroes, etc., etc., indignant at being refused admission to the Capitol of the nation, are continually asking questions, making appeals, and muttering threats, it is apparent that the position is not a sinecure. Four or five policemen are necessary to keep back the crowd which is always waiting here during the session of the Senate for the trial.

The House of Representatives have resolved to attend the trial in Committee of the Whole, and our illustration represents them approaching the door of the Senate, at which they are met by the Sergeant-at-Arms, Mr. GEORGE T. BROWN, whose duty it is to receive them and announce their presence to the Senate.

NATIONAL HONOR.

THE favorite plan of argument of the Republicans is to represent the bondholders as an aristocracy. A repudiating party must hope to excite a sullen class hatred, which will not stop to reason, but will seek its gratification in the ruin of the exclusive class. And in fact, the old cry of the poor against the rich. But the truth is, and we hope it will be as steadily and wholly proclaimed as the falsehood—the truth is, that the great mass of the bondholders are mechanics and working men and women of every kind. Mr. JAY COOKE remarks in the recent paper upon his subject, which should be universally diffused—for no man in the country knows more of the facts than he—"With the exception of Banks and Saving Institutions there are very few large holders of Government bonds, the great bulk being held by the people, not by the capitalists."

Mr. COOKE here speaks of the Savings Banks as if they were independent individual holders; but every such institution represents hundreds of the smallest bondholders—domestics, seamstresses, day-laborers, gardeners, clerks, porters, artists, and others. The Evening Post discovers that the Savings Banks in this State hold forty-nine millions of the United States bonds, and that the depositors of the classes we have mentioned are $88,961 in number. The same institutions in Massachusetts own twenty-five millions of bonds, and there are 316,000 depositors. In Rhode Island these banks hold thirteen millions of the bonds. In the city of New York alone the agents of the Life Insurance Companies, to the amount of twenty millions, are invested in this manner. The Marine and Fire Insurance Companies hold about forty-six millions. Probably two-thirds of the bank stocks, not held abroad nor deposited as security by the National Banks, are held by the various governments of Europe; and the true owners are the classes which we have mentioned.

Thus it appears that the bondholders, as a class, are mechanics, laborers, salaried officers, and tradesmen, rather than rich men and capitalists. But the orators and writers who endeavor to deny or to conceal this fact, and to irritate those who have no bonds against those who hold them, push their policy further and attempt also to set section against section. The West, we are told, contributes some forty millions to the annual population. Senator SHERMAN'S speech and the Indiana resolutions, it is urged, indicate that it is a demand not confined to Mr. PENDLETON and his party. And we showed a fortnight since that this was not true of the West as a section. One of the clearest, most forcible, and conclusive arguments against the impolicy as well as disgrace of repudiation comes from the Finance Committee of the Chicago Common Council. Mr. COMPTROLLER COOKE informs us, the West took $220,000,000 of the $600,000,000 of the Seven-Thirty loans; Ohio more than $90,000,000, and Illinois more than $70,000,000. The Five-Twenty and other loans were also largely taken in the West.

There are some three or four hundred millions of this debt held in the United States held abroad, and mainly in Germany. They are in the hands of those who trusted the national faith in the darkest hour of our fortunes: of those who were derided and cursed by the capitalists who hoped for our destruction, or who believed it to be inevitable. Shall we justify the words of our enemies, and prove that those who trusted and befriended us were fools? Shall we make the name of republic synonymous with dishonor, and shame every generous heart in the world that looked to us to show that a popular government is not only the most powerful and prosperous, but the justest and most upright of all? There are speculative men and true doctrinaires who say, why not? who insist that they have no part in making the debt, and are not bound to help pay it; and if you ask, waiving every other question, what would be the result of spurning the world that we would not pay our debts, even those incurred in maintaining the national existence, they reply that governments could then make no more loans, and wars would be at an end. Such a proposition, possible only to a purely doctrinaire mind, which views human life as a mere problem in mathematics, closes discussion. "War is an ugly thing," says JOHN STUART MILL, "but not the ugliest of things: the decayed and degraded state of moral and patriotic feeling which thinks nothing worth a war, is worse."

In considering the general question, the London Saturday Review, which during the rebellion was one of the most unscrupulous enemies of this country, and a most contemptuous infidel of our success, says—and with truth: "It is easy to prove that if all questions of honor and morality were set aside, a wealthy nation gains more than it loses by the costliest observances of good faith; but the better class of American politicians deserve credit for opposing direct or indirect repudiation on the ground, not that it is inexpedient, but that it would be a public disgrace.....If there was no probability that loans would be required hereafter, the transfer of some hundred of millions sterling from the rightful owners to the tax-payer would be a profitable transaction; but the opponents of the scheme hold that calculation has nothing to do with keeping or breaking a promise."

This is the simple and conclusive consideration. It is dishonorable. The tone of the remonstrating argument is the consciousness of this truth. It proceeds at once to show that its proposition is not dishonorable. It is, in fact, addressed to the better instincts of the republican himself. For, of course, every party treats the whole subject with suspicious delicacy and reluctance, while he honestly thinks the law, strictly construed, gives the Government the right to pay the bonds in greenbacks at the maturity of the five-year option, yet candidly admits that he should like "to avoid deciding a question that in the end would be settled by our way decided, without affect the public credit." And why? Because when a man gravely debates whether he shall be a swindler, he has ceased to be wholly honest.

THE PRESIDENT'S USURPATIONS.

THE protense that President JOHNSON is a martyr to this defense of the Constitution is intended only for the inexperienced. We maintain, in the strongest form of present assertion before the country is done to his manifest and bold usurpations of power.

The proclamation of General LEE'S army occurred on the 9th of April, 1865. That of General JOHNSTON followed soon after. The death of President LINCOLN occurred on the 15th day of April, and from that moment active events for the development of any Presidential policy. The Vice-President took the oath of office as President at this interesting juncture, when he had only to wait for the surrender of the two rebel forces in the Southwest—which soon followed—to know that every sword drawn in the rebellion had been laid down, and sheathed. The terms of the capitulation of General LEE and of his associates embraced merely the personal rights of the respective armies, leaving to be adjusted with the United States those which the revolted States and the great mass of their people should thereforward accept. The question embraced the civil rights of slaves, lately slaves and chattels, had "emerged into the human character."

The policies were presented for the consideration of President JOHNSON. One of these, and obviously the correct one, was the convocation of Congress, as the duty of complete adjustment of the whole question—following, in that respect, the war power which is bestowed on Congress. The other policy was to adopt the Executive usurpation, which devolve the duty of such adjustments on the Executive, and the war power in England being wholly Executive to it, and including the settlement of the terms of peace. Every one knows that the latter policy, and thus commenced his usurpations of authority.

In defense of his measures—in which, afterring to represent the Sovereignty of United States, he gave Governors and governments to States lately in revolt—it is claimed that they were only necessary in the emergency, and that President LINCOLN had set the example. As the action of President LINCOLN with respect to Congress covered in the midst of hostilities, when unusual powers appertain to the Commander-in-chief, embracing every thing necessary for success or safety; and the Southern States did not view the acts of President JOHNSON as of a temporary character; on the contrary, in that the appearance of being, and it was intended to be, of a permanent character.

What were the relations of the Southern States to the Union at this juncture? "It is an established principle of international law," said Mr. CALHOUN, "that wherever a country is subdued, even in part, its sovereignty is for the time suspended, and that of the conquering sovereignty is put in force." This was asserted in behalf of the United States with respect to Mexico, but on the question where the power to exercise the substituted sovereignty resided, he observed: "I readily concede to the President, as Commander-in-chief, many and great powers, but they are such as arise out of exigencies immediately connected with the operations of the army, and its success or safety..... but when he undertakes to exercise power, on his own authority, over subdued territories unconnected with the operations of the army, he exercises, in my opinion, a power not belonging to him. Congress may by law authorize him to levy contributions as to establish temporary governments in such territory; but it is one thing to exercise it on his own authority, and another to exercise it under the authority of law. The one places him under the control of law, while the other places him above its control."

That this doctrine applies to the States which undertook to secede from the Union, and for this purpose to take upon themselves a new and different character from that they previously had, is obvious from a single test. Were the rebel States during hostilities, when their whole energies were concentrated into a public force and arrayed against the United States, entitled to be represented on the floor of Congress? No one will allege that they were. If they could not take part in Congress in determining how we should conduct the war against them, it follows that they can not take the same part in adjusting the terms of peace. These terms still remain to be arranged. This arrangement must be made upon the rule of international law, that, as one of the results of victory, the conquering power, or the United States, mediately prevails over a conquered people. Any other idea would enable the Southern States, through means of representation in Congress or in the Legislatures, to obstruct such arrangements as are necessary to the safety of the Union. No other alternative would in that case remain but the further and interminable prosecution of the war.

The error of the President in assuming a wholly different state of things—such, for instance, as that the United States were still as States in the Union, their rights unimpaired by the war they waged with terrible energy, and in further contention that his was the authority which could adjust the difficulties—is still operating greatly to the embarrassment of the whole country, which doubtless would have been in a happier condition at present but for the circumstances allowed had Congress been convened. The power to assemble "both Houses or either.....on extraordinary occasions" is expressly conferred by Art. II § 3 of the second Article, and it is clear that the President's omission to act under this authority was a manifest neglect of the public interests. The desire on the one side to escape the perils of reason—for the army only had been relieved—and the feeling of magnanimity which then extensively pervaded the North would have found some common ground on which restoration might have been safely based. The President would have been required to settle the question—the gravest ever presented for decision—and to admit the Southern States into the Union through the bars which he had thrown down, without conditions, by the proclamation or Government which alone has jurisdiction of the question—the legislative power.

The war had created a national debt and a confederate debt, yet was to be made operative over the whole Union, the other inoperative everywhere. It had left maimed and disabled soldiers and widows and fatherless children in every State of the nation, and to be rewarded with pensions, and those of the rebels left unprotected by such a remedy; it had changed the relations of master and slave, and required new regulations; and it is perfectly idle to suppose that these and other important questions, and the one which underlay them all, upon when the sufferage shall hereafter devolve, could be arranged without the intervention of Congress.

It was a grave failure of duty to omit the convocation of Congress, inasmuch as the regular session was not to commence until nearly eight months after General LEE'S capitulation, during which time the State could go on only under very great disadvantages. We also then entertained that Congress was a body "hanging on the verge of the Government," or was the power in the existing form bonded on objects of personal ambition? The same fundamental error of policy which assumed to act independently of Congress and in defiance of Congress, has been persistently followed by the President as each successive step has been taken by that body in prescribing the terms of peace. The executive has been kept apart and in difficulty through this obstruction, until at last a direct assault has been made by the Executive upon the Tenure-of-Office Act, and consequently upon the power of Congress.

This Act undertook to protect the Secretary of War against removal. Such was one of its manifest objects, as the President well knew when he suspended Mr. STANTON under its provisions, and the Senate, also, under its provisions, had restored Mr. STANTON. It is a mere quibble to say that the immovability of Mr. STANTON was not only not intended but was excepted from the operation of the law. The President himself having settled this point by first suspending Mr. STANTON—as this mode of proceeding had no other authority than the Tenure-of-Office Act—is estopped from now claiming that the same Act gave him the power of removal.

We have undertaken to meet the President's additional ground, that this Act is unconstitutional, by arguments founded on the specific provisions conferred on Congress, with a reference with the implied power of removal claimed for the President. Subsequent investigation has brought to our aid the highest authority for the opinions we have thus advanced. Mr. CLAY, Mr. WEBSTER (the latter, Vol. 4 of his works, p. 179), Mr. CALHOUN, and Mr. CLAYTON, in the debates in 1833 and 1846, agreed in opinion that it is competent for Congress to require, as to all officers, excepting judicial, appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, that the power of removal shall be exercised only in like manner.

It was not alone in debate that Mr. CALHOUN thus entertained himself, but in his work on the Constitution of the United States, regarded in the light of a testamentary contribution from his mind, at pages 220, 344, and 369, the doctrine is solemnly asserted that it is wholly in the power of Congress thus to fix the tenure of offices except of the judicial; that the concession made to the President by the Congress of 1789 is unconstitutional; and that it is necessary to the safety of the Union to prevent the exercise of the power of removal by him, without "the concurrence and consent of the Senate."

That he alone is not the safe depositary of this power appears from the fact that he persists in retaining in office those persons connected with the Internal Revenue Department whose frequent abuses and gross neglect of the public service are the subject of just complaint by those who are immediately responsible to the Secretary of the Treasury.

The country demands to know why these offenders are retained. But one answer can be given. They are the professed friends of the President, and he does not hesitate to consider allegiance to himself as a higher recommendation than service to the State or fidelity to their trust or from allegiance to the Government.

THE ALABAMA BILL.

THE Alabama bill that passed the House by a vote of 102 Republicans to 29 Democrats, one Republican, Mr. WILLIAMS, of Pennsylvania, not voting, makes the Constitution hastily submitted in that State a provisional organic law. The officers elected under it are to qualify upon the list of July, and the Legislature is again to submit the Constitution with or without amendment, as it chooses, to a popular vote. When a majority of the qualified voters have approved it, and the Legislature have adopted the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the State Constitution may be presented to Congress for its approval. Mr. STEVENS proposed as a fundamental condition of the restoration of the State that there should be universal and impartial suffrage, and if the privilege were ever abridged, that the State forfeit, that the act should be void, and the State become again a "mere territory." This was lost without a division. The usual flaw in Mr. STEVENS'S propositions, who at least never leaves any doubt of what he thinks and means. The bill now passes the Senate, where Mr. STEWART, of Nebraska, had already previously offered it, and we presume that it will pass.

The advantage gained by the substitute is, that it provides for a provisional organic law of the State to loyal men; retains the military supervision which is still essential; provides for a fair submission of the Constitution to the vote of the people, and authorizes the Legislature to propose amendments which are to be separately submitted. This is a very satisfactory plan. The important point is to know whether a majority of the registered voters approve the Constitution. General MEADE, in his report of the results of the late election, says:

"I am of the opinion that a revised Constitution, more liberal in its terms, and confined to the requirements of the reconstruction laws, would, in Alabama —as I have reason to expect it will in Georgia and Florida—meet with the approval of the majority of the registered voters; and I beg leave to call your attention to the difficulty of carrying on a government in a State every year or two, unless the Constitution fixed to take part in the government are in favor of the organic law. I believe a larger proportion of what must be the governing class, in my opinion, under the constitution should be presented to them for adoption."

The Convention proposes that the Convention reassembled to revise its own work; but this provision may be as wisely done by the Legislature. General MEADE will doubtless take care that the provisions of the law of reconstruction are repeated; and if a majority of the qualified voters approve the Constitution, and Congress approves it, it will stand as the fundamental law.

Of course, however, General MEADE knows, as we all know, that Congress will not approve any Constitution which is not founded upon equal rights. Any political disability, based merely upon color or race, would vitiate the organic law. In this respect the principle of the Constitution is unqualified since 1865, whatever changes of detail may be advisable. It is to propitiate what General MEADE calls "a larger proportion of what must be the governing class," it be necessary to deliver Union men of any kind to the domination of rebels, Alabama will not at present return to the Union. MR. KERR, a Democrat from Indiana, declared in the House that the proposed Constitution is despised and loathed by the people of Alabama. General MEADE says that he interprets the result as an indication that the registered voters do not desire to be restored under that Constitution. That is possible; but all that we know is, that a majority have refused to speak, or have been prevented from speaking. What we desire, and what the present bill provides, is, that they shall have an opportunity of saying what they do wish. If a majority of the registered voters of Alabama refuse to return to the Union upon a Constitution guaranteeing equal rights, we shall take their decision should be respected, and that the United States should retain its present immediate government of the State. The one thing that can not be permitted, unless we wholly misconceive the intention of those who sustained the war, and are now paying for it, is, that the political power in the late rebel States shall be intrusted to their disaffected citizens.

We invite the attention of General MEADE, and of all good citizens, to the following letter, which we have from a responsible and official source, as an illustration of the methods by which a "Conservative" result was achieved in Alabama:

"MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA, March 18, 1868.

"Editor Harper's Weekly:

"Many of the best-laid of the various means resorted to by the 'Chivalry' to keep voters away from the polls at the late election in this State, have been so charged that planters had inserted clauses in contracts prohibiting the employés from voting. A friend has lately shown me one of these documents which has as its indorsement in substance as follows: 'Approved January 16, 1868,' and signed by the Assistant Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau in Alabama as to the character of contracts entered into in that sub-district, and report will probably be made of the result. I only mention this now as an added bit of evidence of the fairness with which the opposition conducted matters in this region at the late election."

VANDERBILT versus DREW.

THE Erie War, in the magnitude of interests involved, the wealth and power of the rival combinations, the extent and variety of means used to compass certain ends, and the character of the respective leaders, is certainly unparalleled in the history of similar contests. CORNELIUS VANDERBILT on the one hand, and DANIEL DREW on the other—those twin Colossi of modern Roads—are both men of great forecast, iron will, and great energy, with resources commensurate to their vast undertakings. Around their standards rally an army of shrewd and wealthy capitalists, who acknowledge their leadership.

The VANDERBILT party, having secured, in succession, the control of the Hudson River, Harlem, and New York Central Railways, and virtually of the Cleveland and Toledo Railway, now aim to control the only remaining great trunk line through New York, viz., the Erie Railway. Should they succeed in doing so, they will dominate lines representing $150,000,000 capital, through which the fertility of the unbounded West, and, ultimately (after the completion of the Pacific Railroad) the "wealth of Ormus and of Ind," will be poured into the lap of New York.

The DREW party, on the other hand, having actual possession of the Erie line, whose broadgauge main stem reaches, through the Atlantic and Great Western, to Cincinnati, and through the Ohio and Mississippi line, to St. Louis and the Mississippi River on the Southwest, now purpose to extend their broad-gauge from Akron, in Ohio, to Toledo, and thence, over the Michigan Southern line, to Chicago. Such an arrangement, by enabling the Erie Company to send freight through without breaking bulk, would not only add greatly to its stock value, but bring the line into still more direct and powerful competition with its rival, the New York Central, for the trade of the Northwest.

Upon its face the war is an obstinate struggle for ascendency, and both parties have resorted to the aid of the Legislatures of New York and New Jersey, the Courts, and the Press—to say nothing of the potential "greenback." The DREW party, having possession of the field, have been able to load down their opponents with $10,000,000 of fresh stock, which they claim is necessary in order to equip and stock their proposed improvement. If the VANDERBILT interest can prevent their raising this money they will cripple the present management by just that amount. They charge that this new issue of stock is illegal and void; and so far as the New York Legislature is concerned, it has already, by a vote of 83 to 17, sustained VANDERBILT. The immediate effect of this decision was to cause a rise of six per cent. in the market-price of the stock. How even this ilicoinderable advantage has been reached, through all the tangled mass of litigation, of orders, attachments, and injunctions, would puzzle one to explain. Columns upon columns of newspaper type have been used in tracing the progress of the suit.

But there is another aspect of the case quite as serious to the litigants. The war is not only a struggle for railroad supremacy, but for speculative gains; and in reality we see the highest legal tribunals of the State operating in the interest of princely stock-gamblers. As the case stands, the DREW party have imposed their new stock upon their opponents at prices ranging from 73 to 83. Should the final decision be in favor of the VANDERBILT party, then the common stock of the Erie Railway will be intrinsically worth less than forty cents on the dollar, and the VANDERBILTS can easily find themselves in possession of the Fatal Elephant. In that case, what will they do with it? They will not dare to elevate the market value of the stock, and if they allow it to fall, their losses will be immense. If, however, it shall be decided that the new stock must be canceled, this will be a substantial victory for the VANDERBILT party, as the vast sums which they have paid out for the stock will return again to their pockets. In any event, the matter can only be decided after a long litigation, meanwhile (unless a compromise be effected) those who hold this stock must possess their souls with patience and be prepared for the worst.

Mr. VANDERBILT has proved himself a wonderful alchemist, since he has transmuted those "worthless shares," Harlem and Rubicon, into sound dividend-paying securities; but can he do the same for Erie? Some of the knowing ones think this doubtful, and affirm that the Napoleonic campaigns, after a hundred financial victories, will find his Moscow in Erie: for during an experience of thirty years in Railroad affairs he has never fought many a hard fight, and his immense fortune testifies with what success.

As the fight goes on the rival combinations run or lose according to their ability. Already the rates of freights and fares on the Erie line have been reduced 33 per cent. This obliges the New York Central and Hudson River Line to reduce their rates to a corresponding degree, involving losses of millions of dollars to the gross earnings of these competing roads, which is all play to the forwarding and receiving public, but financial ruin to the individual stockholders.

Unless a compromise be effected (which is perhaps more than likely), no one can predict the result. One thing is above all apparent, viz., that, while certain persons are benefited by those combinations called stylish monopolies, the general public are not gainers but losers by them. The common sentiment and interest, the spirit of our institutions, and the tenor of decisions in our highest courts, unite to condemn monopolies.

PROBABLY.

IN the midst of every kind of wild and foolish report it is delightful to hear of any thing in peculiarly probable as the nomination of the Chief Justice for the Presidency by the Democratic party. As MR. CHASE officially stated that the Five-Twenties were to be paid principal and interest in gold, the Democracy of the West will probably shout for joy at his nomination, and MR. PENDLETON and his trusty squire VALLANDIGHAM would doubtless be glad to see their illustrious Democratic fellow-citizen. As MR. CHASE was also one of the earliest and most strenuous advocates of suffrage without regard to color, the Democratic journals which have been alternately humorous and horrified at the suggestion that a man is a man even if not born in Ireland, will probably hail him with loud hosannas. And as no American statesman has more steadily and ably maintained the fundamental doctrine of equality of rights as the only secure foundation of Republican liberty, MR. CHASE, the great and noble party, whose inspiring watchword is "Niggers have no rights," will probably vote for him next to the support of the successor of Judge TANEY.

Probably the Democratic party managers will also nominate MR. WADE for Vice-President, and will take care that MR. BENJAMIN, MR. RIDDLE, and MR. COLFAX are called into the Democratic MR. CHASE'S Democratic cabinet. Under this régime also we shall probably see that eminent Democrat WENDELL PHILLIPS induced to enter official life as Attorney-General; while, of course, we should probably find MR. JOHN J. HOPPER, MR. WILLIAM M. TWEED, MR. PETER B. SWEENY, and the rest of the Democratic dictators of the city of New York urgently insisting upon MR. CHARLES S. SPENCER as United States Attorney for this District, while MR. SANFORD E. CHURCH would probably hear of nothing but the election of the staunch Democrat MR. FENTON to the Senate, if the New York Convention, after naming MR. CHASE by acclamation, should fail to nominate the Governor for the second time. As for General HANCOCK, he would probably inform us that it was evident by his treatment of the freedmen that he had nothing in his eye during his administration in Louisiana but the designation of the Freedmen's friend, MR. CHASE, as the Democratic candidate; while General MCCLELLAN would probably send by a Dutch schooner a message that he was preparing to change his base from the rocking-chair to the settee, and hoped, when it was safely accomplished, to forward his congratulations to his more fortunate successor upon the remains of the Chicago platform.

Probably, however, we are mistaken. Probably MR. CHASE'S career since he entered public life offers the strongest evidence of his being an available Democratic candidate. Probably he has never been upon any side of any question, from loyalty in the Senate down to the extension of slavery, upon the organization of Kansas, upon all questions involving the overpowering ascendency of the slave interest, it was always impossible to ascertain where MR. CHASE stood. Probably, while some pronounced bodily for slavery, and others as boldly exposed its enormous tyranny and its inevitable peril, MR. CHASE sat upon the fence and was unknown to the friends of freedom, and not counted among the champions of liberty. All these probabilities make it highly probable that MR. CHASE will be the candidate of a party that is closely chained to the corpse of slavery.

Probably, also, his career as a party leader contrasts unfavorably with that of MR. SEWARD. Probably MR. SEWARD stands now where he stood in 1832, the leader of the party of free and peaceful and intelligent progress, while MR. CHASE has forfeited the love and respect of a whole generation of the young men, has telegraphed that the President's mad and maudlin speeches have saved the country, and has stood at the Presidential elbow applauding, while the representatives of the party were denounced and ridiculed. Probably MR. CHASE has asked a shouting mob whether they would have ANDREW JOHNSON or JEFF DAVIS for King, and has supported his efforts to force Union men out of every kind in the Southern States into the power of the late rebels.

Indeed from every probable of all probabilities is, that MR. CHASE will be nominated by the Democrats on the same day that the Republicans nominate MR. SEWARD. And we advise all quidnuncs to keep a sharp look out, for they will certainly catch lots of larks when the sky falls.

GENERAL HOWARD AND THE FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

"CONSERVATISM," or the Democratic party, instinctively sneers at every thing and every body honorably associated with the war in which the party DAGON was demolished. The Freedmen's Bureau is one of the most beneficent and necessary departments of the Government. Its operations, amidst all difficulties and discouragements, are generally efficient and admirable. It is, of course, an exceptional and temporary, but absolutely essential agency of the people, unless we would see the most frightful social misery kind. It distributed aid among the destitute of every color and race. It helps to establish, maintain, and protect common schools. It is superintended by the Chief Justice for the Presidency by the Democratic party. As MR. CHASE officially stated that the Five-Twenties were to be paid principal and interest in gold, the Democracy of the West will probably shout for joy at his nomination, and MR. GENERAL HOWARD AND THE FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

"CONSERVATISM," or the Democratic party, instinctively sneers at every thing and every body honorably associated with the war in which the party DAGON was demolished. The Freedmen's Bureau is one of the most beneficent and necessary departments of the Government. Its operations, amidst all difficulties and discouragements, are generally efficient and admirable. It is, of course, an exceptional and temporary, but absolutely essential agency of the people, unless we would see the most frightful social misery kind. It distributed aid among the destitute of every color and race. It helps to establish, maintain, and protect common schools. It is superintended by the transportation of the freedmen, and is their visible, present friend in their otherwise friendless exposure to the most cruel chances. When we reflect that a proscription had been agreed upon, with no money, no land, nothing but their labor, in a region where labor has been almost paralyzed, affirming the habit of servile dependence, and surrounded by those whom circumstances made their enemies, we can easily imagine what must have been their fate had the Government not interfered there especially. General HOWARD, in his late annual Report, supposed that the Bureau would be allowed to expire in February next, but he was wrong, but to this he gave his consent only upon the consideration that each of the States in which it exists would then be fully restored to the Union, and the freedmen, having all the rights of citizenship, would be able, with the advantages they had already received from the Bureau, and with the aid of the United States soldiers to protect themselves, provided the educational division of the Bureau were still maintained under the care of the National Department of Education. The preservation of the States, however, being still uncertain, and the Department of Education being virtually abolished, Mr. T. D. ELIOT, the early and constant friend of the Bureau in Congress, has introduced a bill, which promptly passed the House, continuing the Bureau for another year.

Of course as the Freedmen's Bureau is an absolutely necessary protection of the emancipated class, it has been bitterly opposed by the party that desires to keep the freedmen in their late masters. The party opposition to Mr. ELIOT'S bill in the House was fully led by FERNANDO WOOD, who, in utter sympathy with the honorable tactics of his party, offered a statement—which he would not guarantee, and merely to excite prejudice—that General HOWARD had been giving views upon the subject of amalgamation. Mr. ELIOT promptly read a letter from General HOWARD, unequivocally denying that he held or had ever expressed such views. It was a work of superfluity, but it served to expose the falsehood of the assertion. It is also easy to see why MR. WOOD and his conservative party-friends denounce amalgamation as revolting, inasmuch as their political allies in the late rebel States have always been, practically, amalgamationists.

Mr. WOOD, also, in his role of Democratic leader against the character of one of the bravest and purest soldiers of the war, and with the same honorable intention of striking at the Freedmen through one of their most active and efficient friends, accused General HOWARD of having become rich by speculating upon the necessities of the Freedmen. This slander, also, Mr. ELIOT directly repelled; and when he alluded to the General's loss of an arm in battle, Mr. BLAINE justly remarked: "An offense which can not be forgiven on the other side of the House." Indeed, General HOWARD is secure in the admiration of the nation for which he fought, and the affectionate gratitude of the race to whose welfare he has devoted himself. And when FERNANDO WOOD appears as the assailant of such a man, it is a spectacle profoundly symbolic and instructive. It is the spirit of mean servility to an aristocratic class, of contempt of the oppressed, of pandering to ignorance and passion, contrasted with that intelligent and patriotic heroism which means to establish this Government upon the impregnable and eternal foundation of fair play for all men.

"FARRAGUT IN THE FUTTOCK SHROUDS."

WE give on the succeeding page an admirable engraving representing Admiral FARRAGUT lashed to the futtock shrouds of his flag-ship during the great naval engagement in Mobile Bay on August 5, 1864. The circumstances of this memorable action do not require repetition; the interest is one of those which is novel and will always be clearly remembered, being, as it was, one of the most striking as well as grand dueling feats of the late war.

The engraving is from the celebrated picture by WILLIAM PAGE, which most of our readers will probably have doubtless seen. It is probably one of the most accurate paintings of the kind ever produced. Admiral FARRAGUT himself the artist at his enterprise, giving him several sittings for the portrait and figure. Numerous studies of the Hartford were made, and also of the scene of the engagement in Mobile Bay; and Mr. PAGE'S fidelity and success in reproducing the scene on his canvas have been acknowledged by all the many officers and sailors who visited it.

CHAPTER II.

MR. GODFREY followed the announcement of his name—as Mr. Godfrey does every thing else —quietly and modestly. He was close to close on the servant's heels as to startle us. He was not so far behind as to cause us the double inconvenience of a pause and an open door. It is in the completeness of his daily life that the true Christian appears. This dear man was very complete.

"Go to Miss Verinder," said my aunt, addressing the servant, "and tell her Mr. Ablewhite is here."

We both inquired after his health. We both asked him together whether he felt like himself again, after his terrible adventure of the past week. With perfect tact he contrived to answer us at the same moment. Lady Verinder had his reply in words. I had his charming smile.

"What," he cried, with infinite tenderness, "have I done to deserve all this sympathy? My dear aunt! my dear Miss Clack! I have merely been mistaken for somebody else. I have only been blindfolded; I have only been strangled; I have only been thrown flat on my back, on a very thin carpet covering a particularly hard floor. Think how much worse it might have been! I might have been murdered; I might have been robbed. What have I lost? Nothing but Nervous Force—which the law doesn't recognize as property; so that, strictly speaking, I have lost nothing at all. If I could have had my own way I would have kept my adventure to myself—I shrink from all this fuss and publicity. But Mr. Luker made his injuries public, and my injuries, as the necessary consequence, have been proclaimed in their turn. I have become the property of the newspapers until the gentle reader gets sick of the subject. I am very sick indeed of it myself. May the gentle reader soon be like me! And how is dear Rachel? Still enjoying the gayeties of London? So glad to hear it! Miss Clack, I need all your indulgence. I am sadly behindhand with my Committee Work and my dear Ladies. But I really do hope to look in at the Mothers'-Small-Clothes next week. Did you make observing progress at Monday's Committee? Was the Board hopeful about future prospects? And are we nicely off for Trowsers?"

The heavenly gentleness of his smile made his apologies irresistible. The richness of his deep voice added its own indescribable charm to the interesting business question which he had just addressed to me. In truth, we were almost too nicely off for Trowsers; we were quite overwhelmed by them. I was just about to say so, when the door opened again, and an element of worldly disturbance entered the room in the person of Miss Verinder.

She approached dear Mr. Godfrey at a most unladylike rate of speed, with her hair shockingly untidy, and her face, what I should call, unbecomingly flushed.

"I am charmed to see you, Godfrey," she said, addressing him, I grieve to add, in the offhand manner of one young man talking to another. "I wish you had brought Mr. Luker with you. You and he (as long as our present excitement lasts) are the two most interesting men in all London. It's morbid to say this; it's unhealthy; it's all that a well-regulated mind like Miss Clack's most instinctively shudders at. Never mind that. Tell me the whole of the Northumberland Street story directly. I know the newspapers have left some of it out."

Even dear Mr. Godfrey partakes of the fallen nature which we all inherit from Adam—it is a very small share of our human legacy, but still he has it. I confess it grieved me to see him take Rachel's hand in both of his own hands, and lay it softly on the left side of his waistcoat. It was a direct encouragement to her reckless way of talking, and her insolent reference to me.

"Dearest Rachel," he said, in the same voice which had thrilled me when he spoke of our prospects and our trowsers, "the newspapers have told you every thing—and they have told it much better than I can."

Godfrey thinks we all make too much of the matter," she persisted. "He has been saying that he doesn't care to speak of it."

"Why?"

She put the question with a sudden flash in her eyes, and a sudden look up into Mr. Godfrey's face. On his side, he looked down at her with an indulgence so injudicious and so ill-deserved that I really felt called on to interfere.

"Rachel, darling!" I remarked, gently, "true greatness and true courage are ever modest."

"You are a very good fellow in your way, Godfrey," she said—not taking the smallest notice, observe, of me, and still speaking to her cousin as if she was one young man addressing another. "But I am quite sure you are not great; I don't believe you possess any extraordinary courage; and I am firmly persuaded—if you ever had any modesty—that your ladyworshipers relieved you of that virtue a good many years since. You have some private reason for not talking of your adventure in Northumberland Street; and I mean to know it."

"My reason is the simplest imaginable and the most easily acknowledged," he answered, still bearing with her. "I am tired of the subject."

"You are tired of the subject? My dear Godfrey, I am going to make a remark."

"What is it?"

"You are a great deal too much in the society of women. And you have contracted two very bad habits in consequence. You have learned to talk nonsense seriously, and you have got into a way of telling fibs for the pleasure of telling them. You can't go straight with your lady-worshipers. I mean to make you go straight with me. Come, and sit down." I am brimful of downright questions; and I expect you to be brimful of downright answers."

She actually dragged him across the room to a chair by the window, where the light would fall on his face. I deeply feel being obliged to report such language and to describe such conduct. But, hemmed in as I am, between Mr. Franklin Blake's check on one side and my own sacred regard for truth on the other, what am I to do? I looked at my aunt. She sat unmoved; apparently in no way disposed to interfere. I had never noticed this kind of torpor in her before. It was, perhaps, the reaction after the trying time she had had in the country. Not a pleasant symptom to remark, be it what it might, at dear Lady Verinder's age, and with

"SHE STOPPED—RAN ACROSS THE ROOM—AND FELL ON HER KNEES AT HER MOTHER'S FEET."

dear Lady Verinder's autumnal exuberance of figure.

In the mean time Rachel had settled herself at the window with our amiable and forbearing victim for forbearing—Mr. Godfrey. She began the string of questions with which she had threatened him, taking no more notice of her mother or of myself than if we had not been in the room.

"Have the police done any thing, Godfrey?"

"Nothing whatever."

"It is certain, I suppose, that the three men who laid the trap for you were the same three men who afterward laid the trap for Mr. Luker?"

"Humanly speaking, they are Rachel, there can be no doubt of it."

"And not a trace of them has been discovered?"

"Not a trace."

"It is thought—is it not?—that these three men are the three Indians who came to our house in the country."

"Some people think so."

"Do you think so?"

"My dear Rachel, they blindfolded me before I could see their faces. I know nothing whatever of the matter. How can I offer any opinion on it?"

Even the angelic gentleness of Mr. Godfrey was, you see, beginning to give way at last under the persecution inflicted on him. Whether unbridled curiosity, or ungovernable dread, dictated Miss Verinder's questions I do not presume to inquire. I only report that, on Mr. Godfrey's attempting to rise, after giving her the answer just described, she actually took him by the two shoulders, and pushed him back into his chair.—Oh, don't say this was unmodest! don't even hint that the recklessness of guilty terror could alone account for such conduct as I have described! We must not judge others. My Christian friends, indeed, indeed, indeed, we must not judge others!

She went on with her questions, unabashed. Earnest Biblical students will perhaps be reminded—as I was reminded—of the blinded children of the devil, when they went on with their orgies, unabashed, in the time before the Flood.

"I want to know something about Mr. Luker, Godfrey."

"I am again unfortunate, Rachel. No man knows less of Mr. Luker than I do."

"You never saw him before you and he met accidentally at the bank?"

"Never."

"You have seen him since?"

"Yes. We have been examined together, as well as separately, to assist the police."

"Mr. Luker was robbed of a receipt which he had got from his banker's—was he not? What was the receipt for?"

"For a valuable gem which he had placed in the safe-keeping of the bank."

"That's what the newspapers say. It may be enough for the general reader; but it is not enough for me. The banker's receipt must have mentioned what the gem was."

"The banker's receipt, Rachel—as I have heard it described—mentioned nothing of the kind. A valuable gem, belonging to Mr. Luker; deposited by Mr. Luker; sealed with Mr. Luker's seal; and only to be given up on Mr. Luker's personal application. That was the form, and that is all I know about it."

She waited a moment after he had said that. She looked at her mother and sighed. She looked back again at Mr. Godfrey, and went on.

"Some of our private affairs, at home," she said, "seem to have got into the newspapers?"

"I grieve to say it is so."

"And some side people, perfect strangers to us, are trying to trace a connection between what happened at our house in Yorkshire and what has happened since here in London?"

"The public curiosity, in certain quarters, is, I fear, taking that turn."

"The people who say that the three unknown men who ill-used you and Mr. Luker are the three Indians, also say that the valuable gem—?"

There she stopped. She had become gradually, within the last few moments, whiter and whiter in the face. The extraordinary blackness of her hair made this paleness, by contrast, so ghastly to look at that we all thought she would faint at that moment when she checked herself in the middle of her question. Dear Mr. Godfrey made a second attempt to leave his chair. My aunt entreated her to say no more. I followed my aunt with a modest medicinal peace-offering in the shape of a bottle of salts. We none of us produced the slightest effect on her.

"Godfrey, say where you are. Mamma, there is not the least reason to be alarmed about me. Clack, you're dying to hear the end of it—I won't faint, expressly to oblige you."

Those were the exact words she used—taken down in my diary the moment I got home. But oh, don't let us judge! My Christian friends, don't let us judge!

She turned once more to Mr. Godfrey. With an obstinate doubtful to see she went back again to the place where she had checked herself, and completed her question in those words:

"I spoke to you a minute since about what people were saying in certain quarters. Tell me plainly, Godfrey, do they say of those say that Mr. Luker's valuable gem is—The Moonstone?"

As the name of the Indian Diamond passed her lips I saw a change come over my admirable friend. His complexion deepened. He lost the genial suavity of manner which is one of his greatest charms. A noble indignation inspired his reply.

"They do say it," he answered. "There are people who don't hesitate to accuse Mr. Luker of telling a falsehood to serve some private interests of his own. He has over and over again solemnly declared that, until this scandal assailed him, he had never even heard of The Moonstone. And these vile people reply, without a shadow of proof to justify them, He has his reasons for concealment; we decline to believe him on his oath. Shameful! shameful!"

Rachel looked at him very strangely—I can't well describe how—while he was speaking. When he had done, she said:

"Considering that Mr. Luker is only a chance acquaintance of yours, you take up his cause, Godfrey, rather warmly."

My gifted friend made her one of the most truly evangelical answers I ever heard in my life.

"I hope, Rachel, I take up the cause of all oppressed people rather warmly," he said.

The tone in which those words were spoken might have melted a stone. But, oh, dear, what is the hardness of stone? Nothing compared to the hardness of the unregenerate human heart! She sneered. I blush to record it—she sneered at him to his face.

"Keep your beautiful language for your Ladies' Committees, Godfrey. I am certain that the scandal which has assailed Mr. Luker has not spared You."

Even my aunt's torpor was roused by those words.

"My dear Rachel," she remonstrated, "you have really no right to say that!"

"I mean no harm, mamma—I mean good. Have a moment's patience with me, and you will see."

She looked back at Mr. Godfrey with what appeared to be a sudden pity for him. She went the length—the very unladylike length—of taking him by the hand.

"I am certain," she said, "that I have found out the true reason of your unwillingness to speak of this matter before my mother and before me. An unlucky accident has associated you in people's minds with Mr. Luker. You have told me what scandal says of him. What does scandal say of you?"

Even at the eleventh hour, dear Mr. Godfrey —always ready to return good for evil—tried to spare her.

"Don't ask me!" he said. "It's better forgotten, Rachel—it is indeed."

"I will hear it!" she cried out, fiercely, at the top of her voice.

"Tell her, Godfrey!" entreated my aunt. "Nothing can do her such harm as your silence is doing now."

Mr. Godfrey's fine eyes filled with tears. He cast one last appealing look at her—and then he spoke the fatal words:

"If you will have it, Rachel—scandal says that the Moonstone is in pledge to Mr. Luker, and that I am the man who has redeemed it."

She started to her feet with a scream. She looked backward and forward at Mr. Godfrey to my aunt, and from my aunt to Mr. Godfrey, in such a frantic manner that I really thought she had gone mad.

"Don't speak to me! Don't touch me!" she exclaimed, shrinking back from all of us (I declare like some hunted animal) into the corner of the room. "This is my fault! I must set it right. I have sacrificed myself—I had a right to do that! But to let this man—this innocent man be ruined; to keep a secret which destroys his character for life—Oh, good God, it's too horrible! I can't bear it!"

My aunt half rose from her chair, then suddenly sat down again. She called to me hastily, and pointed to a little vial in her work-box.

"Quick!" she whispered. "Six drops, in water. Don't let Rachel see."

Under other circumstances I should have thought this strange. There was no time now to think—there was only time to give the medicine. Dear Mr. Godfrey unconsciously assisted me in concealing what I was about from Rachel by speaking composing words to her at the other end of the room.

"Indeed—indeed you exaggerate," I heard him say. "My reputation stands too high to be destroyed by a miserable passing scandal like this. It will be all forgotten in another week. Let us never speak of it again."

generosity as this. She went on from bad to worse.

"I must and will stop it," she said. "Mamma hear what I say. Miss Clack! hear what I say. I know the hand that took the Moonstone. I know"—she laid a strong emphasis on the words; she stamped her foot in the rage that possessed her—"I know that Godfrey Ablewhite is innocent! Take me to the magistrate, Godfrey! Take me to the magistrate, and I will swear it!"

My aunt caught me by the hand and whispered, "Stand between us for a minute or two. Don't let Rachel see me." I noticed a bluish tinge in her face which alarmed me. She saw I was startled. "The drops will put me right in a minute or two," she said, and so closed her eyes and waited a little.

While this was going on I heard dear Mr. Godfrey still gently remonstrating.

"You must not appear publicly in such a thing as this," he said. "Your reputation, dearest Rachel, is something too pure and too sacred to be trifled with."

"My reputation!" She burst out laughing. "Why, I am accused, Godfrey, as well as you. The best detective officer in England declares that I have stolen my own Diamond. Ask him what he thinks, and he will tell you that I have pledged the Moonstone to pay my private debts!" She stopped—ran across the room—and fell on her knees at her mother's feet. "Oh, mamma! mamma! mamma! I must be mad—mustn't I?—not to own the truth now!" She was too vehement to notice her mother's condition—she was on her feet again and back with Mr. Godfrey in an instant. "I won't let you—I won't let any innocent man—be accused and disgraced through my fault. If you won't take me before the magistrate, draw out a declaration of your innocence on paper, and I will sign it. Do as I tell you, Godfrey, or I'll write it to the newspapers—I'll go out and cry it in the streets!"

We will not say this was the language of remorse—we will say it was the language of hysterics. Indulgent Mr. Godfrey pacified her by taking a sheet of paper and drawing out the declaration. She signed it in a feverish hurry. "Show it every where—don't think of me," she said, as she gave it to him. "I am afraid, Godfrey, I have not done you justice hitherto in my thoughts. You are more unselfish—you are a better man than I believed you to be. Come here when you can, and I will try and repair the wrong I have done you."

She gave him her hand. Alas for our fallen nature! Alas for Mr. Godfrey! He not only forgot himself so far as to kiss her hand—he adopted a gentleness of tone in answering her which, in such a case, was little better than a compromise with sin. "I will come, dearest," he said, "on condition that we don't speak of this hateful subject again." Never had I seen and heard our Christian Hero to less advantage than on this occasion.

Before another word could be said by any body a thundering knock at the street-door startled us all. I looked through the window and saw the World, the Flesh, and the Devil waiting before the house—as typified in a carriage and horses, a powdered footman, and three of the most audaciously-dressed women I ever beheld in my life.

Rachel started and composed herself. She crossed the room to her mother.

"They have come to take me to the flower-show," she said. "One word, mamma, before I go. I have not distressed you, have I?"

(Is the bluntness of moral feeling which could ask such a question as that, after what had just happened, to be pitied or condemned? I like to lean toward mercy. Let us pity it.)

The drops had produced their effect. My poor aunt's complexion was like itself again. "No, no, my dear," she said. "Go with our friends and enjoy yourself."

Her daughter stooped and kissed her. I had left the window and was near the door when Rachel approached it to go out. Another change had come over her—she was in tears. I looked with interest at the momentary softening of that obdurate heart. I felt inclined to say a few earnest words. Alas! my well-meant sympathy only gave offense. "What do you mean by pitying me?" she asked, in a bitter whisper, as she passed to the door. "Don't you see how happy I am? I'm going to the flower-show, Clack; and I've got the prettiest bonnet in London." She completed the hollow mockery of that address by blowing me a kiss—and so left the room.

I wish I could describe in words the compassion that I felt for this miserable and misguided girl. But I am almost as poorly provided with words as with money. Permit me to say—my heart bled for her.

Returning to my aunt's chair I observed dear Mr. Godfrey searching for something softly here and there in different parts of the room. Before I could offer to assist him he had found what he wanted. He came back to my aunt and me, with his declaration of innocence in one hand and with a box of matches in the other.

"Dear aunt, a little conspiracy!" he said. "Dear Miss Clack, a pious fraud which even your high moral rectitude will excuse! Will you leave Rachel to suppose that I accept the generous self-sacrifice which has signed this paper? And will you kindly bear witness that I destroy it in your presence before I leave the house?" He kindled a match, and lighting the paper laid it to burn in a plate on the table. "Any trifling inconvenience that I may suffer is as nothing," he remarked, "compared with the importance of preserving that pure name from the contaminating contact of the world. There! We have reduced it to a little harmless heap of ashes, and our dear impulsive Rachel will never know what we have done! How do you feel?—my precious friends, how do you feel? For my poor part, I am as light-hearted as a boy!"

He beamed on us with his beautiful smile; he held out a hand to my aunt and a hand to me. I was too deeply affected by his noble conduct to speak. I closed my eyes; I put his hand, in a kind of spiritual self-forgetfulness, to my lips. He murmured a soft remonstrance. Oh, the ecstasy, the pure, unearthly ecstasy of that moment! I sat—I hardly know on what—quite lost in my own exalted feelings. When I opened my eyes again it was like descending from heaven to earth. There was nobody but my aunt in the room. He had gone.

I should like to stop here—I should like to close my narrative with the record of Mr. Godfrey's noble conduct. Unhappily there is more, much more, which the unrelenting pecuniary pressure of Mr. Blake's check obliges me to tell. The painful disclosures which were to reveal themselves in my presence during that Tuesday's visit to Montagu Square were not at an end yet.

Finding myself alone with Lady Verinder I turned naturally to the subject of her health, touching delicately on the strange anxiety which she had shown to conceal her indisposition, and the remedy applied to it, from the observation of her daughter.

My aunt's reply greatly surprised me.

"Drusilla," she said (if I have not already mentioned that my Christian name is Drusilla, permit me to mention it now), "you are touching—quite innocently, I know—on a very distressing subject."

I rose immediately. Delicacy left me but one alternative—the alternative, after first making my apologies, of taking my leave. Lady Verinder stopped me and insisted on my sitting down again.

"You have surprised a secret," she said, "which I had confided to my sister, Mrs. Ablewhite, and to my lawyer, Mr. Bruff, and to no one else. I can trust in their discretion; and I am sure, when I tell you the circumstances, I can trust in yours. Have you any pressing engagement, Drusilla? or is your time your own this afternoon?"

It is needless to say that my time was entirely at my aunt's disposal.

"Keep me company, then," she said, "for another hour. I have something to tell you which I believe you will be sorry to hear. And I shall have a service to ask of you afterward, if you don't object to assist me."

It is again needless to say that, so far from objecting, I was all eagerness to assist her.

"You can wait here," she went on, "till Mr. Bruff comes at five. And you can be one of the witnesses, Drusilla, when I sign my Will."

Her Will! I thought of the drops which I had seen in her work-box. I thought of the bluish tinge which I had noticed in her complexion. A light which was not of this world—a light shining prophetically from an unmade grave—dawned solemnly on my mind. My aunt's secret was a secret no longer.

A SEARCH FOR A VOCATION.

I was dusting the parlor; and I don't remember that I ever dusted the parlor without bringing the furniture to grief in some way or other; and, indeed, if I have no other gift, I do possess a faculty, a genius, for destroying whatever I touch. I don't know that it has increased with years, though it should have been so, if practice makes perfect; I might better say that it was given to me already perfected, and has remained perfect ever since.

I was so well known to possess this power that it was like signing the death-warrant of crockery to let me put my foot in the kitchen; for, figuratively, as well as literally, I always "put my foot in it."

Now that is slang; but in my opinion slang is superior to elegance, because it is terse and vigorous, and always comes straight to the point; while, if you want to be smooth, you may go round Robin Hood's barn and have your labor for your pains.

Let it stand either way: I was always multiplying adverse situations; I was always putting my foot in it;—the fact remains the same. This morning I did my duty as usual, and overturned a pot of verbenas on the carpet.

"Well, Jane," said my mother's voice, in the next room; "what now?" She spoke resignedly, having anticipated some catastrophe.

My sister Sue put her head in the door and surveyed the ruins.

"She has only tipped over my verbenas, mamma," was her ironical remark. "I'm glad it's no worse. I'll have it brushed up in a minute."

She had the dusting-pan and brush in a miraculously short time, and was removing the traces of the disaster, while I stood and watched her, helplessly.

"I didn't dare to go off to school," she said, glancing up at me mischievously. "Bridget said you had the duster, and I knew there'd be something to pay. Do you know, Jane, I always want to run for a pail of water when I see you approach the stove; and I think whether I've seventy-five cents change when you go near a window?"

"Very good of you," said I, shortly.

"It's an affectionate desire I feel to save you from yourself, my dear. I'll do the dusting. Please finish giving baby his breakfast."

Long misfortune had made me meek, and I went without a word. I think I displayed quite as much heroism in my unhesitating obedience as did the Six Hundred riding into the valley of death; for I was sure of another blunder.

The baby appeared lamb-like and sleepy. The prospect was good. I did my best; but, dear me, how easily a child gets choked! and when a child is taken up to be slapped on the shoulders for its easement, who could calculate on its wanting to attach itself to the table-cloth and refusing to "leave go?"

This baby refused to let go, and dragged the cloth persistently, notwithstanding its strangled condition, until it had accomplished the downfall of its bread and milk, and the utter destruction of two or three glasses.

My mother and Sue both rushed to the rescue, and the first exclaimed, half indignantly, half wonderingly,

"I never did see a girl like you! Why can't you be more careful?"

"It's fate," laughed Sue. "Think if Jane had a family to look to, mamma! The children wouldn't die natural deaths. She'd be before the scarlet-fever and the measles."

"Well," said I, despairingly, delivering up the baby, "I don't know how it is. I wish there were no such things as housework and taking care of children!"

And I went off up stairs very much inclined to cry. If I hadn't been nineteen years old I would have cried. As it was, I proceeded to put my chamber in order, and then sat down in the window dolefully, and began to think about myself and wonder why I wasn't like other girls. I had always been a problem to myself; and I made up my mind to solve that problem. What was I fit for? and what under the sun was I going to do in the world?

I ought to do something; there were four young Spinneys besides Sue and me, and we weren't overrich. To be sure, Sue was teaching and supporting Tommie and herself by her earnings; still four were left. My place was evidently at home. I should have put on practical shoes and helped my mother administer to the daily wants of the family; but, alas! I had no practical shoes, and I never heard of their being purchased by those upon whom Nature had not bestowed them.

As for teaching, I was sure I wasn't fitted for that; and the mere idea of the monotonous

"Two times one are two,
Two times two are four,"

made me shiver. Mathematics bored me, and dates escaped me. No; I wasn't born to be a teacher.

Of course a Spinney couldn't turn sewing-girl; and I couldn't have been a sewing-girl if I hadn't been a Spinney. Needle and thread were my tyrants, not my slaves.

Well, of course there was something; there is always something. God gives every one some talent—some specialty—at least my instructors had always told me so. Therefore, since I was a human being, I had a talent.

About art? Artistes made fabulous sums sometimes; but it required labor and natural aptitude, and it was rather late for me to begin. I doubted if I could draw a straight line at present.

I was at a loss. I considered that I was like a ship without a pilot, drifting upon the ocean of life—a traveler without a guide, lost in the desert of life. I became pathetic, and thought that existence was "An arid waste,

Unmoistened by the dews of sweet content;"

and that I was the broken-hearted Jane Spinney, of no more use to myself or the world than a broken spinning-jenny!

There! I was quite surprised at the fertility of my imagination. I certainly had imagination. Here was a comparison worthy of—worthy of any one who ever pretended to make comparisons. I remembered that I had had fancies—that I was apt to have fancies. It never had occurred to me before, but it did now; and I recollected that I had written some verses to the moon one evening, when I was in a state of inspiration.

"There must be a time when great minds recognize their own greatness." It all flashed upon me in a moment. I was a genius! Of course I couldn't perform common tasks, when uncommon ones were possible to me. Bah! a genius dusting furniture and feeding children! I must find those verses.

I found them after considerable search. They were written on scented paper, tied with sky-blue ribbon, and labeled "Lines to the Moon." I began to read them critically and appreciatively:

"O beauteous moon,
That sittest afar upon the purple sky."

I didn't know about the moon's sitting upon the sky; but I couldn't see how to remedy it, so I left her so and went on:

"Wrapped in thy silver robe of majesty,
Awaiting the night's noon."

Yes; that was good. The night's noon was striking, very.

"O beauteous moon,
That sittest with such a melancholy face,
Shrined in the yellow grandeur of thy grace,
And waitest, late and soon."

Ah, that was a nice touch, that "late and soon." Still it did seem unnecessary to have the moon sit and wait again in the second verse.

Well, I did not care about going on. It was apparent that I had the gift of verse; but this was a youthful effort. I could improve upon it.

Let's see: I had rhymed noon, soon, spoon, cocoon, croon, and tune with moon. Showed considerable versatility of expression. I had the moon watching the sea, that looked like a silver spoon. I had her weaving herself a cloud-cocoon, listening to my croon, and finally singing a tune with all the stars.

To think of it! I, Jane Spinney, a poetess! Why, I should give the name distinction, and the family would be proud of me. I was a duck among chickens, and I had found the water. I had found my vocation. I had only to go to work and astonish the world!

There was the L—— magazine. I could make a very nice début on its aristocratic pages; besides, we had it. Wouldn't it be fun to see folks reading my verses—under a nom de plume, of course?

A nom de plume. "Lina Lawton?" No; something original was better. "Blinkerton Bass?" That was rather coarse, and my initials wouldn't attract notice. After all, nothing could be better than that wonderful fancy of mine about the "Spinning Jenny." Capital. "Twenty Years Ago, by Spinning Jenny."

I was looking for my inkstand in order to commence at once, when my mother opened the door.

"Oh, Jane, haven't you your dress changed? Your aunt and the children are down stairs. Can't you go and amuse them?"

Here was injustice! Ask a poetess to amuse children! It was all of a piece. The world would never appreciate me if I didn't find time to make it.

I will not describe the fiery trials through which I passed before I had a chance to commence the poem which was to make me immortal. All that day I was a martyr—the slave of Alvina Matilda Jenks, Lucretia Ann Jenks, and Conrad Wallace Jenks. When I passed the hall-clock in the evening it seemed to tick mournfully and monotonously, "Di-em—per-di-di Di-em—per-di-di." The next morning, before Sue had her eyes fairly open, I was dressed and sitting at the window in a meditative and inspired state. I was quoting some "lines" which every one quotes who quotes at all—the usual fandango about the "rosy morning," when Sue rather brought me out of my glorified condition by audibly expressing the opinion that I was either crazy or fast becoming so.

"Is there going to be a hurricane?" inquired the young lady; "or are we going to have sausages for breakfast? Those are the only two things likely to start you before seven."

Quite innocently, I astonished the family at the breakfast-table. I was in the habit of wearing articles which the vain denominate "rats;" these were attached to a net for my greater convenience. This morning, in my lofty abstraction, I put on the net wrong side out, forgetful of the appendages, and passing around to take my seat at table thus equipped, brought my three younger brothers near strangulation, and caused my father to desire severely that I would go up stairs and finish dressing.

I was evidently in that furnace of affliction through which all great minds pass. I felt that I had no sympathy with the beings around me. As soon as possible I withdrew to my chamber, and sat down by the window, from which I had a cheerful view of grocery carts and coal wagons.

Well, now I was to commence. I had the name, "Spinning Jenny," and that was all I had. A blank sheet of paper doesn't suggest any thing. I wanted, now, a title—a post, whereupon to hinge my ideas. Say, "Lines to a Dead Child." I didn't want lines to any thing. Say, "A Leap-Year Carol." Comic poetry wasn't my forte. Say, "A Farewell." No; too sentime[illegible] What under the sun should I write?

I concluded to take a subject, something of the vast and solemn order, and dash right into it: "Life."

Life. Life was of course a vale of tears. Years rhymed with tears, so it was a length of years.

"Life is a weary vale of tears,
A dreary, dusky length of years,
Where not a ray of light appears."

Then I got life out again gradually. Mark, Dark, Spark.

"But pilgrims o'er its paths may mark
How lights of Faith transform the dark,
And Hope illumes it with her spark."

I was puzzling over the next verse when the dinner-bell rung, and I had to take measures to sustain life; but in the course of the afternoon I got through four verses more of the same stamp, and arrived at my grand finis:

"Forests of crosses block the way;
All round the lowering sky is gray
And dim and dark, look where we may.
But still, as farther we advance,
And unknown beauties meet our glance,
Trusting, we deem that good may chance."

I was exhausted. I was unused to severe mental labor; still the supreme satisfaction which the reperusal of these lines gave me repaid me for all; and when I had it in an envelope, ready to dispatch, I felt that I had laid the foundation for greatness.

The glory of having written that poem lasted me a week. I considered that I could now sit down and wait for events.

A fortnight went by. I began to be doubtful. Three weeks; and I found little encouragement in the remembrance that the "American people are slow to appreciate genius; and Mr. Bryant, their first poet, is obliged to edit a newspaper for support." wasn't Mr. Bryant.

One evenin Sue came dashing in from school and tossed a letter on my lap, saying, merrily:

"Are you an aspiring young woman, Janet? That looks suspicious."

I had been sitting idly in the window, in the most romantic and melancholy style possible. Sue ruined my attitude; for, without waiting to answer, I raced out of the room undignifiedly and broke open the envelope with trembling fingers.

Alas! I drew out my own lines; then a printed "form" of refusal:

"We hereby return to Miss Spinney the poem 'Life,' and regret that it will not suit our columns."

Not suit their columns? What were their columns, that it didn't suit? What mental blindness was this, that let such a poem go unwelcomed!

This was a downfall, and an interval of blankness followed. I began to appreciate my own description of life, considering that it was truly a vale of tears.

I was tempted to despair; but that immortal sentence which has long comforted struggling humanity came to my aid: "Rome was not built in a day;" therefore Jane Spinney couldn't electrify the world in a day. I wasn't grandiloquent as I had been before, but I determined grimly that a master-piece should appear which should be the work of Jane Spinney.

I took time for it; I mean I was going to take time for it; but my time was taken away from me. Louisa Grant, a friend of Sue's, came to visit us, and I was forced to remain in common-places.

The one advantage of my situation was that I had my chamber to myself. Sue and Louisa occupied another apartment; so I could write after eleven o'clock at night, if I could possibly keep up enthusiasm so long.

I thought I would come down to the level of other people's minds. "Life" had been a great deal too deep. I would write a ballad—a ballad that should be entitled "The Lady's Despair."

I will not inflict the particulars upon the reader. Suffice it to say I went to work and burned midnight oil for six consecutive nights, thus attracting numberless comments from the family.

I must say that it was hard work. The necessity of rhyming interfered with conclusions dreadfully. Nothing but my faith in the result carried me through; but on the sixth night I did get through.

The family had grown tired of euchre that evening, for a wonder, and had inclined toward slumber generally at ten o'clock. I had bade Sue and Louisa good-night in the passage, and had sought my own apartment, invigorated by the thought that I had only one verse more to write; however, that verse occupied me till after eleven.

By the time I had looked over the whole thirteen verses it was half past eleven. I didn't hear the girls' voices any longer; I supposed they had gone to sleep. I was solitary—alone with my grand thoughts. I thought, myself, it would be very nice to "sit, on winter nights, by a solitary fire, and hear the nations praising me, far off." I didn't doubt I should have that experience.

I thought I would read the poem over; read it aloud, to get a better idea of it. I tilted myself back in my chair comfortably and began:

"THE LADY'S DESPAIR.

"A lady with a weary face
Sat at a turret window high,
And watched the sky."

Good; gave you the idea of patience.

"A lady fair, with lofty grace,
She sat and wept full drearily,
And none were nigh."

I thought I heard a sound. I listened; but it was not repeated. I had been mistaken.

"A knight went riding far below,
Looked up and waved a sad farewell,
Careless of what befell."

There was a queer noise again; perhaps rats in the wall.

"He rode upon a steed of snow,
And in that fair and pleasant dell
Had loved the lady well."

Certainly no sympathetic person could read this without tears.

"Three strokes rang from the tower bell;
She forward leaned, and looked to see
Him passing slow and silently.
Both were so sad 'twas hard to tell
Which was the saddest of them, he Or—"

A perfect scream of laughter rang in my astonished ears. It proceeded from the hall. I darted to the door with the rapidity of lightning, and flung it open wrathfully.

There was Sue doubled up on the hall floor, in convulsions of laughter, and Louisa holding by the stair railing, with the tears running down her cheeks.

"Or she," gasped Sue, going off again as she caught a glimpse of my indignant countenance. "Oh, Jane, Jane, you'll kill me!"

I was near wishing I could; but my utter stupefaction prevented the expression of the wish, and it seemed quite impossible for either Sue or Louisa to stop laughing long enough to say another word.

"I really think, Jane," gasped Sue again, making a great effort to speak, "that this will suit our columns. Don't you, Louisa?"

"Its pathos!" Louisa managed to articulate.

"And its beautiful flow. Have her die, Jane, do. Have her leap down into the dell; it's fair and pleasant."

"But get the knight out of the way first," suggested Louisa, wiping her eyes. "The fall might crush him."

And they both relapsed again.

"If you think this is honorable," I began, regaining my voice finally, "I must say I differ with you."

"We aren't exalted," said Sue, "not at all. We're in a state of abasement, Louisa and I. But a cat may look at a king, you know, or we may listen to a poetess."

I shut the door in their faces angrily, and locked it. Sue shouted her "regrets that she didn't hear the whole of it" through the key-hole; but, as I made no answer, they both departed and went to rest.

I flung the poem into the fire; and then all my dignity didn't save me from crying. That most woeful of troubles had come upon me, viz.: my faith in myself had been shaken. I was afraid the ship hadn't any pilot, the traveler hadn't any guide, and I hadn't any vocation.

Not a moment did I sleep that night; and in the morning my eyes were so red I would not go down, but locked myself in my chamber, reflecting pleasantly that Sue was probably amusing the breakfasters with an account of the "Lady's Despair." I was very unhappy, and had an idea of making a hermitess of myself in future.

By-and-by there came a tap at the door, and my mother's voice, asking to come in.

"Jane," she said, "I have brought you your breakfast, and some advice. What a faculty you have for making yourself miserable!"

"I make myself miserable!"

"I know it was unpardonable in Sue to annoy you so; but you should be above such things."

"Above such things!"

"What ever put it into your head," continued my mother, "to think you could write verses?"

"You think a girl should do nothing but wash dishes and iron shirts!" said I, indignantly. "I feel myself fit for something higher."

"I don't want to hurt your feelings, Jane, but—"

"And I want some work especially mine."

"Did you always feel fitted for something higher?"

I was obliged to confess that the attack had come on suddenly.

"But I want an object to work for."

"Then," said my mother, "make binding shoes the object, rather than writing verses; for you are sure you could do the first well. Cultivate any talent you have, Jane, only be sure you have it."

"Binding shoes can't be a vocation for me."

"A vocation? Why do you want a vocation? Why should you have a vocation more than the girls around you? Duty is a vocation, Jane."

"I can't do common things."

"Then pray don't consider that a proof that you can do uncommon ones. I think, if I were you, I would make common-sense a specialty."

And so I lost the only glimpse of a vocation I ever was favored with; for I hadn't the obstinacy to persist in the face of every thing. I abandoned my stand-point with as good grace as I could, lost the hope of distinction, and fell back into stocking-darning and obscurity, where I have remained ever since. Long study has made me mistress of the a-b-c of life, and I am at present a peaceful old maid, whose chief use is to look after Sue's children, and whose principal occupation is gossiping and tea-drinking.

THE CHEMISTRY OF A TEAR.

THE principal element, the prime ingredient, so to say, of a tear is water; this water, upon dissolution, contains a few hundredth parts of the substance called mucus, and a small portion of salt, of soda, of phosphate of lime, and of phosphate of soda. It is the salt and the soda that give to tears that peculiar savor which earned for tears the epithet of "salt" at the hand of Greek poets, and that of "bitter" at that of ours: "salt" is, however, the more correct term of the two. When a tear dries the water evaporates and leaves behind it a deposit of the saline ingredients; these amalgamate, and, as seen through the microscope, array themselves in long crossed lines, which look like diminutive fish-bones.

Tears are secreted by a gland called the "lachrymal gland," which is situated above the eye-ball, and underneath the upper eyelid on the side nearest the temple. Six or seven exceedingly fine channels flow from it along and under the surface of the eyelid, discharging their contents a little above the delicate cartilage which supports the lid. It is these channels or canals that carry the tears into the eye. But tears do not flow only at certain moments and under certain circumstances, as might be supposed; their flow is continuous; all day and all night (although less abundantly during sleep) they trickle softly from their slender sluices, and spread glistening over the surface of the pupil and eyeball, giving them that bright, enamel, and limpid look which is one of the characteristic signs of health. It is the ceaseless movement and contraction of the eyelids that effect the regular spreading of the tears; and the flow of these has need to be constantly renewed in the way just mentioned, because tears not only evaporate after a few seconds, but also are carried away through two little drains, called "lachrymal points," and situated in the corner of the eye near the nose. Thus, all tears, after leaving the eyelids, flow into the nostrils, and if the reader will assure himself of this, he has only to notice, unpoetical as the fact may be, that a person after crying much is always obliged to make a twofold use of his or her pocket-handkerchief.

The utility of tears to animals in general, and in particular to those who are exposed much to the dust, such as birds who live amidst the winds, is easy to understand; for the eye would soon be dirtied and blocked up, like an uncleaned window-pane, had not nature provided this friendly ever-flowing stream to wash and refresh it. A very little fluid is necessary to keep the eye always clear and clean; but here again we must admire the wonderful mechanism which works the human body, for it is to be observed that when, through some accident or hurt, the eyeball has need of more water than usual to cleanse it, nature at once turns on a more abundant supply of tears. Thus, for instance, when a grain of dust, or an insect creeps into the eye, the eyelids at once fill and run over with tears, and these not only alleviate the pain, but also, when the object is small enough, carry it away down the two small conduits already noticed. The same thing occurs when either smoke, too vivid light, or too intense cold obscures the sight—tears at once come to our relief, and protect the eye from harm.

With regard to other than physical tears the explanation to be given of them is a very material one. Tears are caused both by the sudden and rapid flow of blood to the head and by excessive nervous excitement. They are most frequent with women and children, whose nervous organization is less strong than that of men. Among men, it is those of sanguine or nervous temperaments who weep most often. Lymphatic natures, on the contrary, and people of bilious temperament, rarely weep at all; the former because they have commonly but little sensibility, and the latter because they have usually a firm control over their feelings. When, therefore, a man of lymphatico-bilious temperament is seen to shed tears under emotion, one may feel sure that the innermost nerves of his heart have been wrung, and one must bow one's head in respect before a man whose pangs must be intense. Conversely, it is prudent to keep one's coolness before strongly excitable or highly imaginative people who weep; their tears are often genuine, but, as a rule, they cost them but little effort, and in nine cases out of ten are forgotten as soon as shed. Actors of great talent call up tears at will by working themselves into a wild state of excitement. Mademoiselle Rachel, for instance, than whom no colder, more unloving woman ever trod the stage, used, when she put forth all her efforts, to weep so passionately that she would set fifteen hundred spectators crying with her.

OLD AGE.

WITH lessening strain and fainter breath—
Life slowly easing into death—
When on tired eyes and heavy head
The weight of sleep begins to fall
Before the couch is spread,
Full ready to lie down, and glad
When comes the messenger we call
Azrael—is it sad?

No more the rugged ways of youth;
The feet grow tired, the way grows smooth,
The valley lieth green below;
The heart is grown in love with peace,
The sharpness gone from woe;
Time with the old deals tenderly,
Making the joy of living cease,
That death-pain may not be.

What is it that we name delight?
Youth, with tortures exquisite
Called joys?—a double-edged sword—
A sword whose blunter side is grief?
Youth, heart-moved by a word?
Its broken sunshine ripple-swayed;
Of loveliest things—of cloud and leaf—
Its flitting shadows made?

Youth, with dreams that ne'er came true,
Its great impossibles to do,
Its little possibles undone,
Its blossoms falling fruitlessly;
Its faithless April sun?
Ah, overfull and restless heart!
Time soothes: ere quietness can be
Must losses do their part?

That sap should fail, and leaves should drop,
And half the living pulses stop
Ere the tree fall, is sad, you say?
Nay now, one learns to be content
With slower living; day
So sweetly, softly going down,
That none can say "The light is spent"
Till night puts on her crown.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THERE is always more or less complaint among our citizens in regard to deficiency of Croton water at certain times, and in certain sections of the city. While there are some isolated points, where, by reason of the high ground, the upper stories of a building are above the reach of water from the reservoir, yet in general, the insufficient supply is due to a waste of water in private houses. At least, this is officially stated as a serious fact, worthy of individual and public consideration. It would certainly seem that upward of 62,000,000 gallons was an ample daily supply for our city. But out of this abundance it is asserted that wasteful habits have grown, and that in private houses, where no control is exercised, "waste is measured only by the capacity of the faucet, which runs day and night." We enjoy no greater luxury than our liberal supply of good water. It is reasonable that every housekeeper should take a special interest in a matter so important to the good of the whole community. Let there be no needless waste in our dwellings; let it not be made necessary to put—as has been suggested—a water-meter upon every house.

At a recent meeting held in Boston to discuss the advantages and methods of propagating fish in the New England States, Professor Agassiz made an interesting address upon the subject. He predicted that the time would come when every man who has water on his ground will raise fish for his own table as he now raises fruit. The increase in the production of fish he considered important in a sanitary point of view, as an article of diet, and he remarked that "fish, to a large extent, contain phosphorus, a chemical element which the brain requires for health and strength. There is no other article of food which supplies the waste of the brain so thoroughly as fish, and the evidence of this is in the fact that the inhabitants of sea-shores, the world over, are the brightest population of the whole country." However much the dwellers in interior sections may dissent from this general view, all will agree that "variety is the spice of life," and that the more good things there are in our country the better.

A Bostonian—or some one who gives evidence of living in the vicinity of the "Hub"—claims the authorship of a popular poem about which there has been much discussion, and to prove his right gives to the public the following hitherto unpublished stanza:

Mother, dear mother, oh! give me some squills,
I have grown weary of duns and of bills;
Weary of working ten hours a day,
Weary of working for very small pay,
Weary of trying to see my way clear,
Tired of cocktails and tired of beer,
Tired of dining with Parker and Mills,
Give me some squills, mother, give me some squills.

This will probably finish the controversy.

Something less than half a century ago a belief was entertained in certain sections of England that the union between man and wife might be sundered in almost any manner; and when a couple became tired of living together, a barbarous custom prevailed of selling the wife at auction. So occasionally, on some crowded market-day, a brutish-looking man might be seen holding in his hand one end of a rope halter, the other end being around the neck of his better half. A gaping crowd would follow, and the fellow, after stating the case—the woman consenting—would proceed to offer her to the highest bidder. Women did not usually bring much under such circumstances; yet, if report is true, within a few weeks a miserable creature in Buffalo has publicly offered his wife as a prize to be raffled for. Printed tickets were issued, headed, "Raffle for the wife of Thomas Doyle," the time and place being given. As an additional inducement to those desirous of securing the lady, it was stated also: "This woman is a good housekeeper, and is willing to stay with any one who may draw her. Tickets, 25 cents." In this instance the "fair prize" is said to have consented to the arrangement. Whether the city authorities have consented has not yet transpired.

Amusing scene at a railroad dépôt. Old gentleman buys a ticket; puts his wallet between his teeth, and counts his change; turns around with a startled look, searches carefully every where, stops to make nervous investigations of his pockets, shakes his head, and resumes his search; comes finally to the ticket-window again, and says, "Have you seen?" and the wallet falls from his lips to the counter. "There 'tis now! Had it in my mouth all the time." Old gentleman smiles—crowd laugh—the curtain falls.

It does not take much to make a sensation among grown-up folks. The eccentric gentleman who, walking down Broadway one day, suddenly stopped and stared fixedly up into the sky, gathered a wondering crowd about him in a very short time, which he more quickly scattered by coolly replying, to the eager question, "What do you see?" "Nothing." A while ago a vendor of the bright red air-balloons, in which children so delight, suddenly lost his hold upon the string which confined his treasures to the earth, and the whole bevy of balloons floated heavenward. But while the unfortunate salesman gazed in dismay upon his vanishing collection, the great crowd in Broadway stopped in amazement at the curious sight of twenty bright bubbles sailing in the sky. If one wants to create a similar sensation among little folks, it is easily done by carrying one red balloon through a street where there are plenty of children—and if a public-school has just been dismissed so much the better. A gentleman, carrying home this conspicuous toy the other day, really ran quite a gauntlet, something as follows:

THREE SMALL BOYS (running from the other side of the street). "Hi, hi, hi! see that bully balloon!"

RAGGED GIRL (ironically). "Mister, give me that 'are soap-bubble."

LITTLE DUTCH BABY (tottling to his mother's door). "Marm, come an' see this!"

MIDDLING-SIZED BOY (hitting at it with a stick). "Bu'st it! Bu'st it!"

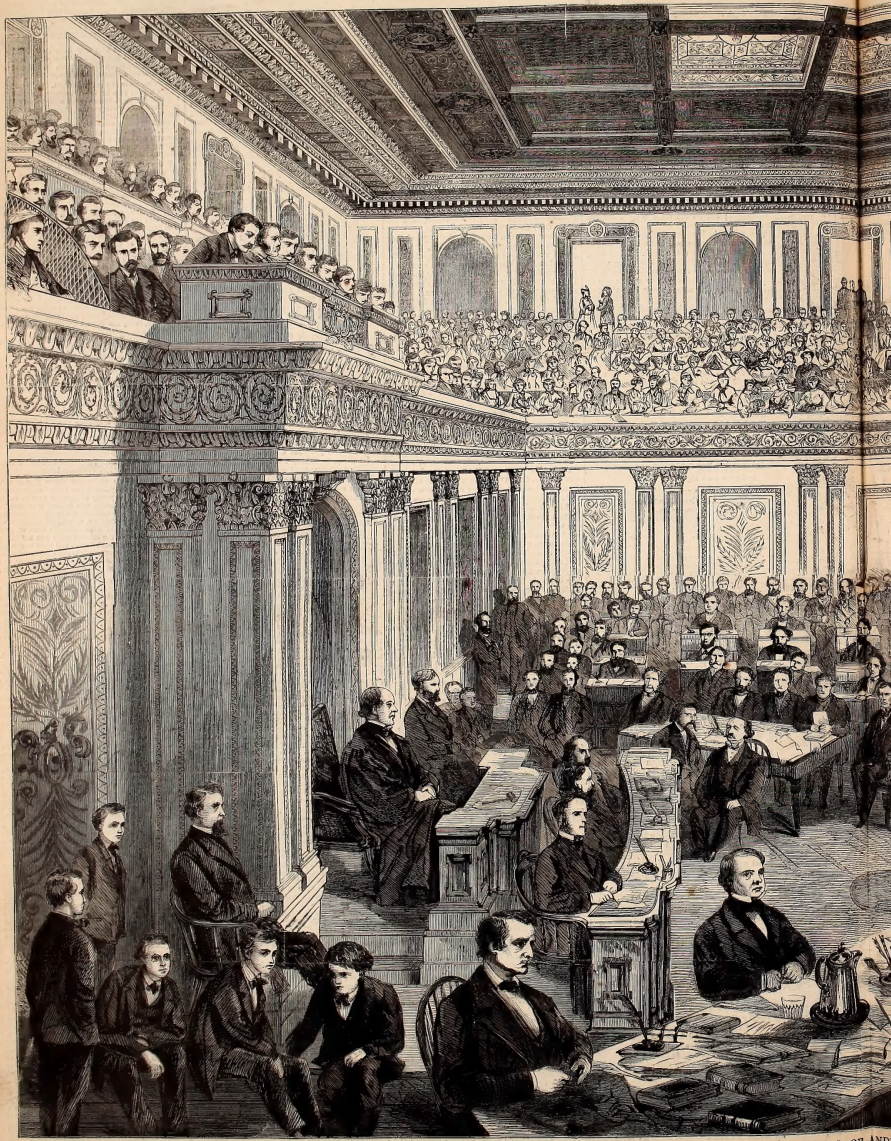
LITTLE GIRL. "See there—he's got that for his little girl!"

And so on, with "Ohs!" and "Ahs!" innumerable, so that the owner of the balloon reached his own door, at length, amidst a shower of expletives.

A school-teacher in Kansas, not being able—probably—to find words to express his gratitude to the clergyman who married him, presented him with a Webster's unabridged. Not a bad idea!

An irresponsible newspaper states that certain young ladies in the "Maine Law States" still continue to kiss the lips of young temperance men to see if they have been tampering with liquor. It requests its readers to imagine a beautiful young girl approaching the young temperance man, with all the dignity of an executive officer, and the innocence of a dove, with the charge: "Mr. ——, the ladies believe you are in the habit of tampering with liquor, and have appointed me to examine you according to our established rules—are you willing?" An acquiescent nod is given, and she gently steps up close to the supposed culprit, etc., etc., etc.

What a life they must lead in Cincinnati, when a resident is compelled to express his feelings thus: "Talk about filters! Just eat a quart of Ohio River-water and stand in the sun for five minutes, and you will find the aforesaid coming out at every pore, beautifully filtered, while your stomach becomes converted into a sand-bag, and you can hear the gravel rattle as you walk."



It is not necessary to go to Chicago to get divorced. A boy and girl in Rhode Island who were married the other day, were, at the demand of the offended parents, separated by tearing up the marriage certificate in their presence by the minister who tied the knot.

A story, after the style of the Arabian Nights, comes from Iowa, and it is said that there are the most perfect proofs to sustain it; the proofs, however, are not forthcoming. But here is the story: A certain "Mr. Brown has a four-year-old colt, which he has heretofore prized very highly." (We should suppose he would prize it more highly now.) "In color he is naturally a bright bay. Mr. Brown says that he went to his stable two weeks ago Sunday morning, and there stood a pure white horse." (Why not? Who says Mr. B. has not a stable full of horses?) "He was much astonished when, on examination, he found that the horse was undoubtedly his own colt." (Undoubtedly, it was "just so.") "Mr. Brown proceeded to the house to inform his wife and children, when they all returned to the stable, and there stood a coal-black horse, to the astonishment of the family." (Sudden, very.) "Since that time the colt has changed from black to bay, white, and sorrel." And here endeth the story. Any body can see that the colt is unsettled on the subject of reconstruction.

"Boiled clocks" gives the impression of a very novel and somewhat unpalatable dish, although we see it recommended in the Scientific American. A writer in that journal says that common brass clocks may be cleaned by immersing the works in boiling water. Rough as this treatment may appear, it works well, whenever they stop from an accumulation of dust or thickening of oil upon the pivots. They should be boiled in pure rain-water, and dried on a warm stove or near the fire. The writer speaks of an eight-day clock which was boiled a year ago, and has behaved perfectly well ever since.

A story is told of a favorite janitor in a neighboring city who was accustomed to have certain matters in charge at various public entertainments. A short time since during a lecture a lady fainted. He was always ready for an emergency of this kind, and had all the necessary restoratives close at hand for use. She was borne into an ante-room, and our friend rushed for his bottle of camphor, and proceeded to rub her face and forehead, applying it to her nose for her to smell of. After a while she revived, and he then became conscious that there was something wrong about the camphor. He smelt of it, and found that all of its virtue had evaporated; he applied his tongue to it, and found, to his dismay, that he had been bathing his patient liberally with mucilage! She was so stuck up by the attention that she had to be sent home in a carriage.

According to report a law has been adopted in the Constitution of Florida which is intended to insure a better class of citizens to the State. It provides that no persons born after the year 1880 shall marry unless they know how to "read, write, and cipher." How far must they "cipher?" To Fractions, or through Cube Root?

THE SENATE AS A COURT OF IMPEACHMENT FOR THE TRIAL OF AND

TWO APRILS.

WHITE as snow were the dog-wood blooms,
The heavens were sweetly blue;
And the air was laden with faint perfumes
From the myriad flowers that grew.

The south wind stirred in the meadow-grass,
And ruffled the lark's brown wing;
And the creamy buds of the sassafras
Awoke with the breath of Spring.

The linnet broke with his joyous lay
The winter's lengthened hush;
The wide woods rang with the voice of the jay
And the song of the speckled thrush.

Fair and bright was that April day
As I lay in the scented grass,
Waiting for one who would come that way,
For one whom I knew would pass.

Near me there, with a musical flow,
The rivulet wandered down
Over pale pebbles that shone below
Yellow and red and brown.

All over the banks the azure eyes
Of the violets glistened blue;
And thick as stars in the jeweled skies
The purple pansies grew.

On through the meadow and over the hill,
By the path that led that way,
On through the meadow and down by the mill,
On that balmy April day,

Came she for whose coming I waited there,
In the fragrant meadow-grass—
Low and varied that morning where
I knew she so soon would pass.

Sweet as a bird's, as she wound along,
Were the bright little maiden's tones,
As, gayly singing a lithesome song,
She crossed on the stepping-stones.

Twin little feet, how dainty their trend
Bright eyes gleaming down!
Dark green gown, and shawl of red,
Tresses of gold and brown.

Years have gathered the seeds they cast,
And fled like a round of dreams;
Yet that April day far back in the past,
How wondrously near it seems!

Again, as of old, now the south wind blows,
In the self-same spot I lie.
Where the pansies bloom, and the violet grows,
And the rivulet wanders by.

Oh, bright, fresh flowers, do you bloom less fair?
Oh, wind, is your breath more chill?
For the sweet young eyes, and the brown gold hair,
And the lips that are hushed and still?

THE SQUIRE'S TEMPER-TRAP.

IN SEVEN CHAPTERS.

CHAPTER IV.

"YOU wished to see me, Sir," said Mr. Rochford Hurbandine, sauntering into his father's study, and flipping off the lighted end of his cheroot as soon as he was within the door.

"I beg, Sir, you will not deny yourself a moment's sensual gratification on my account," said the squire, politely. "Permit me to offer you a light."

"Thanks. I've done for the present," replied Mr. Rochford. "Castleton and I are going for a trot in the village, and, not to be vulgar, go in for the universal cla-ay."

"If Mr. Castleton and yourself would infuse a little variety into your afternoon excursions," said the squire, with the same suavity as before, "it would, I think, afford increased gratification to all parties concerned. With beautiful rides in all directions—"

"We prefer the life of the village," said Mr. Rochford, calmly.

"The low, Sir, are sirely beneath the notice of gentlemen of such lofty fashion," remarked Mr. Hurbandine, with some asperity.

"The proper study of mankind is man,'" said his son.

"And, therefore," not exclusively woman, Sir," retorted the squire. "If your visits had reference to our general improvement—the advancement of cottage architecture, the progress of my village drainage—I should have nothing but thanks to offer. As it is, I fear that the introduction of the Mayfair element into Llowyddcwed will resemble the chemical combination which results in a report and a conflagration.

"The young ladies to whose birth, parentage, and general training you are so philanthropically interested seemed gratified with our respectful homage."

"I have no doubt of it," returned his father. "They don't see such a brace of finished puppies every day. Did it strike you, however, that their tolerance of your 'homage,' as you call it, might have been partly owing to their respect for me?"

"It assuredly did not, Sir," said Mr. Rochford, frankly.

"You now comprehend my wishes, Sir," said the squire, growing angry. "Your proceedings elsewhere I can not control. Here, at least, I will be master."

Mr. Rochford coughed,

"What do you mean, Sir?" asked his father, sternly.

Mr. Rochford opened his great blue languid eyes to their utmost extent, and looked at his father for a moment, as if striving to comprehend him past any mistake. Then he burst into a low self-bred laugh. "I mean, my dear father, that we could not, in any case, espouse the entire village: nor have I, believe me, the slightest intention of presenting another Sukey Bubbs for your paternal benediction."

"No, Sir, I suspect you of no such sensible purpose," replied the squire, his face darkening. "But may I ask how the Lady Susan Varasour has merited this public tribute to her memory?"

"Simply by being born Bubbs," said Mr. Rochford. "A family misfortune, Sir—no more."

"You forget, perhaps, that your great-grandfather was a small farmer?" said Mr. Hurbandine.

"One of them was," replied his son. "His maternal colleague was a peer. Spend the plow, Sir, as much as you please, but don't run it over my mother's ancestors."

The incautious words had barely left his lips when the squire, his eyes blazing with rage, sprang from his chair and confronted him so closely that for an instant the young man apprehended violence.

"Insult me to my face, you puppy! you cold-blooded effigy of a man!" he cried, fiercely, with not so much red blood in their whole line as would paint an ace of hearts!" thundered the angry squire. "Leave the room, Sir! Begone! And mark this," he added, sinking his voice to a lower but not less furious tone; "see that I do not give you a second Sukey Bubbs for your mother?"

"What say you to a stretch across the hills, Tom?" said young Hurbandine to Mr. Castleton, who was playing at croquet by himself on the lawn.

"In a balloon?" inquired his friend, shading his eyes, and pretending to survey the heights in question with great care.

"They have been pronounced accessible," said Rochford. "At least, my aunt, Lady Clumberough, sealed one of the little peaks last year in her Bath chair, attended only by her fat lap-dog and one devoted page, and actually returned to dinner! But she was a remarkably plucky person at eighty; and if you really think—"

"Say no more. I share the peril and the glory," said Mr. Castleton, flinging away his mallet.

"Well, if you have any thing to do in the village—"

"But I haven't. On my word, now, I haven't," said the Honorable Tom, with a yawn. "To-day I'm in a mountain mood. Away!"

That Mr. Castleton's mood inclined to the mountain rather than the village hung might have been partly due to the fact that he had in his pocket at that moment a letter, conveying in distinct, and to say emphatic, terms an invitation to a festic encounter with a gentleman named Cornelius Podgerbot, whose feelings had been enraged by his—the Honorable Tom's—free and easy reference to one "Ally Davis of the mill." For, though far from being deficient in courage, Mr. Castleton's mind revolved at the idea of actual personal conflict, and the prospect of a possible defeat at the hands of the burly clown was intolerable.

Lighting their pipes at the lodge, and sending back word from thence that they might not return to dinner, the two gentlemen accordingly set forth.

It was late when they returned, for the ascent had proved practicable, and they had even a very comfortable inn—the Welsh Harp—at the top, at which the enterprising travelers obtained a dinner that would not have discredited Francatelli, accompanied by an appetite that not even the ordinary provender, at the usual daylight, however, when, on nearing the lodge, they found Rochford Hurbandine striding hastily along.

"Anxious about us, eh?" said Mr. Castleton, with feeling. "Really, my dear Hurbandine, this is too—too much." (He wiped his eyes with the cuff of his coat.) "Touching anecdote of an elder brother!"

Gerald laughed, but seemed disposed to continue his way.

"I shall be back in half an hour," said he. His brother took him aside.

"Is all right? Where's the governor?"

"About the grounds, I think," said Gerald. "Sweet?"

"As sugar. Again my?"

"He does not suspect you. Gerald, I know we've seen you going. Take my advice," said the young man, carelessly—"don't."

"I must and will," replied Gerald, his forehead flushing. "I am not a boy to be bullied at the farm. I have not had such a chance these six months."

Rude to whisper in company," said Mr. Castleton. "I think I shall leave you. I also think I felt a drop on my nose."

"It does rain," said Rochford. "Come, Gerald. Well, if you will," he added, as the other walked away, "I can't help it. I don't like the sky. And he flung him that garment (of a light fawn-color) which he was carrying on his arm.

"Thanks, old fellow." And Gerald, throwing it over his shoulders, hastened away.

CHAPTER V.

IT was a fact, howsoever Gerald arrived at the knowledge of it, that "my lady" Katy was alone that evening at the little farm-house, the usual week-day garrison, an old woman and two stout boys, having gone to a neighboring fair. But they would, of course, return before night, when Katy would, in all probability, trip across the fields to the town mansion in Llowyddcwed.

As young Hurbandine hurried along he debated whether he would abide this chance or boldly attack the cottage. In the former case Katy might not be alone; in the latter she certainly would be; and that last reflection had resolved upon demanded both time and secrecy. A side door, standing ajar, decided him; but, though conscious of an ally within, a whisper in Katy's heart that stood his friend, a tremor unusual with him—arising, perhaps, from the consciousness of taking an unfair advantage—checked him, as he raised his hand to knock. After a moment's irresolution he pushed the door a little wider open. Katy was before him.

Her back was toward the door, and, intent on her occupation, she was as yet unconscious of any beholder. The queen of beauty of Llewyddcwed was not attired in satin and gold. She was neither working tapestry nor playing the lute. Her dress was of the most petticoat of some gray stuff, disclosing, as the wearer bent over her work, a beauty and amount of limb rarely vouchsafed to the mortal gaze; for Katy's heart was not purer than her taste, and, fair as she seemed, her ordinary attire rather disguised than augmented her loveliness. She had thrown off, for the moment's exigence, her upper dress, and pearly shoulders and rounded arms were having it all their own way, in a manner so entrancing that it was no wonder Gerald stood rooted to the ground like the bold hunter who surprised Diana.

The bewitching creature was doing something with a tub, but whether with milk or meal—inasmuch as her arms emerged from the white contents hardly more than below—it would have been impossible to say.

"Katy!"

The girl sprang round as if a shot had struck her. The next instant the color rushed into her face. She snatched her scarlet cloak from a clothes-horse that was near, and wrapping it hastily round her neck and bosom, confronted her visitor with an air that had in it certainly more of anger than of love.

"It seems you knew that I was left alone?" she said, in a voice of unmistakable resentment. Gerald gazed at her in surprise.

"That is part of my excuse. For the rest time is precious. I have that to say—"

"You will have to be brief without another word," said Katy. "Then, I am not sure that I should be justified in listening to your excuses —even from the upper window."

"Consider my excuses made," said the young man; "and, for pity's sake, hear—"

"Not without my ground," returned the imperious young lady, as, with an air a duchess might have envied, she moved toward the door.

Policy, as well as good taste, suggested obedience, and Gerald, retreating, closed the door and walked slowly to the centre of the cottage into the little garden. As if to reward this docility, Katy presently opened the lower window—almost within reach of his arm. The brief interval had sufficed her nimble fingers to arrange her dress in its usual form, and when Katy appeared in the window she at least was calm and rather pale.

There was, moreover, a look of resolution in the lucid blue eyes she bent upon her lover which he did not at first understand.

"My lady," however, partook her father's taste for coming to the point; and, taking advantage of Gerald's momentary perplexity, did so now.

"You did wrong in coming hither, Mr. Hurbandine," she began.

"My name is Gerald, Katy," put in Gerald, softly.

"And mine Taffey," said Katy. "It is no matter; you will remember it, I said, in question—but, strange to say, I wished to see you, and—"

"Strange!"

"Your impudence and selfishness have done me harm—much harm and wrong," continued the girl, her tears rising. "I have warned—remonstrated—implored in vain. Now, I have to tell you, you will never—"

"Stop. Will you not listen?" pleaded Gerald.

"Certainly, if you will," said Katy, with a sad little smile. "My speech first—it may shorten the discussion. My mother has spoken to me, and does not, I think, quite believe that you have done all in my power to check this—what shall I call it?—this habit, this fancy of yours for singing and dancing among the other village girls, for the high favor of your notice."

"Not so, Katy. I have ever been most guarded—"

"In the presence of your father. Yes," said Katy. "To do you justice, nothing, on those occasions, could be more—more becoming. That is—than your demeanor. Your brother is more daring. He smiles!"

"I do so for my sake—and yours," added Gerald, hastily.

"To distract papa's attention from the real naughty boy," said Katy, with a curl of the lip, which, nevertheless, quivered in the act. "It is very kind of Mr. Rochford. Indeed, you are all very kind—very thoughtful—for yourselves. On my account, at least, Mr. Hurbandine, you will have no more trouble. Let this little amusement end. It has served its turn, and London must be pining for your reappearance. Henceforth I am Mr. Hurbandine's daughter; you the squire's son. And if I am entitled to the wages for my part in the pretty little play, let it be due—not as if I threw herself up with an unconscious dignity—"that neither yourself nor your brother presume to address me again. Do not, Mr. Hurbandine, allow me the wrong of believing this coquetry or caprice. These arts are for high-bred ladies in London. Here we show what we feel—and have what we say. Our acquaintance is ended. Now— Who is that?" she added, with a look of unmistakable alarm.

"What? Where? Where?" exclaimed Gerald.

"I thought some one stood in the shrubbery-path, and moved away when I cried out!" said Katy: "I—I am not quite myself. Perhaps it was my fancy," she added. "Now, go."

"Now for my speech," was Gerald's reply, as he moved a step nearer to the window. "I, too, have made my resolutions. I have been dreaming, but I awoke to-day; and to what conviction, think you? Even this, my darling, that the whole tribe of Veres and Vavasours, from the remotest patriarch down to my humble self, are not to be weighed against one blackbrunett's daughter, nay, not against her smallest finger or one lock of her silken hair!" He stopped for an instant. "Katy, will you marry me? Love, will you be my wife?"

The girl, white with emotion, pressed her hands to her bosom.

"Mr. Gerald!" she gasped.

"Say Gerald, and I am answered," pleaded the lover.

"But—your father—?"

"Leave that to me. All will be well. Speak, dear—your answer?"

"You are foolish, and I am wrong," said Katy, after a moment's struggle; "but—but—I love you, dear," and she burst into a passion of tears.

CHAPTER VI.

IT was a few minutes before the satisfactory termination of the quarrel just described, that the worthy squire, while pausing in his evening stroll to prune a tree, was, to his great astonishment, cannoned against by a young man, who, with his dress disordered, and a face inflamed with heat and passion, came dashing through the trees as if regardless of all obstructions.

"Hallo, Tom Fullfield! what game's this?" shouted the squire, recovering his equilibrium.

"It is a providence—quite—findin' you here," gasped the young farmer. "Come you on to the corner, that's leading to Taffey's farm—and—and you'll see."

"See! See what, man? Rick on fire?"

"Worse, you'll say," returned young Fullfield, with a sullen fierceness that provoked the impatient squire into grasping him by the collar.

"What is it, sirrah, you blockhead? I'll be hanged. "Have you lost both brains and tongue?"

"Those that sent a blockhead Taffey's daughter, that's all," returned Thomas, choking with excitement and inexhaustible rage.

"My son! Is he with?"

"Mr. Rochford—curse him!" added Tom, in a lower voice.

The squire's face darkened, but he displayed no outward anger.

"Get home, Fullfield," he said; "compose yourself, and say nothing."

He turned and strode away.

"The boy defies me, then? He shall repent it! Ay, to the next generation!" he muttered, furiously.

At the turn of the road the little farm-house indeed came in view. It was now dusk, but forms were clearly distinguishable, and it so chanced that at the moment the squire obtained a view of them they were going forward, Gerald being permitted to take (through the window) a parting embrace of her whom he now regarded as his affianced wife. The lookers were much alike in build and stature. The squire's eye caught the familiar light-brown over-coat usually worn by Gerald, and not a doubt that it was his younger son entered his mind. He grasped his teeth together, and his face grew white as he vowed in his mind to execrate a certain resolution to which he had been striving to come. He turned and hurried homeward.

Suddenly a thought occurred to him.

"Can the boy be in earnest? Is it possible that, in spite of his disdainful denial, he is willing to make this pretty girl his wife? I will test him, at least," thought the squire. "Youth is changeable. Yes, that's but fair."

Rochford, on entering, was, he said, from the stables, was informed that he was again required in the library.

"Rochford," said the squire, "I spoke hotly to you this morning, but I think you will acknowledge that I have not been, on the whole, an arbitrary, tyrannical, or even an irritable parent."

His son—not without a shade of compunction for his own shortcomings—admitted that such was the fact.

"You will have less hesitation, then," resumed the squire, "in owning the exact truth, although it may be not in strict accordance with what you have already given me to understand."

"As yet I do not comprehend your meaning, Sir," said Rochford, coldly.

"You told me this morning that nothing should induce you to present' another Sukey Bubbs for my paternal blessing. By that expression you meant, I presume, that you would not condescend to marry beneath your station?"

"You are right, Sir. Such was my meaning," replied the young man, steadily.

"Take care, Rochford; you can not have forgotten our conversation of the morning, nor my strongly-expressed desire that you should henceforth refrain from your harmful intercourse with my cottage tenantry. Once more, take care," said the squire, biting his lip ominously.

"I have neither forgotten your commands nor the emphasis with which they were delivered," replied his son, whose inclination to retort too frequently overcame his fear.

"Then what do you mean by your conduct since?" thundered the squire.

"A flagrant violation of my wishes, Sir, if you can," said the young man, haughtily; "and suffer me to understand of what I am accused. I have done nothing contrary to your commands."

"That is a falsehood, Sir!"

Rochford started to his feet.

"A falsehood!"

"Am I not to believe my own eyes and ears?" shouted the squire, his passion increasing every moment. "You have disobeyed me. Now you would deceive me. Is this the honor of the Veres and Vavasours, of which you are so tender? There is not a lout on my land that does not better understand the word. You shall repent this. Yes, before you are a day older you shall bitterly regret your defiance of me. Have you ing thing to say?" he added, as his son turned to leave the room.

"Not one word, Sir," said the young man, proudly, and the squire was alone.

The morning, that succeeded this interview was bright and fresh, tempting more than one habitually early bird to be out earlier still. Among these were Messrs. Taffey and Apreece, who lingered for a moment at the forge-door in conversation.

"That's most as passed," Mr. Taffey was remarking; "and I am glad it wan't more. He's a good lad—and a vule temper—that's how I reads him. And if he'd make up his mind to marry any one as God bless that wife keeper, and let it fly out in the face of any lady did as is gone, there'd be no better man. Hullo! Talk of the—Hem! here's the squire himself."

It was indeed Mr. Hurbandine who came trotting briskly down the street, and reined up at the forge.

"A word with you alone, Taffey."

The smith beckoned one of his swarthy followers to take the squire's horse, and they walked a little apart.

"Taffey," said Mr. Hurbandine, laying his hand on the smith's sleeve, "I have made up my mind to marry again."

The honest smith could not forbear a start, so aptly did the remark accord to his late conversation with Apreece. But why come to him to bid the squire think that he could forge him a wife to order? His doubts were instantly resolved.

"You have a daughter, my old friend," continued the squire, "fair, modest, and intelligent. She is worthy of any station. She is seventeen; I am forty-seven. If she were willing to sacrifice her bright youth to partake the lot of such a patriarch as I must appear to her, give her me to wife. Be sure that I will deal with your precious flower as tenderly as Taffey, attention as observant and as confiding, as any lowlier lover whom I may have balked of the prize. What say you?"

Mr. Taffey was far too much bewildered to say any thing. He could only stare at the eager speaker, with his own jaw leg to the other, take off his cap and put it on again, and wish for his wife.

As if the squire had divined this thought, he proposed a visit of reference to the lady. Too, the cottage they went. Fate willed that Mrs. Taffey should be "out and about." So vague an indication of her movements was no check upon the impatient squire, and Katy being in her apartment, Mr. Taffey was prevailed on, much against his inclination, to undertake the office of plenipotentiary, and lay before his daughter the singular proposal, in which he himself could hardly yet believe.

"They did say as she should marry a lord," thought Mr. Taffey as he went out, scratching his head; "but that's a sight next door to it."

He was absent so long that the squire, finding the suspense intolerable, was about to disturb the conference when the ambassador returned, somewhat flushed and out of sorts.

"She won't have nothing to say to't till she have seen you, squire," was the announcement.

"Devilish right of her," said the honest squire; "I like her the better for it."

"She's something on her mind, which you won't like so well, I do fear," remarked Mr. Taffey, doubtfully. "Here she is."

Katy entered, as he spoke, deadly pale, eyes a little red. She wore the dress of homely gray, in which she was wont to go about her cottage work; but on her richest, the most studied attire could have added nothing to the grace and dignity of the girl's manner as she courtesied to the sorr of lofty respect, to the lord of Llwyddcoed. The latter, on his part, thought that he had never seen her in such advantage; for, in addition to the beauty with which he was familiar, there was in her countenance an expression of intense feeling that gave to every lineament life and speech.

"Katy—" began the squire. But she stopped him.

"Please, Mr. Hurbandine, before you say one word more, permit me to ask a question."

"I crave you dear," said the squire.

"Did you see your son last night?"

"I did."

"Did you speak of—of me?"

"Of nothing else," replied the squire.

"I must have misunderstood my father, then," said Katy, the color rising in her cheek.

"And why so, my dear child?' asked the puzzled squire.

"Because," returned Katy, fixing her clear eyes steadily on him—"because your son, if he told you any thing, must have told you that he had asked me to become his wife, and that I had consented."

"Merciful Heaven, child! what are you saying?" ejaculated Mr. Hurbandine, in his turn growing pale. "My son asked you to be his wife?" Katy mistook his meaning.

"If you have not combined to insult me," she said, haughtily, "and if I understood your message, it was an honor his father did not disdain."

"My proposal was in earnest, my poor child," said the squire, livided between anger and sorrow.

"And his?" half whispered the girl.

"A lie!" shouted the squire. "A villainous deceit!—the common pretext of a libertine, whose other arts have failed. Alas! that I should live to say it of my son! Child, child! he had no thought of marriage. I gave him the opportunity of breaking it to me. I spoke with leniency—nay, with approbation—of a simple union once contracted in my family. He sneered it down. No, he is a rascal—the first, thank Heaven, in my line. There is not a taint upon the honor of my ancestors; and the Vores and Vavasours, if bodies, are not blackguards. Forget him, my poor Katy."

The cottage-girl took him up unexpectedly. Making one step toward him, she looked him once more steadily in the face.

"Your son informed you, last night, that he had no intention of making me his wife?"

"He discinctly repeated a declaration he had made to me in the morning, that nothing should induce him to marry beneath his station—my servant (I conclude) notwithstanding."

"Fresh from my presence!" murmured Katy.

"Even so," said the squire, sadly.

"Mr. Hurbandine," resumed the girl, raising her eyes suddenly, with a light in them he had not seen before, "if I could believe this insult possible—"

"Katy! you doubt my word! But good, Ifan—"

"I would say, Do with me as you please," said Katy, making her common face from the squire to her father, which latter gentleman had been a silent, not to say bewildered, spectator of this scene.

"What further proof do you require, Katy?" inquired Mr. Hurbandine. "Would you hear from his own lips the confirmation of what I have told you?"

"Then, indeed, I could not doubt," said Katy. "But oh! Sir, if you had heard him!" The proud head drooped forward to conceal the tear that would not be denied.

"Then, by the Lord!" exclaimed the squire. "But, see, Katy. In your father's presence, I hold you to your plighted word. I repeat that I wish to your proffered wifely love, it is mine, mine!—because that dared insult you innocence with his profligate vows, and because you vowed where his brother sat, the mistress of Llwyddcoed. Taffey, my good friend, you are witness of our compact. Katy, my sweetheart, you will not be less plain every thing to your good wife; bid her soothe and guard my precious Kate, and come up with her to the house. Come, come to the hall about noon. Leave the rest to me."

He was gone.

CHAPTER VII.

The noonday sun was casting rich gleams through the stained glass windows of the squire's library, and diverting a particularly bright one upon the face of Lady Susan Vavasour (nee Vore), at whom Mr. Hurbandine stood gazing with an interest even more than common.

"I hate eavesdropping," said the latter, leaving the pieces and beginning to pace the room. "It's a shabby thing at best; but in this case—at least, in my humble judgment—the best motive would save. Half a dozen words, and there an end! Whereas we may go on feeling and fencing, and proving ourselves the best hearts in the world, for a week without it. Yes, better so," concluded the honest squire, as, with a slightly heightened color, he took a seat at the table and drew from the mass of pulled out a side of foolscap, waiting for her doom.

At that door he listened for a moment.

"They are coming!"

The next moment Mr. and Mrs. Taffey, with Katy, made their appearance under the guidance of a trusty old servant of the squire's, who withdrew.

The two elder visitors spoke in whispers, and walked on tip-toe, like a pair of respectable mutes at burglary. Taffey had with difficulty been prevailed upon not to leave his boots at the foot of the stairs. Katy followed, with a face pale and earnest, but full of self-possessed strength, but a deadly pallor succeeded to the blush with which she had acknowledged the squire's greeting, and she found herself compelled to lean on one of the chairs he had hastily placed for her mother and herself. There she forced herself to sit, with a cold indifference, waiting for her doom.

The squire had hardly seated himself in his accustomed place when Rochford, summoned by the old servant, made his appearance.

"Sit down, Rochford," said his father, in a conciliatory tone. "Our last two interviews have not had results as satisfactory as I could desire."

"The third time is proverbially lucky, Sir," said the young man, smiling. "I am here to know your pleasure."

"My pleasure is your happiness," returned the squire. "Make me your friend, Rochford. Have no mental reservation with me in regard to what I am about to say. Will you promise ?"

"I do, Sir," said the young man, after a moment's pause.

"Enough. What are your feelings—what your object—with respect to Katy Taffey?"

There was a slight movement behind the screen, but neither gentleman observed it.

Rochford had hesitated for an instant, then he said: "Will you, on your part, promise me, my dear father, if my answer does not please you, to restrain your anger?"

"I will, Rochford. On my honor, by your mother's memory," said the squire, with feeling, "I will."

"Then, Sir," said Rochford, rising, "I repeat my twice-made declaration. I do not love the girl; and if I did, such are the prejudices I have been with, that I would not marry her."

"You are a greater scoundrel than I took you for!" said the squire, in a manner but perfectly controlled voice. "No heroics, if you please," he added; for Rochdale had sprung from his chair as if his father had dealt him a blow. "Leave me, and blame yourself for what may follow."

Rochdale looked silently at his father, and quitted the room.

The squire flung the screen aside.

But the girl, with a sudden instinct of alarm, motioned him from her. She strove to utter some words, but failed, and fell helplessly into her mother's arms.

"What—what is this? Is she not content yet?" asked the perplexed squire. "Can tongue forthcoming? Tell me, Taffey, what can I do more?"

The smith passed his hand through his iron-gray locks.

"Well, squire—begging pardon," he said, "you knows I'm a boutspoken man, and, since you puts it to us wot you nought do, my missie thinks, and so do I, and we've been all a-thinking—on'y we didn't like for to be troublesome—that you'd better try the screen again, and just see what t'other 'll say."

"Father!" ejaculated the squire.

There was no time for further explanation, nor any need to replace the screen. Gerald, recalled by the sight of his father, entered the study at that moment for that very purpose.

Words were superfluous then. The eyes, the cheeks, of the young lovers told every thing—every thing that was essential to the squire's enlightenment. It was left for after-explanation and the gradual heartening of a light-brown paletot, by a gentleman who generally sported a dark one, had led to such serious complications and important discoveries.

The squire, frank and generous as he was quick and impulsive, accepted the situation for boon or ill. Katy was that lad, for, in a brief space, had in contemplation, and heartily lent himself to the fulfillment of his own prophecy. She was the mistress of Llwyddcoed; and, if it was not a merry one, we, who were among the hidden, know not what match mirrors. Patrician and plebeian were united on this occasion in such harmony, and with such a community of good-breeding, that it was almost impossible to say which party was the host. It was, however, noticeable that neither my Lord Leatherhead nor the Honorable Mr. Castleton was present.

Mr. Hurbandine, naturally gay and condescending at the festivity, had not, at that period, wholly forgiven his brother his choice. It was remarked that he never again wore that fawn-colored paletot which had indirectly contributed to the wooing of Katy, and shortly after presented it to his valet. It is to be presumed, however, that he has got over the prejudices he was "born with," being now the father of a very amiable girl, the only daughter and heiress of David Black Dymond, Esq., the well-known millionaire, who commands the Welsh mineral prosperous career as a common miner at half-a-crown a day.

Some words caught our ear, as we wandered through the rooms among, spoken by two gentlemen in very holiday garments, who were half concealed by a column in the hall. They were Mr. Apreece and Mr. Taffey.

"Nunc est bibendum," remarked the former, and there was a clinking of glasses, as in good fellowship.

"Werry much so," returned Mr. Taffey, "if he bend 'em means 'be civil.' If all great folks, like squires, would bend 'em a little more, 'twould be better going for all."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

A RAINSOME young bride was observed to be in deep reflection on the morning after her wedding. One of her bridesmaids asked her the subject of her meditation. "I was thinking," she replied, "what a fool my old beaux I should marry if I should become a widow."

A CRUELTY SERMON.—One illustrated with plates.

A Yankee has invented a new and cheap plan for boarding. One of his lodgers mesmerizes the rest, and they eat only mental—the mesmerized being satisfied from sympathy.

A king possessed a falsifist who greatly amused him. Once when the falsifist was in bed the king bade him get up and tell him a story.

The falsifist, half dead for want of sleep, did his best to evade compliance, but he was compelled to obey. He accordingly thus began:

"Sire, there was once upon a time a man who had a brother. This man's sons; and with this money he was anxious to purchase some sheep, and with the sheep cattle, and more; and he bought two hundred, and he returned to the village with his new husbandry in triumph. He chased them before him. But on returning he discovered that the river was swollen, that he had ruined a great deal, and the water had not spared the country, and there was nothing for him but he didn't know what to do with his sheep. After searching about for a long time he discovered a little island, not so little, so very little, but he could very well keep two sheep at a time. And here the story ended."

"Well," exclaimed the king, "when these two sheep passed, what then did he do?"

"Sire, you know that the river was large, that the boat was very small, and that there were two hundred sheep. They require time to get across, I assure you."

A theoretically benevolent man, on being asked by a friend to lend him a dollar, answered bitterly, "With pleasure, but really I cannot afford it, dear me, how unfortunate! I've only one lending dollar, and that is out."

"SOMEWHAT MIXED."

Scene in a London Court-House.

PLAINTIFF. "I am very much ill-used by a woman who is my husband's wife, and a man who is another woman's husband."

MAGISTRATE. "I don't clearly understand you."

PLAINTIFF. "Don't you? Well, I am my husband's wife, and he's got another wife. I want the police to endanger against my husband and his mistress. They lead me a life, positively, and I can't stand it no longer."

MAGISTRATE. "He can't have another wife."

PLAINTIFF. "But he has got her, and I say he is."

MAGISTRATE. "You mean to say that your husband has committed bigamy?"

PLAINTIFF. "That I do; and I paid for it."

MAGISTRATE. "You paid for it?"

PLAINTIFF. "I've got it here (producing a certificate). I paid 2s. 7d. for it to the parson's wife at Hammersmith."

Some Californian started the following: "A noted trout-fisher died in Alameda County, the other day. Fishing was the main-spring of his existence. His last words were characteristic. 'I say, Brown, I'm going to "pop out" soon. I've fished my last fish; but bury my tackle with me—who knows but they bite in Jordan?'"

The following quaint epitaph on husband and wife is to be seen in one of the Parisian cemeteries:

"I am an outdoor(e) expecting you—A.D. 1817.
"Here I (am) before(d)."

So the good woman was forty years making up her mind to follow her husband.

"Ah! how daily you like my mustache, Miss Lucy?" "I regard a mustache to a merry girl." "Oh, very much. It looks like the fur on the back of a caterpillar."

"Why are old maids so devoted to their cats?" asked a young student of his chum. "Because, having no husbands, they take to the next usual tenderness—mewing," was the reply.

WOMAN'S WORD-BOOK.

Abandon, to.—A term synonymous with "jilt." Used by the jilters. "The fact is, my dear, I was jilted."

Abandon him. "I abandon him."

Accomplice.—The conduct of a man who has flirted himself into coming to the point—mem by manager.

Accord.—Every argument which does not entirely coincide with a woman's wishes.

Accuse.—Any serious remark addressed to a repentant.

Acquaintance.—Admirer of different degrees of warmth.

Actress.—A woman who professes to be a lady.

Adventuress.—A woman who becomes she is a stingy observer who informs her husband of calling herself old; and omits to be ashamed of calling herself a lady. But the only real adventuress is nineteen years of age, and has never had to bear you spiteful remarks.

Advice.—What every woman does off the stage, and what so few can do on.

Ador (of reptile).—Handsome, charming, delightful.

Affairs.—A creature.

Affectation.—Gush paid into a bank which does its utmost to prevent circulation.

Affidavit.—An unwilling piece of nonsense.

Admiration.—The only attraction which makes a woman wish to be ill-used.

A young lady at school, engaged in the study of grammar, was asked if "she" was a common or proper noun. After some hesitation she replied, "It is both common and proper."

"Oh!" says Paddy, "I'll never be able to pet on these boots till I've worn them a week or two."

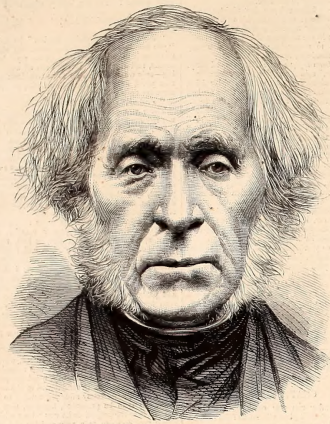
BACHELOR AT BREAKFAST. "Dear me, Susan, that's a very small egg."

SUSAN. "Yes, Sir, it is—but it was only laid this morning, Sir."

WHAT YOTE THE MANAGER OF A THEATER ALWAYS HAS.—The "Casting" Vote.

A CONSIDERABLE DIFFERENCE.

First Democratic Delegate.—"Mr. Chase, we want you to be our leader in this contest.



Mr. C.—"Ah! Well, it is a 'leader' or a follower you want?"

Second Democratic Delegate.—"I guess we'd better try some-body else."

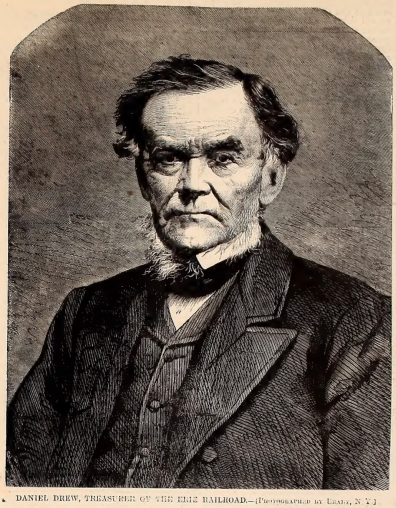
DISRAELI ADDRESSING THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THE first appearance of MR. DISRAELI in his new character as Premier of England took place in the House of Commons on March 5, and for a time the event was talked of as the sensation of the day. The English newspaper descriptions of the scene were very elaborate and spicy and entertaining. The London News has the following account of MR. DISRAELI'S appearance and manner on the occasion referred to:

"Certainly the audience which assembled to witness the re-entry of MR. DISRAELI in his new character of Prime Minister ought to have satisfied him. Of course, as on all occasions when expectation beats high for the advent of a particular event, a number of small matters which ordinarily do not present themselves intervened. There was a good deal of private business, there was an accumulation of petitions; and it thus happened that the hero of the moment came on with a certain inopportuneness, in the midst of a speech to which people were trying to listen with very little success. To say truth, MR. DISRAELI did not look very heroic. He appeared to ape a degree of humility: his shoulders were more bent forward, his eyes more downcast, than ever; and one might have thought that for the moment he wished that he was a Japanese, and had a fan to place before his face. There was good, but not tumultuous, cheering; and the Opposition decidedly joined in it so long as it lasted, which was not very long. Again, a number of twaddling notices of motions and questions tried the patience of the assemblage, which was waiting for the oracle to pronounce. When he did speak, it was in that vein which is not his happiest, and which may be described as an effort to show deep emotion, when in reality there is very little, if any, using the word in its ordinary sense. Except that he professed a 'liberal, a truly liberal, policy,' at which, of course, every one laughed, he said very little, though he spoke in reality for the best part of half an hour. On the whole, the merit may be given him of having 'borne his faculties meekly,' and that he was particularly civil and deferential to the House."

THE LATE SIR DAVID BREWSTER.

THE LATE SIR DAVID BREWSTER.



ON February 10, at the ripe age of eighty-six, there passed away one of the greatest philosophers of our age. Science and religion are by no means antagonistic. The poet tells us that "an undevout astronomer is mad;" and we may be sure that that is a false science which leads men to reject religious teaching. That science is only true and valuable which leads us more and more to cultivate love and faith in God; and the highest praise we can give a philosopher is, that while these wise men and seers have discovered that the teachings of science are irreconcilable with a belief in the Bible, he can perceive the harmony between that and God's outward world, where "day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge;" and this praise was due to SIR DAVID BREWSTER in an eminent degree.

He was born at Jedburgh, December 11, 1781. He was educated for the Church of Scotland; but in time his inclination for scientific pursuits led him to other branches of study. In 1800 he received the honorary degree of M.A. from the University of Edinburgh. In 1807 he obtained the distinction of LL.D. from the sister institution at Aberdeen; and in 1808 was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh. Meanwhile his important discoveries in optics had made his name so famous in literature that he was elected editor of the Edinburgh Encyclopædia—an onerous post, the duties of which he discharged for two-and-twenty years. In 1831 he laid the scientific world under still further obligations by becoming one of the founders of the British Association for the Advancement of Science.

As a writer and author SIR DAVID was most laborious and successful. In a short paper, such as this necessarily must be, and, to non-scientific readers, we presume it is utterly impossible to tell what SIR DAVID has done, and what are his claims on our admiration and regard, either as a discoverer of new truth, or as a popular interpreter of the great laws of the natural world around. Most of us must take SIR DAVID'S merits upon trust. That he was one of the greatest natural philosophers of the day is the universal testimony of the best judges in our own and other lands.

Optics, as we have already implied, was the field in which SIR DAVID has chiefly labored. Perhaps no branch of research has presented such startling results as spectrum analysis. WOLLASTON, in 1808, discovered that the solar spectrum was traversed by innumerable dark lines. Twelve years later their number was estimated at 600. Subsequently they were discovered by SIR DAVID to be 2000; and now "we are beginning to apprehend the startling truth," says a recent scientific writer, "that this method of analysis presents a means of examining the nature and constitution of bodies millions of miles distant, and of ascertaining that many of the metals which form our earth are present also in the solar system." When, by the aid of the solar spectrum, SIR DAVID analyzed light into three primary colors, he rendered a service which will make his name ever memorable, even though subsequent research may render his discoveries antiquated, as he did those of SIR ISAAC NEWTON before him.

On SIR DAVID honors of all kinds have been widely showered. There is scarcely a learned society on the Continent or in America which has not hastened to honor itself in honoring a man who has done so much to enlarge the domains of science, to promote the knowledge of it among the masses, and to render it beneficial to humanity. SIR DAVID was twice married—once to a daughter of the "Ossian" MACPHERSON.

MESSRS. FISK AND GOULD ESCAPING TO NEW JERSEY.—[SKETCHED BY W. WARD.]

THE GREAT RAILROAD WAR.

THERE is no more singular chapter in all the varied romance of Wall Street than the facts in the remarkable contest now going on between the rival New York Central and the New York and Erie Railroads to secure the business of carrying the immense quantities of freight which comes from the West to New York by these two routes. The wealth and importance of the contesting roads; the prominence of the two men who control them and who direct this war; the singularity, not to say the illegality, of the judicial proceedings in the case; the amount of money involved in the quarrel; the numbers of brokers, bankers, and speculators engaged, pecuniarily, in it; the vigor and boldness of the effort to take possession of the Erie road; the not less bold manœuvre of a change of base to New Jersey soil—in short, all the circumstances of the rivalry make it one of the strangest "stories of the street." It is related fully in our editorial columns.

The chief contestants in this "fight" are remarkable men. Both are self-made, in fortune and education; both men of great energy and determination, and both men of colossal fortune. Mr. VANDERBILT, the eldest of the two, is now seventy-three years of age, but strong and healthy as a man of fifty. Mr. DREW is now seventy-one years of age, and enjoying vigorous health. Both made their great fortunes—Mr. VANDERBILT is said to be worth $40,000,000 and Mr. DREW about $20,000,000—in the steamboat business, and have only turned their attention to railroading in their old age.

Outside of business matters the two men are in tastes, habits, and character very different. Mr. Drew is rather of a quiet, retiring disposition, and is fonder of his country estate than the city; while Mr. Vanderbilt insists on a city life and city associations. Mr. Drew is a devout Methodist, and not a little of his wealth has been spent in the erection of schools and educational institutions. Mr. Vanderbilt's chief delight is in horses, and he drives fast teams every day in the week, and can be seen regularly "on the road."

Our illustrations are portraits of the two principal leaders in the fight, and three others showing an incident of the flight to New Jersey, and scenes at the hotel in Jersey City, in which the Drew forces are besieged. On the night of March 15 Messrs. Fisk and Gould, two of the Erie Railroad directors, were dining at Delmonico's, when they heard that warrants had been issued for their arrest. They immediately jumped into a carriage and drove to the foot of Canal Street, where an officer of the steamer St. John lowered a boat and, with two deck hands, attempted the passage of the North River in a dense fog. Mr. Fisk directed the men to head up the river, to keep out of the track of the ferry-boats; but the fog was so thick that they lost their reckoning and rowed for some time in a circle. They were at one time nearly run down, only saving themselves by the vigorous use of their lungs. Once they escaped from one ferry-boat only in time to see another bearing down upon them. Ultimately they determined to endeavor to get some assistance, and for this purpose hailed a Pavonia ferry-boat; but could get no response, and therefore made a clutch at the supports of the guard, and were drawn so near to the wheel as to nearly wash the whole party out of the boat. They however saved her from swamping, and climbed on board, arriving shortly after at Jersey City, safe and sound, but thoroughly drenched.

The Taylor Hotel in Jersey city is used as the quarters of the Drew party, and one of the rooms is now known as the "Directors' Room." Our view is of the exterior of this room. It is guarded night and day by police, who are sufficiently impressed with the solemn duty that has devolved upon them, and are more reticent than gentlemen of the profession usually are. The favored few who pass these portals are received by Mr. Fisk with such good-humored cordiality that it is difficult to imagine that he and his brother directors are in a state of siege. "The Guard Room" was formerly the ladies' parlor of the hotel. A force of about seventy-five specials are on duty at the hotel during the night, and occupy when off duty this apartment, where they are in waiting to prevent any raid which the "Vanderbilt party" may attempt to make.

VORACIOUS.

A LAY "OF LADIES' LOVE AND DRU-ERIE."

By C. H. Webb.

Cornelius, the Great Cornerer,
A solemn oath he swore,
That in his trowsers pockets he
Would put one railroad more:
And when he swears, he means it—
The stout old Commodore.

Words have a certain weightiness
That strikes one of a heap,
When dropped by men whose early home
Has been upon the deep—
With so much saltness in their speech,
Their oaths are sure to keep.

It serves him well, the Commodore,
His battling with the breeze;
Knowing the ropes, he takes and swings
The biggest Line with ease—
As one should do who all his life
Has been upon the Seize.

Not following now the seas, instead
You see him behind Bays;
'Tis said he always holds a pair;
And no one him gainsays—
Being on stocks, 'tis plain that he Must have his way and Ways.

Each, every inch a railroad man,
In not a line awry,
His arms are railway branches,
His feet are termini—
If you doubt me, there are his tracks
To witness if I lie!

He was the Hudson River's bed·
The Harlem's bed and Board:
The Central's, too—whose cattle-pen
Is mightier than a sword:
His pockets were the tunnels
Through which these railways roared.

Such share of shares were quite enough
To serve a common mind,
But not the stout old Commodore's—
He for an Eyrie pined:
As though he were the Eagle bird—
By chance—or had the Blind.

But brooding o'er the Erie sat—
In fact on the same lay—
A bird that, feathering his nest,
Affirmed by yea and nay,
Before he'd budge he'd see them all,
Much further than I'll say.

Said he unto the Commodore:
"Your bark is on the sea,
But do not steer for Erie's ile,
Since that's been struck by me.
Go, man of sin, and leave me here
To my Theology!"

The dearest ties on earth to some
Are plainly railroad ties;
So little wonder that he spoke
In anger and surprise—
Tears would not flow; the Commodore,
It seems, had dammed his eyes.

"When Greek meets Greek, then comes the tug—"
Which is all wrong you know;
Unfriendly fires burn fast enough
Without the help of tow.
Especially when Coke is on,
And several lawyers blow.

Such "Eerie" sights, such "Eerie" sounds
Came from this Erie crew,
It seemed, indeed, a den of Lines
Prepared for Daniel—Drew!
Not strange that he at last resolved
To make his own ado.

Fleeing from jars—perhaps the jug—
He looked to foreign lands,
And to his brethren said: "Arise,
These Bonds put off our hands;
We will into New Jersey, where
My Seminary stands.

"There, in that benefice of Bogs,
Of stocks and Stubs and fen,
Directors—if not rectors—we'll
Be all Tyngs to all men—
They'll strain their canon some, I think,
If they would reach us then!"

'Twas thus that Daniel's bark—and bite—
Came on the Jersey shore:
He can not cross, since in his face
Is slammed the Commodore;
There he must bide his time and tide—
Tied till the row is o'er.

The gage of war has been thrown down,
A broad-gauge—broad and free—
And taken up—the Commodore,
A gauger is, per sea:
Cries Drew: "He only wants to get
The weather-gage of me!"

'Tis plain that if, in this tourney—
A l'outrance is the tilt—
The Commodore should keep his seat
And Daniel be the spilt,
The latter must make tracks, but roads
Will all be Vander built.

While if upon the other hand
The Commodore should fall,
He'll see that little backward time
Asked for by Mr. Ball—
In other words, he'd lose his age,
And Drew would have the call.

Just how the joust may terminate,
Nobody knows nor cares;
No need to ask how fares the fight—
They'll ask us for our fares,
And whiche'er side may win will plow
The public with its shares.

So we will sing, Long live the Ring,
And Daniel long live he,
May his High school confer on him
Exceeding high degree,
Doubling his D's until, indeed,
He is D. D., D. D!

As for the stout old Commodore
May he still rule the wave,
Yet never waive the Golden Rule,
E'en the odd trick to save:
If called to play the railway King,
May he ne'er play the knave.

This ends my lay, if either wins;
But if they both should fail—
I mean that if, by any chance,
This struggle o'er a rail
Should end like the Kilkenny cats',
You'll see another tail.

THE DERVISHES OF CENTRAL ASIA.

The dervish is the veritable personification of Eastern life. Idleness, fanaticism, and slovenliness are the features which in him are regarded as virtues, and which every where are represented by him as such. Idleness is excused by allusion to human impotence; fanaticism explained as enthusiasm in religion; and slovenliness justified by the uselessness of poor mortals in struggling against fate. As the dervish represents the general character, so he does the different peoples of the East. It is true, Mohammedanism enforces the dogma, "All Islamites are one nation;" but the origin and home of the different sects are easily recognized. The members of the different fraternities are bound together by very close ties; apprentices and assistants have to yield implicit obedience to the chief, who has an unlimited power over the life and property of his brethren. But these fraternities do not in the least trouble themselves about secret political or social objects, as is sometimes asserted by enthusiastic travelers, who have even discovered Freemasons among the Bedouin tribes of the Great Desert. The dervishes are the monks of Islamism; and the spirit which created and sustains them is that of religious fanaticism, and they differ from each other only by the manner in which they demonstrate their enthusiasm. For instance: while one of these religious orders commands constant pilgrimages to the tombs of saints, the other lays down stringent rules for reflection on divine infinity and the insignificance of our existence. A third compels its votaries to occupy themselves day and night with repeating the name of God and hymns; and it can not surprise us to learn that the greater number of a company which has continually been calling out with all its might, "Ja hu! Ja hakk! La illahi illa hu!" are seized with delirium tremens. The orthodox call this condition Medjzub; i.e., carried away by divine love, or to be in ecstasy. A person to whom such a fortunate event happens, for as such it is regarded, is envied by every body; and, as long as it lasts, the sick and the maimed, and barren women, try to get in his immediate presence, taking hold of his dress—as touching it is supposed to have healing powers.

Those who embrace this vocation are either unprincipled and lazy fellows, or professed beggars, who, under the cloak of poverty, collect treasures, and when they are sufficiently enriched often adopt some lucrative trade. The dervishes of India, and particularly those of Cashmere, are throughout the East pre-eminent among their Mohammedan brethren for cunning, secret arts, forms of exorcism, etc. These fellows impose most impudently on the credulity of the people in Persia and Central Asia, and even men of wit and understanding sometimes fall into their snares; for wherever such a Cashmere dervish appears, gifted, as he generally is, with a noble figure, striking features, bright, eloquent eyes, and long, dark, flowing hair, he is sure of success. The Mohammedans of India and the adjoining Eastern countries have always been celebrated in the Islamite world for their supernatural gifts. As soon as such a traveling saint arrives in a Mohammedan country, he is entreated to cure dangerous maladies, to exorcise ghosts, or to point out where hidden treasures are buried; for although those arts are forbidden by the Koran, they appear every where as the most zealous Mohammedans.

It is the same with dervishism as with all the other Oriental institutions, customs, and manners: the more we penetrate toward the East, the greater is the purity with which they have been preserved. In Persia the dervishes play a much more important part than in Turkey; and in Central Asia, isolated as it has been from the rest of the world for centuries, this fraternity is still in full vigor, and exercises a great influence upon society.

Besides the dervishes who, as physicians, miracle-working saints, or harmless vagabonds, are wandering about in Central Asia, there is a class called "Khanka neshin," or convent dwellers, who always wish to appear as the poorest, and are without doubt the most contemptible fellows in the world. Generally speaking, they are opium eaters, who, by their excessive filth, skeleton-like body, and frightfully distorted features, present a most repulsive appearance. The worst is that they do not confine themselves to practicing this fearful vice themselves, but with a singular persistency endeavor to make converts among all classes; and, supported by the want of spirituous drinks, they succeed but too frequently in their wicked attempts. These wretched people are regarded as eminently religious, of whom it is thought that from their love to God and the Prophet, they had become mad, and stupefied themselves in order that in their excited state they might be nearer the beings whom they loved so well.

Hotels, Saloons, Boarding-House Keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our French Breakfast and Dinner Coffee, which we sell at the low price of 30c. per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50c. to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St. (Post-Office Box No. 5643), New York City.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (only the small additional expense of Postage) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city.

Some parties who inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a club say how much tea or coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price List, as published in the papers in our cities. The party receiving the club should then carefully put us a list, and when the club is complete send it to us by mail, and we will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, so there need be no confusion in their distribution—each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the club can divide equitably among themselves.

The funds to pay for the goods ordered can be sent by drafts on New York, by post-office money orders, or by express, as may suit the convenience of the club. Or, if the amount does not exceed $30, we will, if desired, send the goods by Express to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary package for Clubs of less than $30.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Tea and Coffees about one-third by sending directly to "The Great American Tea Company."

BEWARE of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our Establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part. We have no connection with any concern of the kind, and do not, in any case, authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office orders and drafts make payable to the order of the Great American Tea Company. Direct letters and orders to the

THE RELIGIOUS WARS OF FRANCE

AND

The Revocation of the Edict of Nantes.

THE MASSACRE OF ST. BARTHOLOMEW: Preceded by a History of the Religious Wars in the Reign of Charles IX. By HENRY WHITE, M.A., Ph. D. With Illustrations. 8vo, Cloth, $1 75.

The whole story has never, to our knowledge, been so clearly and satisfactorily related before, and no where else can an inquirer after the truth concerning this event more readily find what he is in search of than in this masterly exposition of the never-to-be-forgotten Massacre of St. Bartholomew.—Athenæum.

Dr. White has told the story of the terrible St. Bartholomew's feast and with great spirit, but with much unbroken impartiality and picturesque skill as to give a charm to all he says. His History of the Religious Wars in the Reign of Charles IX. are not merely full chronicles of war, ruptue, persecution, and bloodshed, but save a few rapid sketches of the general and troubled empire of France at that wild and stormy period.—Standard.

His arguments are every where conclusive, ably supported by the results of deep researches into the contemporary state of the nation and of which he treats. His language is always forcible, and frequently rises to eloquence. His account of the state of France in the middle of the sixteenth century is admirably exhaustive. The same praise may be allowed to his descriptions of the character of the chief personages of the bloody drama which he recounts. We heartily commend the book for the tolerant spirit in which it is written.—London Review.

Of the state of France from the commencement of the century to the terrible day of St. Bartholomew Dr. White gives a very accurate, and, from numerous contemporary memoirs and state documents he has collected the details of a picture at once broad in its general effect and minute in its minutiæ—a picture full of life, color, character, and force. The massacre of Paris is of course the chief feature in the work. It is admirably described, without any pretense of pictorial writing, yet in such a way that the whole hideous tragedy passes before our eyes, and we behold the grim old Paris of the sixteenth century in its spasm of blood and misery.—Dr. White has produced a book full of research, conceived in the most conscientious and painstaking spirit, and written in a nervous and vigorous style, which has the gravity of the events which it narrates and the principles which it affirms.—London Daily News.

The author has taken much pains in collecting materials for this work. The story of the plot and its development to the fatal day, and many days after, with something of the interest corresponding to the terrible event is described.—Scotsman Review.

He has thrown light on some obscure passages in the story, and has given us an accurate and graphic narrative.—Nonconformist.

"IMPROVED BRONZE ALUMINUM HUNTING-CASED WATCHES"

(The qualities and resemblance of this new metal are such, compared to gold, that even judges are deceived) and "ROSKOPF'S PATENTED PEOPLE'S WATCH."

The Improved Bronze Aluminium of which my watches are made is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. It has seriously occupied the attention of scientific men, and has not only called forth eulogiums of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition, and even been favorably noticed by receipt of His Holiness Pius IX., authorizing its use in the manufacturing of Church goods.

The qualities of this metal are such that it is surpassed by none, if we except gold itself, and that only on account of the intrinsic value of the latter. Further details will be found in my circular, which will be sent postpaid on demand.

My watches are made of three sizes, all huntingcased—one suitable for ladies or lads, and two for gents. The movements are well finished, carefully put together by skilful workmen, and perfectly regulated. I can therefore warrant them excellent time-keepers. These goods being manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to sell any of the above sizes at the extremely low price of $16 00. A full assortment of all kinds of chains always on hand.

"THE MARINER'S CHILDREN."—BY LAWRENCE DUNCAN.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

"THE MARINER'S CHILDREN."

The original picture from which our engraving on the preceding page is taken was lately displayed in the Dudley Gallery Water-Color Exhibition, London, and is by LAWRENCE DUNCAN, a son of the well-known English painter of that name. The merit of the picture is none the less because modest in kind. On the contrary, the examination which it deserves will reveal a genuine, unforced, unvulgar sympathy with its humble subject, accompanied by excellent drawing.

The subject itself requires no comment beyond our engraving. The reader may construct for himself the story of the lonely mariner away so far away on the treacherous sea, so calm, so beautiful, and bright; of the loving wife and mother, now busy, perhaps, in the neighboring cottage with preparations for that little hooked-for return; of the little son, the pride of the family, already giving indications of a bias toward his forefather's adventurous calling, and who, having constructed a toy sailing-boat—a miracle of skill—has brought his elder and younger sister down by the banks to witness his triumph in naval architecture, though won only on a little pool left by the ebbing tide.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
SATURDAY, APRIL 18, 1868.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE PRESIDING.

THE proceedings in the Senate sitting as a Court of Impeachment are of such a character as to inspire the greatest confidence in the final judgment. The opening speech for the Managers by General BUTLER was a very able presentation of the case, and his conduct as Manager has shown all the skill, fertility, and equipoise for which he has always been noted in the courts. It is observable that partisan action seems to be time for omitted to the Democratic Senators. They usually vote through thick and thin against any proposition which is favored by the Managers, and opposed by the President's counsel. The Republican Senators evidently regard reason and argument as well as party feeling. We have no doubt that the same disposition will continue to the end, and the result will be a universal conviction that the trial has been in every respect patient and fair.

The action of the Chief Justice raised a question which we think was widely entertained by the Senate. As President of the Court of Impeachment Judge CHASE made a ruling which was questioned by Senator DIXON, of Maryland, upon the ground that as President he had no right to decide any but ceremonial questions. This was again referred to Senator CONKLING. The again referred to the same manner. The conclusion was that the Chief Justice may decide any preliminary point subject, of course, to revision by the Senate upon the appeal of any Senator.

The case against the position of the Chief Justice was stated very forcibly by Mr. BOUTWELL, of the Managers. He urged that the Constitution makes the Senate the sole Court of Impeachment, and that the Chief Justice, not being a Senator, could have no voice. If he could, he might by a casting-vote decide adversely to the judgment of the Senate by voting affirmatively upon a tie. The Constitution, in making him President of the Court, did not make him a member of it. Mr. BOUTWELL, with all the Senators who differed from the Chief Justice, was very careful to express his perfect confidence in that high officer. He only said that the Senate was now making precedents, and must regard every question with strict impartiality.

But the conclusive consideration seems to us to be, that in making the Chief Justice President of the Senate for a particular purpose, the Constitution did not mean that he should be a mere figure-head, but that, at least, he should have the ordinary powers of a presiding officer. It is not conceived that the Constitution would bring one of the most dignified officers in the Government, the head of one of its three great departments, into the Senate of the United States simply for imposing and solemnizing session as the impeachment, and possible removal, of the Executive head of the Government, as a mere cypher, a mere mummy, a pageant. The Constitution, which makes the Senate the sole Court to try impeachment, also appoints the Chief Justice for that occasion its President—for that august reason, as it seems to us, and no other member. His presence and participation secure the attendance of two of the departments of the Government at the trial of the third; and he alone is selected from the Bench, as its official, as a matter of convenience, and in recognition of the manifest propriety that the Judiciary should be represented.

It is very desirable that this interpretation should now be settled, that there may be no doubt hereafter. Undoubtedly it is a debatable question. The Constitution does not expressly define the duties of the Chief Justice as President. The Senate should therefore give to the intention of the Constitution that large and generous construction. It is desirable for any reason whatever that the Chief Justice presiding should be merely a cipher? Is any party responsible to be feared from the vote of the Chief Justice of the United States upon such an occasion? and if so, does not that fact more ally incapacitate him for the proper discharge of his customary duties? In the very case supposed by Mr. BOUTWELL of a tie upon a serious point, is it not more satisfactory that the decision should be a vote intrusted to an officer who is beyond suspicion of fear or favor, as in the view of the Constitution the Chief Justice is? Moreover, if with the view of his position and of his relation to the Senate as a Court of Impeachment of the President, which point is a priori peculiarly valuable, because he is peculiarly interested in it, and has undoubtedly very thoroughly examined it. It may be supposed, also, that he is not the advantage of the opinion of his brethren upon the Bench. But there is certainly no reason to suppose that he wishes for any unworthy purpose to perplex or prolong the proceedings; or that any view which he may hold of the political expediency of impeachment will more injuriously affect his conduct than the view of any Senator in the Court's counsel. Indeed, we are very confident that the Chief Justice is not likely, by his part in this trial, to lose any of that high and honorable consideration which he now enjoys.

LEGISLATIVE CORRUPTION.

THERE is not a member of the Legislature of this State nor any other citizen who is not familiar with the charges of corruption that are incessantly made against the body. Every session "A very able lobby agent," says a writer in the North American Review for October, 1866, "who has been in the business some years, has given us an insight into the mode of procedure, which we set to Albany,' said he, 'we make a memorandum of what it is going to cost to get the bills through. We find out about how much each man expects, and who is running him. Then we arrange the thing in New York with certain people whose interest is concerned. The price of a vote ranges from fifty dollars to five hundred, unless it is that of the chairman of a committee. He wants more, because he has to appear on the record as originating the measure.' The instance, which the writer mentions, of benevolent ladies who went to ask legislative aid, and who were met by a demand for five thousand dollars as a commission to grant a group of twenty thousand, is known to us also. Mr. THURLOW WEED says that "bribery and corruption proved to an extent which more than existed in the worst days of the Parliament in England." There is not a man familiar with the Capitol, or even occasionally in the society of such persons, who does not know the rates of appealing facts. We once stood in the lobby of the Assembly, to look at the representatives of New York, and an agent who was "putting through" a certain project, pulled a handful of bank-bills from his pocket, and said, exultingly, "That is the logic for legislators!"

These things are notorious; but when they were suggested in the Constitutional Convention, Senator FOLGER indignantly denied the truth of all such assertions. It is no wonder that he spoke with warmth, for he is a most honored member of the Legislature, and sweeping charges against it seemed to touch his own honor. But every body's honor is not so tinctured with incredulity and amazement, for they knew the venality of some members as they knew the spots on the surface of the sun. Senator FOLGER said he ought to be so anxious and eager as not to give Mr. FOLGER that there shall be an investigation of these charges? If it be true that the stories are endless, they can certainly be disproved to a committee of the Legislature itself, which may be supposed at least leniest to its own faults. And if it be argued that any such investigation of these charges, if made by a committee of the accused body, must be perhaps most unsatisfactory, the reply is, that then the Legislature consents to be helplessly disgraced by an aspersion universally believed, and refuses even to attempt to show its innocence. If the Legislature distrusts a committee of its own members, let it call upon the authorities to prosecute any member against whom sufficient information may lie. But, in the name of decency and public honor, let it do any thing rather than resolve to do nothing, and to insist that its self-respect imposes contemptuous disregard of these reports. Personally members may treat every slander with scorn; but when there are sworn statements that vast sums of money have been spent directly to corrupt legislation, it is not a personal matter. It is a huge public scandal and deeply injure the fair fame of the State, and degrade popular government itself when they stand upon a false dignity and sneer at investigation as an insult.

THE EVIDENCE AGAINST THE PRESIDENT.

THE case of the Managers of the House against the President, as we have elsewhere stated, has been conducted with great skill. The opinion of unbiased minds seems to have been broken, or in any degree weakened, by the onsets in cross-examination of the President's counsel. Those gentlemen, or most of them, are very eminent lawyers. The ability of Mr. STANBERY has been manifested to the country while he was Attorney-General. Judge CURTIS is acknowledged to be one of the most accomplished jurists in the United States. Mr. EVARTS is also a very distinguished lawyer—a man of remarkably clear, alert, and incisive mind. The other gentlemen of the President's counsel, Mr. NELSON and Mr. GROESBECK, have taken no part in the trial during the presentation of the case by the Managers.

There can be little question that upon all points susceptible of proof by evidence the Managers have justified their articles; and it was in this that he had suspended Mr. STANTON in pursuance of the Tenure-of-Office Act, thereby shaming his own assertion that he had acted "under the Constitution," and without recognizing the law in question. Indeed, General BUTLER has unquestionably had the best of the week's work. The most serious effort of his opponents has been baffled by the President's counsel; and Mr. EVARTS's occasional caustic manner has not in the least disturbed the vast impertturbability of the great Manager.

The case for the Managers, notwithstanding the array of articles, was really very simple. The most of it is of course already familiar, for it is the case presented to the public. That there is a Tenure-of-Office law prescribing the conditions under which certain officers, including the Secretary of War, are to be removed, and a penalty for a violation of it, is undeniable. That Mr. STANTON was a person within the provision of the Senate is in evidence. That General THOMAS, having been previously reinstated by the President as Adjutant-General, was appointed by him Secretary of War ad interim is proved. That General THOMAS signed himself as such, and attempted to exercise the duties of the office; that he declared his intention to obtain possession by force if resisted, and that he stated his purpose to do so was in consequence of the legal action of Mr. STANTON, is also proved. It is established further that the President officially acknowledged the validity of the law by confessedly acting under its authority, while he declared that he did not recognize it as binding; that in September, after the suspension of Mr. STANTON but last summer the President called General EMORY to the command of the Department of the District, and upon his refusal to assume command had a detailed conversation in regard to the available military force there; that upon the day of the attempted removal of Mr. STANTON the President sent for General EMORY and asked him again about the troops and what engagement had been made; that when the General proceeded to explain the movements of regiments the President said he referred to other charges made within a day or two, to which the General replied that he knew of none, and that no all orders must be given through the hands of General GRANT, if any new ones had been issued, he should of course be aware of them; that the President seemed surprised, and when the General left him gave an order directing all orders for the army to pass through General GRANT, the President said it was in derogation of his constitutional right as Commander-in-Chief, to which General EMORY replied that the officers of the army were of opinion that it was their duty to obey the order, which was in obedience to the law of Congress. It is further proved that the expressions ascribed to the President in the speeches during his Western trip were actually used by him.

The attempt of the Managers to show, in further proof of conspiracy, by the testimony of Mr. CHANDLER, that Mr. EDMUND COOPER, late Private Secretary of the President, was made by him Assistant Secretary of the Treasury in order that the money of the Government might be obtained by the President for his purposes, was overruled by the Senate, the ground of its action being understood to be that the evidence would open too wide and irrelevant a range of inquiry. This was the only apparently important point not made by the Managers, and this was not essential. They closed the case promptly at the end of the first week, and the Senate then adjourned until the following Thursday to give the President's counsel an opportunity to prepare themselves fully, with the understanding that they will not call a great many witnesses.

The case is thus brought to the exact point which we have before indicated as the one upon which the force of the President's counsel was most likely to be concentrated. Conceding the facts claimed and substantially proved, that the law was regularly enacted, and that it forbade the removal during the session of the Senate of certain officers appointed by the President without the approval of the Senate; conceding that Mr. STANTON was Secretary of War, and was removed by the President without the consent of the Senate—then the question arises, was Mr. STANTON appointed Secretary of War by President JOHNSON? If he were, the law has been violated: If he were not, the law does not touch the case. The position taken by the Managers is revealed by a little remark of Mr. WILSON when he offered the first evidence for the prosecution. After putting in the commission of Mr. STANTON, signed by President LINCOLN, Mr. WILSON said that it was the only commission the Managers proposed to prove, and that commission, in the judgment of the Managers, made Mr. STANTON Secretary of War. The battle will be joined just at this point. We will not anticipate the arguments, but the rule of common-sense is plainly with the Managers. If a man holds an appointed office and the appointing power is changed, but the new power allows him to retain it, it seems to be tolerably clear that he is reappointed. This is a subject, however, upon which there may be the utmost refinement of legal subtlety, to which we shall doubtless have a notable exhibition.

Should the appointment of Mr. STANTON as Secretary be maintained by the Managers, and he be judged to stand within the operation of the law, it is possible that the President's counsel may try to show that there was no improper intention in its violation by the President. We doubt if the utmost skill can do this, for it is impossible to destroy the evidence that he had already recognized its validity. And we could not believe—even were it conceded that he had always refused to acknowledge the constitutionality of the law, yet the violation by the Executive of a law regularly enacted and not declared unconstitutional by the court, is the substitution of the President's will for the law of the land, and the intention must be inferred from the fact. The President is not above the law, and when a generally called a crime, but with a high misdemeanor in the discharge of political functions. Should he wrest a crime, he will not consequently be pursued with criminal prosecution; but the fact of his guilt will have been established, and the punishment has been committed. Indeed the case is very simple, and addresses itself to the commonsense of the whole country. Mr. SEWARD had already asked the people of the United States whether they would have Mr. JOHNSON for king; and we presume that the Senate will answer in their usage—"Decidedly not."

FELLOW-CITIZENS AT THE FRONT.

THE Montgomery Mail, in alluding to a late article in the Weekly upon affairs in Alabama, describes us as basely slaffdering the South, and every week picturing horrible lies to inflame voters in the North. It then demands to know we mean when we speak of our "faithful fellow-citizens in Alabama and elsewhere who are now 'at the front'?" It proceeds:

"Are they the 78,000 registered Southern men, the 600 Northern men who have come among us since the war, and the 20,000 negroes who stood by us at the late election, making in all 100,000 men, not to mention the 1,000 good men who were denied registration; or are his fellow-citizens those 1,800 who defended negroes who voted for the infamous Constitution and the 1000 white candidates for office?

It is not a very difficult question to answer. The political battle which is now engaged in Alabama and elsewhere is to determine the policy of reconstruction. Upon one side, both here in New York and there in Alabama, are those who believe that, as there is no authority under the Constitutional States can inflict civil government in Alabama but the United States, it is the duty of the United States to provide for its own security by not confiding the political power in the State entirely to those who sympathize with the Tuscaloosa Monitor, "We have no particular love of country now." Those who hold this view of reconstruction, whether white or black, we call our "faithful" fellow-citizens, because they are faithful to the principles of the Government and to common-sense, and because they have proved their fidelity during the war by resisting the rebellion. And when any of these citizens live in a State where their views or their color or their fidelity to the Union and National Government during the war make them peculiarly odious to a great multitude of their neighbors, so that they are incessantly denounced and injured in their business, and deprived of personal injury except for the presence of United States soldiers, we call them our fellow-citizens at the front.

There are others who insist that the political power in Alabama and elsewhere shall be at once committed to those whose feelings are fully expressed by the Tuscaloosa Monitor. It is a party which hates and ridicules the freedmen; a party of which the Southern leaders were the chief conspirators in the rebellion, and whose Northern leaders did what they could to perplex and defeat the efforts of the Government of the United States to save itself; a party whose adherents in Alabama and other Southern States fiercely pursue with ribaldry and hostility men who were known not to favor the rebellion during the war, and who approve the policy of the representatives of the people now that the war is ended; a party which in Alabama sneers bitterly at the idea of the equal rights of every citizen before the laws; and which, by every kind of insult to those whom it calls Yankees, fosters a malignant hatred of other parts of the country. It is a party which secretly honors WILKES BOOTH, and one of whose organs in Alabama as lately as the 25th of March frankly urges a counter-revolution. "The people about Hickman," it says, "are beginning to see the importance of riding the community of political skulkers, and some of the young men were so well pleased with our account of the 'doings' of the 'Ku-Klux Klans' elsewhere, that they avowed their purpose to at once form themselves into a company of these hypothetical ghosts. So, ere long, we expect to hear that the nigger-vicegerent STEPHENS and the cotton-thief LAWRENCE, besides many other notorious scalawags, are disposed of by lynch law in a manner agreeable to their crimes."

It may be very natural for baffled ruffians to print such stuff, but its effect upon ignorant and prejudiced minds is very calculable. And those who think and talk thus, wherever they live and of whatever color they may be, do not call our faithful fellow-citizens. They are unfaithful to humanity-nature, to civilization, to the American principle, and to the best international pacification. We assure the Montgomery Mail that we have not the least hostility to any section of the country, or to any class of the population. How the great question will be settled no man can say; but we can equally assure the Mail that the good sense of the American people will never abandon the colored population of the Southern States, in which they are probably two-fifths of the whole people, to those who are feeling toward them as expressed by such a paragraph as we have quoted and by the following. We do not say that all "Conservatives" would express themselves in so absurd and vulgar a manner, but the animus of this paragraph is the animus of the resolutions of every "Conservative" Convention held in the Southern States.

"A BURNING SHAME!

"It is a fact that the agent for Freedmen in this city—Mr. Bell—has received orders from Washington to issue rations to all of those worthless negroes who were discharged from service by their employers on account of voting for the putrid Constitution. What better evidence of the utter corruptness of the miserable party in power over the South could be adduced! In the history of demagogy nothing has ever transpired approximating in infamy this military order! The poor whites of the country are to be taxed—bled of all their little earnings—in order to fatten the vagabondish negroes, who have proved themselves to be base and cowardly enough to swear, like Jack, in favor of measures conflicting with every interest of the white men! Think of this, white men, and blushing at your own shame and at so foul a blot on Yankees, Southern deserters, and stinking niggers! Yankees, Southern deserters, and stinking niggers! Yankees not, but not, humble not!"

CONNECTICUT.

THE Democrats have secured a Governor for a year in Connecticut, and the Republicans a United States Senator for six years. It is not a result by which any true Republican will be very much grieved. And the figures of a Senator shows that the great mass of the citizens outside the great centres of the more ignorant part of the population are still as true as ever were to the sound principles of the Government.

The city of New Haven is the chief mill at which immigrants are made voters in Connecticut, as the city of New York is in this State; and as the city of New York is the seat of the Democratic majority here, so New Haven is the majority for MR. ENGLISH in Connecticut. The result, which is called a great Democratic victory, is thus explained. The verdict of the intelligent voters in the State is recorded in the election of a Legislature that will send a stanch and true friend of national restoration upon the grounds of justice and equal rights.

SENATOR DIXON, who was one of the promoters of the Philadelphia Convention, who early joined the fortunes of President JOHNSON, and has since zealously co-operated with the Democrats in the endeavor to commit the Southern States to the political control of the late rebels, will now be forbidden by Connecticut to serve her any longer. No one has the least right to question the sincerity of his political action; but the end of his public career shows how entirely he has misrepresented the intelligent opinion of his State.

We had hoped that all our candidates would be elected. But the result is any thing but disheartening, and next November the same conviction which has now secured a Senator will unquestionably give the State to a President of the same principles.

NATIONALISM.

DR. FRANCIS LIEBER, one of our profoundest students of political philosophy and history, makes the following concise and admirable statement of the political development of the present epoch, of which our recent circumstances and our immediate situation are a striking illustration. DR. LIEBER calls it "a fragment," but it is really a summary:

"As the City-State was the normal type of free communities in antiquity, and as the Feudal System was one of the normal types of government in the middle ages, so is the National Polity the normal type of our own epoch: not indeed Centralism.

"Large nations have been formed out of the fragmentary peoples on the continent of Europe, England thousand years back; others are in the act of forming; others, already existing, are carrying out more distinctly or establishing more firmly the national elements of their politics. Self-government, and hence the existence of many nations deeply influences our Civilization. Self-government will be called the National Period. It began plainly when, in many other countries, it began—in the middle of the 16th century, but the process of Nationalization concerning the languages and the literature of the different countries commenced at an earlier time.

"The three main characteristics of the political development which mark the modern epoch, are:

"The National Polity;

"The general endeavor to define more clearly, and to extend more widely, Human Rights and Civil Liberty;

"And the decree which has gone forth that many Leading Nations shall flourish at once and the same time, plainly distinguishing them from each other, yet striving together, with one Public Opinion, under the recognized Public Law of Nations and in the bonds of one common moving Civilization.

"The Universal Monarchy, whether purely political or ecclesiastical, or the Universal Leading Nation—the predominance of petty sovereigns; a universal union, under one spot, or one portion of the globe—all these are obsolete. Universality is the result of advanced civilization; and attempts at their renewal are vain one."

In ancient times one people always swayed and led. Hence the simplicity of chronologic tables preserved in the memory of mankind; and all ancient States were short-lived. Once declining they never recovered. Their course was that of the projectile, ascending—ascending—and then descending, and no more rising. Modern nations are long-lived, and possess recuperative energy, wholly unknown to antiquity. They could neither be the one, nor possess the other without national existence and comprehensive politics, and without the Law of Nations, as we know it now, which is the manly child of Modern Government or Civilization.

"The original nations have come to form a community under the restraint and protection of the Law of Nations which rests upon distinct ideas and the chariot of civilization abreast as the ancient steeds drew the car of victory."

STATE AID TO PRIVATE INTERESTS.

IN the late Constitutional Convention of this State the Finance Committee reported a positive prohibition of all grants of money or credit to any individual, corporation, or association, except for educational and charitable purposes. The proposition led to a very long and very lively debate, which was renewed at every opportunity, and it was finally modified to the form in which it now stands in the Constitution of the State:

"The credit of the State shall not be given or loaned to or in aid of any individual, corporation, or association." This, of course, allows the continuance of the system by which the Legislature has lately offered an illustration. The Assembly, by a vote of 74 to 35, has given money to the Erie Railway, in the form of a petition, "to facilitate the construction," and "to aid in the construction" of four railroads.

The general argument of the friends of this system of State aid is, that it develops the unsettled and remoter parts of the State, opens areas of industry for the advantage of the State, and increases the value of the taxable property of the State. In short, they insist that it is money loaned by the State for its own benefit. The friends of the Constitution in the Convention warmly declared that the adverse arguments were precisely those that were urged against the project of the Erie Canal; and had they prevailed then how lamentable it would have been for the State! Moreover it was unfair, they insisted, for those whose neighborhoods had enjoyed all the benefits of the generous policy now to depress with their visionary theories those parts of the State which had had no such advantage.

On the other hand, it was contended that the State ought not to build railroads; that it was not a capitalist nor a speculator, but had certain very precisely defined functions limited to securing justice among the citizens and equal freedom of individual action. It was further urged that even if it should be granted that the State might use its money for any such improvement it should only be upon condition that it actually controlled the enterprise; but in the cases contemplated it is money of the State given to individuals—in other words, money taken from all for the benefit of the few. Besides this, the great general principle was invoked, that if an enterprise of the kind be really profitable it will be undertaken by private persons, but if not profitable private persons have no right to entangle the State in losses.

The general argument of the opponents of State aid is undoubtedly correct, but for various reasons it failed finally to determine the action of the Convention. There are many other considerations also which have great weight. The system inevitably leads to what is called log-rolling, or you-tickle-me-and-I'll-tickle-you legislation. If Tom will vote for Ned's railroad Ned will vote for Tom's. This is a peril indeed to which all legislation is exposed, but it is peculiarly threatening when the immense interests of corporations are involved. So with bribery. Railroad companies can afford to pay enormous sums of money to achieve such objects, and they are reported sometimes as actually paying them. Indeed the intrigues to secure grants of money from the State by any private purpose whatever are the chief sources of legislative corruption. A shrewd Republican member, speaking of the bill to allow Evening Journal, who has watched the proceedings of the present Assembly with its Democratic majority, "which contains in its short body protestations of retrenchment and reform, declared that for a reasonable compensation he would agree to get through an appropriation of two hundred and fifty thousand dollars to aid the farmers of Genesee, Niagara, and Orleans [Democratic counties]. We are sorry that the Convention did not reach a different conclusion. There are cases, indeed, in which the operation of a stringent rule is very hard, but if there must be a rule expressed, as in a written Constitution, it should be framed upon experience and reason, both of which point to its prohibition.

It is not surprising that the refusal of the Convention to hold a close hand upon the State treasury should have emboldened the Legislature, even at this time when the most rigid economy is essential, to be generous with the public money. Indeed it is so easy to be lavish of other people's money as it is to be resigned to their misfortunes. So evidently thinks the Governor, who has vetoed the grant of $250,000 to the Whitehall and Plattsburgh Road.

A WORD TO THE "OBFUSCATED."

THERE has been a great deal said of a phrase of MR. THADDEUS STEVENS'S to the effect that Congress was acting "outside of the Constitution," and of the proceedings in Philadelphia as Presidential dictation of the conditions of voting in States, quotes the letter in which the expression first occurs. MR. STEVENS, who, although he has differed in many of his opinions, is always fully able to explain them beyond misunderstanding, lately stated in the House what he meant by the words which have been so frequently in speaking of the admission of West Virginia he said:

"I voted for the admission of that State. But I was not going to vote for a State of a large area of myself, and to say that I voted for it under the Constitution, or that I did not know what I was voting for. I held that the Constitution had not long conquered that territory from another power, a power recognized as an independent belligerent by all the sovereign nations of the earth, by all nations as well as others, we had a right to treat it as such, and to take it in or keep it out as we pleased. I knew that the Constitution had nothing to do with it; but I would inform my learned friends from the bushes (laughter) that while I speak of being outside of the Constitution, I do not mean that the Constitution does not recognize the law of nations. It does recognize the law of nations, and the law of nations recognizes the right of the sovereign ing power to do with conquered territory just as it pleases. I trust I shall hear nothing more after this explanation from my obfuscated friends who have often seemed so ignorant of what I meant or of what they were talking about. (Laughter.)"

GENERAL GRANT AND CALUMNY.

THE preference of the New York Tribune for Chief Justice CHASE as a Presidential candidate has been more than once warmly declared by that journal, and we protest against its late assault upon General GRANT, who is also very likely to be proposed as a candidate. Possibly it was not intended as an assault, but whatever the intention, it was the gravest aspersion of the General, an insult to the Senate, and could have no other than a most damaging influence upon the Tribune's own party.

The President of the United States is impeached, and the Senate, with the utmost dignity is sitting as the court to judge him, when the Tribune, in a double-leaded paragraph at the head of its columns, prints these extraordinary words:

"We have assurances from Washington that General GRANT finds it not inconsistent with his duty as a soldier to announce it to his opinion that the only hope for the peace of the country is the success of the impending impeachment trial. He feels that national security demands the removal of the President. If the trial should fail, the people can only expect new assumptions of power, and a more determined resistance to law. When the General of our Armies entertains this conviction there is no room for doubt as to the duty of the Senate. The loyal nation demands the President's removal."

That is to say, the Tribune thinks it to be the duty of the Senate to do what the General of the army thinks ought to be done. And upon this the General as formally and publicly announcing his opinion in order that the Senate may govern itself accordingly!

Nothing could show more clearly the inordinate folly which General GRANT has upon the respect and perfect confidence of his countrymen than the fact that every man instinctively knew that he had authorized no such statement; and that while he has an equal right to his opinions with every other citizen, he has very probably have said what the best men in the country think, yet that it was under the sacred safeguard of private conversation, and could have been publicly reported to influence Senatorial action only by stupidity or malice.

WHICH IS WHICH?

A MISCHIEVOUS friend insists that the celebrated difference between tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee was never more significantly illustrated than at a late feast of the American Club in honor of the birthday of MR. WILLIAM M. TWEED, when, according to the report, "The Club then sat down to supper, the Vice-President taking the head of the table, with MR. TWEED on the right, and MR. T. WEED on the left."

MARSHALL'S GRANT.

MR. WILLIAM E. MARSHALL, whose portrait of CLEMENS was so faithful and remarkable, and whose engraving of STUART'S WASHINGTON is so much admired, has finished a portrait of General GRANT, which he has also engraved. The fine character of the head, and the expression of the face, in which a predominant truthfulness is so marked and winning, are reproduced with a force and fidelity that will necessarily make it the standard portrait of the General. It is a very satisfactory head, and will take its place with the gallery of portraits of eminent Americans as among the most characteristic for that sagacity, intelligence, tenacity, modesty, and moderation which are the best qualities of our best men.

LITERARY.

"THE Public Ledger Building" is the title of a unique and handsome little volume containing a full and graphic account, with illustrations, of the great building lately erected in Philadelphia by MR. GEORGE W. CHILDS, the proprietor of the journal known as the Public Ledger. The book, although many of the most conspicuous persons, especially of the guild of letters, in the country were invited, contains only a few commendatory notices. The reasons of those who could not attend make a very interesting part of the volume. The festival was a worthy commemoration of the daily enterprise, industry, and consequent success of the eminent publisher.

THE IMPEACHMENT TRIAL.

OUR engravings, illustrative of the great trial now going on at Washington, embrace portraits of three of the President's counsel; the Senate in Consultation in the Ladies' Parlor, adjoining the Senate Chamber; and a View of the Ladies' Gallery.

The counsel of the President consist of MESSRS. HENRY STANBERY, BENJAMIN R. CURTIS, WILLIAM M. EVARTS, T. A. R. NELSON, and Mr. GROESBECK, the latter of whom has been added since the commencement of the trial, in place of Judge BLACK, who declined to serve. Mr. STANBERY'S early career was confined to Ohio, and little was known of him until his appointment as Attorney-General by President JOHNSON. His success in that position was not great, and it was generally conceded that his opinions were marked more by partisan feeling than legal ability. He resigned his position as Attorney-General to defend the President.

MR. CURTIS is a native and resident of Massachusetts, where he has filled several legal positions; and he has much local reputation as a lawyer.

MR. EVARTS, who is doubtless the ablest lawyer retained on the President's side, has never held political office, but has devoted himself entirely to the practice of his profession, and is at the present time at the head of the bar of New York. At the same time he was not without political aspirations; and, as an orator, scholar, and public character generally, has been in a quiet way an influential and powerful member of the Republican party, though not a popular one with the masses. He was at one time an aspirant for the United States Senatorship from New York.

He was also an aspirant and a formidable rival of Mr. Secretary CHASE for the Chief Justiceship of the United States. So that, although he is neither an ex-judge, nor even an "honorable," he attracts deserved attention from his generally high position and his especial eminence as a great criminal lawyer. In person he is thin, wiry, and cadaverous. He has a clear, sharp, ringing voice, though it is not powerful or musical. His action is sparing but effective. In making his points he is lucid, precise, and cogent, seldom rhetorical or ornamental. He has an easy, colloquial way; he is never in haste, and never hesitates. He is an excellent extempore speaker, a sound commercial lawyer, and an advocate of great genius and resource.

During the progress of the trial the galleries of the Senate have presented a more brilliant appearance than has been known for many years. The most lovely as well as the most distinguished ladies of Washington have been in daily attendance, and the gallery devoted to them has presented the appearance of our sketch.

The opening speech on the part of the Managers was made by General B. F. BUTLER on October 30. He very learnedly discussed the right of the Senate as at present constituted to try the impeachment; the right of Senator WADE to participate; and quoted largely from the precedents. On the same day documentary evidence was introduced intended to answer any plea that Mr. JOHNSON is not President, but Vice-President, and therefore not liable to trial by the Senate as organized, and that Mr. STANTON was not appointed Secretary of War for the existing term. The first of these documents was the certified oath of office taken by Mr. JOHNSON to "faithfully execute the office of President of the United States." Subsequently witnesses were examined to prove that the President had signed commissions altered from the old printed form in order that they might conform to the Tenure-of-Office Bill, thereby recognizing its validity. It was also shown by several witnesses that General THOMAS, after being refused possession of the War Office, announced his intention to take possession by force. A large number of witnesses, principally reporters, were examined, to prove the accuracy of the reports of the speeches of the President, made in 1866. It was shown that one of these, which was most abusive of Congress, was corrected before going to the printers by the President's private secretary. The President in his answer to the charges says that he suspended Mr. STANTON indefinitely as authorized by the Constitution, and not in compliance with any requirements of the Tenure-of-Office Bill, thereby recognizing its validity. In refutation of this the Managers introduced a letter from the President notifying Secretary MCCULLOCH of the suspension of Mr. STANTON in compliance with the requirements of this very Act.

CHAPTER III.

CONSIDERATION for poor Lady Verinder forbade me even to hint that I had guessed the melancholy truth before she opened her lips. I waited her pleasure in silence; and, having privately arranged to say a few sustaining words at the first convenient opportunity, felt prepared for any duty that could claim me, no matter how painful it might be.

"I have been seriously ill, Drusilla, for some time past," my aunt began. "And strange to say, without knowing it myself."

I thought of the thousands on thousands of perishing human creatures who were all at that moment spiritually ill, without knowing it themselves. And I greatly feared that my poor aunt might be one of the number. "Yes, dear," I said, sadly.

"I brought Rachel to London, as you know, for medical advice," she went on. "I thought it right to consult two doctors."

Two doctors! And, oh, me (in Rachel's state), not one clergyman! "Yes, dear?" I said once more.

"One of the two medical men," proceeded my aunt, "was a stranger to me. The other had been an old friend of my husband's, and had always felt a sincere interest in me for my husband's sake. After prescribing for Rachel, he said he wished to speak to me privately in another room. I expected, of course, to receive some special directions for the management of my daughter's health. To my surprise, he took me gravely by the hand, and said, 'I have been looking at you, Lady Verinder, with a professional as well as a personal interest. You are, I am afraid, far more urgently in need of medical advice than your daughter.' He put some questions to me which I was at first inclined to treat lightly enough, until I observed that my answers distressed him. It ended in his making an appointment to come and see me, accompanied by a medical friend, on the next day, at an hour when Rachel would not be at home. The result of that visit—most kindly and gently conveyed to me—satisfied both the physicians that there had been precious time lost which could never be regained, and that my case had now passed beyond the reach of their art. For more than two years I have been suffering under an insidious form of heart disease, which, without any symptoms to alarm me, has, by little and little, fatally broken me down. I may live for some months, or I may die before another day has passed over my head—the doctors can not, and dare not, speak more positively than this. It would be vain to say, my dear, that I have not had some miserable moments since my real situation has been made known to me. But I am more resigned than I was, and I am doing my best to set my worldly affairs in order. My one great anxiety is that Rachel should be kept in ignorance of the truth. If she knew it, she would at once reproach my broken health to anxiety about the Diamond, and would reproach herself bitterly, poor child, for what is in no sense her fault. Both the doctors agree that the mischief began two, if not three years since. I am sure you will keep my secret, Drusilla—for I am sure I see sincere sorrow and sympathy for me in your face."

Sorrow and sympathy! Oh, what Pagan emotions to expect from a Christian Englishwoman anchored firmly on her faith!

Little did my poor aunt imagine what a gush of devout thankfulness thrilled through me as she approached the close of her melancholy story. Here was a career of usefulness opened before me! Here was a beloved relative and perishing fellow-creature, on the eve of the great change, utterly unprepared; and lied, providentially, only to reveal her situation to Me! How can I describe the joy with which I now remembered that the precious clerical friends on whom I could rely were to be counted, not by ones or twos, but by tens and twenties! I took my aunt in my arms—my overflowing tenderness was not to be satisfied now with any thing less than an embrace. "Oh!" I said to her, fervently, "the indescribable interest with which you inspire me! Oh! the good I mean to do you, dear, before we part!" Before another word or two of earnest prefatory warning, I gave her her choice of three precious friends, all plying the work of mercy from morning to night in her own neighborhood, all equally inexhaustible in exhortation; all affectionately ready to exercise their gifts at a word from me. Alas! the result was far from encouraging. Poor Lady Verinder looked puzzled and frightened, and met every thing I could say to her with the purely worldly objection that she was not strong enough to face strangers. I yielded—for the moment only, of course. My large experience (as Reader and Visitor, under sentence, first and last, from fourteen beloved clerical friends) informed me that this was another case for preparation by books. I possessed a little library of works, all suitable to the present emergency, all tinged to arouse, convert, prepare, enlighten, and fortify my aunt. "You will read, dear, won't you?" I said, in my most winning way. "You will read, I bring you my own precious books? Turned down at all the right places, aunt. And marked in pencil where you are to stop and ask yourself, 'Does this apply to me?' Even that simple appeal—so absolutely heathenizing is the influence of the world—appeared to startle my aunt. "Well, well," I said to that I can, Drusilla, to please you," with a look of surprise, which was at once instructive and terrible to see. Not a moment was to be lost. The clock on the mantle-piece informed me that I had just time to hurry home, to provide myself with a first series of selected readings (say a dozen only), and to return time to meet the lawyer, and witness Lady Verinder's Will. Promising faithfully to be back by five o'clock, I left the house on my errand of mercy.

When no interests but my own are involved, I am humbly content to get from place to place by the omnibus. Permit me to give an idea of my devotion to my aunt's interests by recording that, on this occasion, I committed the prodigality of taking a cab.

I drove home, selected and marked my first series of readings, and drove back to Montagu Square with a dozen works in a carpet-bag, the like of which, I firmly believe, are not to be found in the literature of any other country in Europe. I paid the cabman exactly his fare. He touched his hat with an oath; upon which I instantly gave him a tract. If I had presented a pistol at his head this abandoned wretch could hardly have exhibited greater consternation. He jumped up on his box, and, with profane exclamations of dismay, drove off furiously. Quite pleased, I am happy to say! I sowed the good seed, in spite of him, by throwing a second tract in at the window of—

The one person who answered the door—not the person with the cap-ribbons, to my great relief, but the footman—informed me that the doctor had called, and was still closeted with Lady Verinder. Mr. Bruff, the lawyer, had arrived a minute since, and was waiting in the library. He showed me into the library to wait too.

Mr. Bruff looked surprised to see me. He is the family solicitor, and we had met more than once, on previous occasions, under Lady Verinder's roof. A man, I grieve to say, grown old and grizzled in the service of the world. A man who, in the hours of business, was the closest prophet of Law and Mammon; and who, in his hours of leisure, was equally capable of reading a novel and of tearing up a tract.

"Have you come to stay here, Miss Clack?" he asked, with a look at my carpet-bag.

To reveal the contents of my precious bag to such a person as this would have been simply to invite an outburst of profanity. I lowered myself to his own worldly level as I mentioned my business in the house.

"My aunt has informed me that she is about to sign her Will," I answered. "She has been so good as to ask me to be one of the witnesses."

"Ay? ay? ay? Well, Miss Clack, you will do. You are over twenty-one, and you have not the slightest pecuniary interest in Lady Verinder's Will."

Not the slightest pecuniary interest in Lady Verinder's Will. Oh, how thankful I felt when I heard that! In my aunt, possessed of thousands, had remembered poor Me, to whom five pounds is an object—if my name had appeared in the Will, with a little comforting legacy attached to it—my enemies might have doubted the motive which had loaded me with the choicest treasures of my library, and had drawn upon my failing resources for the prodigal expenses of a cab. Not the cruelest scoffer of them all could doubt now. Much better as it was! Oh, surely, surely, much better as it was!

I was aroused from these consoling reflections by the voice of Mr. Bruff. My meditative silence appeared to weigh upon the spirits of this worldling, and to force him, as it were, into talking to me against his own will.

"Well, Miss Clack, what's the last news in the charitable circles? How is your friend Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite, after the mauling he got from the rogues in Northumberland Street? Equal! they're telling a pretty story about that charitable gentleman at my club?"

I had passed over the manner in which this person had mentioned that I was more than twenty-one, and that I had no pecuniary interest in my aunt's Will. But the tone in which he alluded to dear Mr. Godfrey was too much for my forbearance. Feeling bound, after what had passed in my presence that afternoon, to assert the innocence of my admirable friend, whenever I found it called in question—I owe to having also felt bound to include in the accomplishment of this righteous purpose a stinging castigation in the case of Mr. Bruff.

"I live very much out of the world," I said; "and I don't possess the advantage, Sir, of belonging to a club. But I happen to know the story to which you allude; and I also know that a wilder falsehood than that story never was told."

"Yes, yes, Miss Clack—you believe in your friend. Natural enough. Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite won't find the world in general quite so easy to convince as a committee of charitable ladies. Appearances are dead against him. He was in the house when the Diamond was lost. And he was the first person in the house to go to London afterward. Those are ugly circumstances, ma'am, viewed by the light of later events."

I ought, I know, to have set him right on the matter of my friend's standing in connection with the Indians, and to have appealed to his knowledge of the testimony to Mr. Godfrey's innocence, offered by the only person who was undeniably competent to speak from a positive knowledge of the subject. Alas! the temptation to lead the lawyer artfully on to his own discomfiture was too much for me. I asked what he meant by "later events"—with an appearance of the utmost innocence.

"By later events, Miss Clack, I mean events in which the Indians are concerned," proceeded Mr. Bruff, getting more and more superior to poor Me the longer he went on. "What do the Indians do the moment they are let out of the prison at Frizinghall? They go straight to London and fix on Mr. Luker. What does Mr. Luker say when he first applies to the magistrates for protection? He owns to suspecting a foreign workman in his establishment of collusion with the Indians. Can there be plainer moral evidence, so far, that the rogues had found an accomplice among the persons in Mr. Luker's employment, and that they knew the Moonstone to be in Mr. Luker's house? Very well. What follows? Mr. Luker feels alarmed (and with good reason) for the safety of the jewel which he has got in pledge. He lodges it privately (under a general description) in his bankers' strong-room. Wonderfully clever of him; but the Indians are just as clever on their side. They have their suspicions that the Diamond is being shifted from one place to another; and they hit on a singularly bold and complete way of clearing those suspicions up. Whom do they seize and search? Not Mr. Luker only—which would be intelligible enough—but Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite as well. Why? Mr. Ablewhite's explanation is, that they acted on blind suspicion, after seeing him accidentally speaking to Mr. Luker. Absurd! Had the Indians other people spoke to Mr. Luker that morning. Why were they not followed home too, and decoyed into the trap? No! no! The plain inference is, that Mr. Ablewhite had his private interest in the Moonstone as well as Mr. Luker, and that the Indians were so uncertain as to which of the two had the deposit of the jewel that there was no alternative but to search them both. Public opinion says that, Miss Clack——" And public opinion, on this occasion, is not easily refuted."

He said those last words looking so wonderfully wise in his own worldly conceit that I really (to my shame be it spoken) could not resist heading him on a little further still before I overwhelmed him with the truth.

"I don't presume to argue with a clever lawyer like you," I said. "But is it quite fair, Sir, to Mr. Ablewhite to pass over the opinion of the famous London police-officer who investigated this case? And the shadow of a suspicion rested on any body but Miss Verinder, in the mind of Sergeant Cuff."

"Do you mean to tell me, Miss Clack, that you agree with the Sergeant?"

"I judge nobody, Sir, and I offer no opinion."

"And I commit both those enormities, ma'am. I judge the Sergeant to have been utterly wrong; and I offer the opinion that, if he had known Rachel's character as I know it, he would have suspected every body in the house before he suspected her. I admit that she has her faults—she is secret, and self-willed; odd, and wild, and unlike other girls of her age. But true as steel, and high-minded and generous to a fault. If the plainest evidence in the world pointed one way, and if nothing but Rachel's word of honor pointed the other, I would take her word before the evidence, lawyer as I am! Strong language, Miss Clack; but I mean it."

"Would you object to illustrate your meaning, Mr. Bruff, so that I may be sure I understand it? Suppose you found Miss Verinder quite unaccountably interested in what has happened to Mr. Ablewhite and Mr. Luker—I mean unfavorable agitation when she found out the turn it was taking?"

"Suppose any thing you please, Miss Clack, it wouldn't shake my belief in Rachel Verinder by a hair's-breadth."

"She is so absolutely to be relied on as that?"

"So absolutely to be relied on as that."

"Then permit me to inform you, Mr. Bruff, that Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite was in this house not two hours since, and that his entire innocence of all concern in the disappearance of the Moonstone was proclaimed by Miss Verinder herself, in the strongest language I ever heard used by a young lady in my life."

I enjoyed the triumph—the unholy triumph, I fear, I must admit—of seeing Mr. Bruff utterly confounded and overthrown by a few plain words from Me. He started to his feet and stared at me in silence. I kept my seat, undisturbed, and related the whole scene exactly as it had occurred. "And what do you say about Mr. Ablewhite now?" I asked, with the utmost possible gentleness, as soon as I had done.

"YOU ARE NOT SO GOOD A LAWYER, MISS CLACK, AS I SUPPOSED."

"If Rachel has testified to his innocence, Miss Clack, I don't scruple to say that I believe in his innocence as firmly as you do. I have been misled by appearances, like the rest of the world; and I will make the best atonement I can, by publicly contradicting the scandal which has assailed your friend wherever I meet with it. In the mean time, allow me to congratulate you on the masterly manner in which you have opened the full fire of your batteries on me at the moment when I least expected it. You would have done great things in my profession, ma'am, if you had happened to be a man."

With those words he turned away from me, and began walking irritably up and down the room.

I could see plainly that the new light I had thrown on the subject had greatly surprised and disturbed him. Certain expressions dropped from his lips as he became more and more absorbed in his own thoughts, which suggested to my mind the abominable view that he had hitherto taken of the mystery of the lost Moonstone. He had not scrupled to suspect dear Mr. Godfrey of the infamy of taking the Diamond, and to attribute Rachel's conduct to a generous resolution to conceal the crime. On Miss Verinder's own authority—a perfectly unassailable authority, as you are aware, in the estimation of Mr. Bruff—that explanation of the circumstances was now shown to be utterly wrong. The perplexity into which I had plunged this high legal authority was so overwhelming that he was quite unable to conceal it from notice. "What a case!" I heard him say to himself, stopping at the window in his walk, and drumming on the glass with his fingers. "It not only defies explanation, it's even beyond conjecture!"

There was nothing in those words which made any reply at all needful on my part—and yet I answered them! It seems hardly credible that I should not have been able to let Mr. Bruff alone, even now. It seems almost beyond mere mortal perversity that I should have discovered, in what he had just said, a new opportunity of making myself personally disagreeable to him. But—ah, my friends! nothing is beyond mortal perversity; and any thing is credible when our fallen natures get the better of us!

"Pardon me for intruding on your reflections," I said to the unsuspecting Mr. Bruff. "But surely there is a conjecture to make which has not occurred to us yet?"

"Maybe, Miss Clack. I own I don't know what it is."

"Before I was so fortunate, Sir, as to convince you of Mr. Ablewhite's innocence, you mentioned it as one of the reasons for suspecting him that he was in the house at the time when the at the time when the Diamond was [illegible] remind you

The old worldling left the window, took a chair exactly opposite to mine, and looked at me steadily, with a hard and vicious smile.

"You are not so good a lawyer, Miss Clack," he remarked, in a meditative manner, "as I supposed. You don't know how to let well alone."

"I am afraid I fail to follow you, Mr. Bruff," I said, modestly.

"It won't do, Miss Clack—it really won't do a second time. Franklin Blake is a prime favorite of mine, as you are well aware. But that doesn't matter. I'll adopt your view, on this occasion, before you have time to turn round on me. You're quite right, ma'am. I have suspected Mr. Ablewhite, on grounds which abstractedly justify suspecting Mr. Blake too. Very good—let's suspect him together. It's quite in his character, we will say, to be capable of stealing the Moonstone. The only question is, whether it was his interest to do it."

"Mr. Franklin Blake's debts," I remarked, "are matters of family notoriety."

"And Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite's debts have not arrived at that stage of development yet. Quite true. But there happen to be two difficulties in the way of your theory, Miss Clack. I manage Franklin Blake's affairs, and I beg to inform you that the vast majority of his creditors (knowing his father to be a rich man) are quite content to charge interest on their debts, and to wait for their money. There is the first difficulty—which is tough enough. You will find the second tougher still. I have it on the authority of Lady Verinder herself, that her daughter was ready to marry Franklin Blake, before that infernal Indian Diamond disappeared from the house. She had drawn him on and put him off again, with the coquetry of a young girl. But she had confessed to her mother that she loved cousin Franklin, and her mother had trusted cousin Franklin with the secret. So there he was, Miss Clack, with his creditors content to wait, and with the certain prospect before him of marrying an heiress. By all means consider him a scoundrel; but tell me, if you please, why he should steal the Moonstone?"

"The human heart is unsearchable," I said gently. "Who is to fathom it?"

"In other words, ma'am—though he hadn't the shadow of a reason for taking the Diamond—he might have taken it, nevertheless, through natural depravity. Very well. Say he did. Why the devil—?"

"I beg your pardon, Mr. Bruff. If I hear the devil referred to in that manner, I must leave the room."

"I beg your pardon, Miss Clack—I'll be more careful in my choice of language for the future. All I meant to ask was this. Why—even supposing he did take the Diamond—should Franklin Blake make imself the most prominent person in the house, in trying to recover it? You may tell me he cunningly did that to divert suspicion from himself. I answer that he had no need to divert suspicion—because nobody suspected him. He first steals the Moonstone (without the slightest reason) through natural depravity; and he then acts a part, in relation to the loss of the jewel, which there is not the slightest necessity to act, and which leads to his mortally offending the young lady who would otherwise have married him. That is the monstrous proposition which you are driven to assert, if you attempt to associate the disappearance of the Moonstone with Franklin Blake. No, no, Miss Clack! After what has passed here to-day, between us two, the dead-lock in this case is complete. Rachel's own innocence is (as her mother knows, and as I know) beyond a doubt. Mr. Ablewhite's innocence is equally certain—or Rachel would never have testified to it. And Franklin Blake's innocence, as you have just seen, unanswerably asserts itself. On the one hand, we are morally certain of all these things. And, on the other hand, we are equally sure that somebody has brought the Moonstone to London, and that Mr. Luker, or his banker, is in private possession of it at this moment. What is the use of my experience, what is the use of any person's experience, in such a case as that? It baffles me; it baffles you; it baffles every body."

No—not every body. It had not baffled Sergeant Cuff. I was about to mention this with all possible mildness, and with every necessary protest against being supposed to cast a slur upon Rachel—when the servant came in to say that the doctor had gone, and that my aunt was waiting to receive us.

This stopped the discussion. Mr. Bruff collected his papers, looking a little exhausted by the demands which our conversation had made on him. I took up my bag-full of precious publications, feeling as if I could have gone on talking for hours. We proceeded in silence to Lady Verinder's room.

Permit me to add here, before my narrative advances to other events, that I have not described what passed between the lawyer and me without having a definite object in view. I am ordered to include in my contribution to the shocking story of the Moonstone a plain disclosure not only of the turn which suspicion took, but even of the names of the persons on whom suspicion rested at the time when the Indian Diamond was known to be in London. A report of my conversation in the library with Mr. Bruff appeared to me to be exactly what was wanted to answer this purpose—while, at the same time, it possessed the great moral advantage of rendering a sacrifice of sinful self-esteem essentially necessary on my part. I have been obliged to acknowledge that my fallen nature got the better of me. In making that humiliating confession I get the better of my fallen nature. The moral balance is restored; the spiritual atmosphere feels clear once more. Dear [illegible] we may go on again.

CHAPTER IV.

THE signing of the Will was a much shorter matter than I had anticipated. It was hurried over, to my thinking, in indecent haste. Samuel, the footman, was sent for to act as second witness—and the pen was put at once into my aunt's hand. I felt strongly urged to say a few appropriate words on this solemn occasion. But Mr. Bruff's manner convinced me that it was wisest to check the impulse while he was in the room. In less than two minutes it was all over—and Samuel (unbenefited by what I might have said) had gone down stairs again.

Mr. Bruff folded up the Will, and then looked my way; apparently wondering whether I did, or did not, mean to leave him alone with my aunt. I had my mission of mercy to fulfill, and my bag of precious publications ready on my lap. He might as well have expected to move St. Paul's Cathedral by looking at it as to move Me. There was one merit about him (due no doubt to his worldly training) which I have no wish to deny. He was quick at seeing things. I appeared to produce almost the same impression on him which I had produced on the cabman. He too uttered a profane expression, and withdrew in a violent hurry, and left me mistress of the field.

As soon as we were alone my aunt reclined on the sofa, and then alluded, with some appearance of confusion, to the subject of her Will.

"I hope you won't think yourself neglected, Drusilla," she said. "I mean to give you your little legacy, my dear, with my own hand."

Here was a golden opportunity! I seized it on the spot. In other words, I instantly opened my bag and took out the top publication. It proved to be an early edition—only the twenty-fifth—of the famous anonymous work (believed to be by precious Miss Bellows), entitled "The Serpent at Home." The design of the book—with which the worldly reader may not be acquainted—is to show how the Evil One lies in wait for us in all the most apparently innocent actions of our daily lives. The chapters best adapted to female perusal are, "Satan in the Hair-Brush;" "Satan behind the Looking-Glass;" "Satan under the Tea-Table;" "Satan out of the Window"—and many others.

"Give your attention, dear aunt, to this precious book—and you will give me all I ask." With those words, I handed it to her open, at a marked passage—one continuous burst of burning eloquence! Subject: Satan among the Sofa-Cushions.

Poor Lady Verinder (reclining thoughtlessly on her own sofa-cushions) glanced at the book, and handed it back to me looking more confused than ever.

"I'm afraid, Drusilla," she said, "I must wait till I am a little better, before I can read that. The doctor—"

The moment she mentioned the doctor's name I knew what was coming. Over and over again, in my past experience among my perishing fellow-creatures, the members of the notoriously infidel profession of Medicine had stepped between me and my mission of mercy—on the miserable pretense that the patient wanted quiet, and that the disturbing influence of all others which they most dreaded, was the influence of Miss Clack and her Books. Precisely the same blinded materialism (working treacherously behind my back) now sought to rob me of the only right of property that my poverty could claim—my right of spiritual property in my perishing aunt.

"The doctor tells me," my poor misguided relative went on, "that I am not so well to-day. He forbids me to see any strangers; and he orders me, if I read at all, only to read the lightest and the most amusing books. 'Do nothing, Lady Verinder, to weary your head, or to quicken your pulse'—those were his last words, Drusilla, when he left me to-day."

There was no help for it but to yield again—for the moment only, as before. Any open assertion of the infinitely superior importance of such a ministry as mine, compared with the ministry of the medical man, would only have provoked the doctor to practice on the human weakness of his patient, and to threaten to throw up the case. Happily, there are more ways than one of sowing the good seed, and few persons are better versed in those ways than myself.

"You might feel stronger, dear, in an hour or two," I said. "Or you might wake to-morrow morning with a sense of something wanting, and even this unpretending volume might be able to supply it. You will let me leave the book, aunt? The doctor can hardly object to that!"

I slipped it under the sofa-cushions, half in, half out, close by her handkerchief and smelling-bottle. Every time her hand searched for either of these it would touch the book; and, sooner or later (who knows?), the book might touch her. After making this arrangement, I thought it wise to withdraw. "Let me leave you to repose, dear aunt; I will call again to-morrow." I looked accidentally toward the window as I said that. It was full of flowers, in boxes and pots. Lady Verinder was extravagantly fond of these perishable treasures, and had a habit of rising every now and then, and going to look at them and smell them. A new idea flashed across my mind. "Oh! may I take a flower?" I said—and got to the window, unsuspected, in that way. Instead of taking away a flower I added one, in the shape of another book from my bag, which I left to surprise my aunt, among the geraniums and roses. The happy thought followed, "Why not do the same for her, poor dear, in every other room that she enters?" I immediately said good-by; and, crossing the hall, slipped into the library. Samuel, coming up to let me out, and supposing I had gone, went down stairs again. On the library table I noticed two of the "amusing books" which the [illegible] ered them from sight with two of my own precious publications. In the breakfast-room I found my aunt's favorite canary singing in his cage. She was always in the habit of feeding the bird herself. Some groundsel was strewed on a table which stood immediately under the cage. I put a book among the groundsel. In the drawing-room I found more cheering opportunities of emptying my bag. My aunt's favorite musical pieces were on the piano. I slipped in two more books among the music. I disposed of another in the back drawing-room, under some unfinished embroidery, which I knew to be of Lady Verinder's working. A third little room opened out of the back drawing-room, from which it was shut off by a curtain instead of a door. My aunt's plain old-fashioned fan was on the chimney-piece. I opened my ninth book at a very special passage, and put the fan in as a marker, to keep the place. The question then came, whether I should go higher still, and try the bedroom floor—at the risk, undoubtedly, of being insulted, if the person with the cap-ribbons happened to be in the upper regions of the house, and to find me out. But oh, what of that? It is a poor Christian that is afraid of being insulted. I went up stairs, prepared to bear any thing. All was silent and solitary—it was the servants' tea-time, I suppose. My aunt's room was in front. The miniature of my late dear uncle, Sir John, hung on the wall opposite the bed. It seemed to smile at me; it seemed to say "Drusilla! deposit a book." There were tables on either side of my aunt's bed. She was a bad sleeper, and wanted, or thought she wanted, many things at night. I put a book near the matches on one side, and a book under the box of chocolate drops on the other. Whether she wanted a light, or whether she wanted a drop, there was a precious publication to meet her eye, or to meet her hand, and to say with silent eloquence, in either case, "Come, try me! try me!" But one book was now left at the bottom of my bag, and but one apartment was still unexplored—the bath-room, which opened out of the bedroom. I peeped in; and the holy inner voice that never deceives whispered to me, "You have met her, Drusilla, every where else; meet her at the bath, and the work is done." I observed a dressing-gown thrown across a chair. It had a pocket in it, and in that pocket I put my last book. Can words express my exquisite sense of duty done, when I had slipped out of the house, unsuspected by any of them, and when I found myself in the street with my empty bag under my arm? Oh, my worldly friends, pursuing the phantom, Pleasure, through the guilty mazes of Dissipation, how easy it is to be happy, if you will only be good!

When I folded up my things that night—when I reflected on the true riches which I had scattered with such a lavish hand, from top to bottom of the house of my wealthy aunt—I declare I felt as free from all anxiety as if I had been a child again. I was so light-hearted that I sang a verse of the Evening Hymn. I was so light-hearted that I fell asleep before I could sing another. Quite like a child again! quite like a child again!

So I passed that blissful night. On rising the next morning how young I felt! I might add, how young I looked, if I were capable of dwelling on the concerns of my own perishable body. But I am not capable—and I add nothing.

Toward luncheon-time—not for the sake of the creature-comforts, but for the certainty of finding dear aunt—I put on my bonnet to go to Montagu Square. Just as I was ready the maid at the lodgings in which I then lived put her head in at the door, and said, "Lady Verinder's servant, to see Miss Clack."

A WOMAN'S BOOK.*

BY MRS. DINAH MULOCK CRAIK.

AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN," ETC.

"WHAT?" lately said a certain young American, entering a London bookseller's shop, and laying his hand, a little contemptuously, on a newly-published volume—simple enough to look at, having on its plain green binding neither coronets nor coats of arms—nothing but a monogram, "V.A."—the entwined initials which we English used to see familiarly every where for so many years, and now see only there—"What! do you call that a Queen's book?"

"No," replied the bookseller, with an honest dignity, "we call it a woman's book."

And this is the true way in which to look at them, both the present and the previous volume, which go by the name of "the Queen's books," as if her Majesty were trying to place herself among the ranks—sparse and small—of royal authors. Not at all. The very name—"royal author"—is a double misnomer, especially with regard to the second work. The worthy bookseller—we would it were fair to give his honest name—was quite right. "Leaves from the Journal of our Life" is essentially a woman's book. There is little of "the Queen," and almost nothing of "the author" in it. They who look for either, but especially the last, will assuredly be disappointed—as disappointed as they might be, and would deserve to be, if in reading the home-letters of their wives and daughters they expected to find them Saturday Review essays or Times leading articles. Such a thing is not likely, nor would it redound much to the credit of the wife or daughter, if instead of being a simple woman, writing her natural home-letter, just as will please them all at home, she were to soar into grand literary composition, compiled, as some celebrated authors do their most familiar epistles—with an eye to posterity.

This, our Queen's book, is, in a sense, no book at all—only a letter. A General Epistle, as it were—addressed to all her people, who in some things have [illegible] and wronged her of late—opening to them her whole heart, and appealing to their good hearts to try and understand the depth of her sorrow by measuring it with what she now reveals to them of the high perfection of her vanished joy. This utter candor—this wonderful absence of reticence, under circumstances when a nature so essentially womanly would ordinarily grow reticent in the extreme—is of itself the strongest testimony in favor of the book, and the advisability, nay necessity, of publishing it. A woman, not less womanly than this royal lady, has said, speaking of grief:

> "Judge the length of the sword by the sheath's,
> By the silence of life, more pathetic than death's;"

and so it ordinarily is. But our Queen was in perfectly exceptional circumstances. She could not keep silence; her position did not allow it: and this was the only way in which she could speak.

It was becoming high time she should speak. The dissatisfied half of the nation were already murmuring against her very hard, bitter, and unjust things. And here, in their climax of dissatisfaction, appears this book, proving by its straightforward unconscious evidence—circumstantial evidence, the strongest of all—that every disloyal allegation was inherently and ludicrously false. That, so far from being absorbed in a morbid, selfish sorrow, there is probably not a woman in the three kingdoms more utterly unselfish, or more free from that most unpleasant form of egotism, self-consciousness, than her Majesty. That she is also a busy woman—fulfilling her countless duties, harder than any of us know, with earnest conscientiousness; a wise woman—ordering her household and family, and acquainted with all that happens therein; beloved by, and affectionately appreciating, every worthy servant of the crown, from the great Duke of Wellington to the Highland Gillie who runs along by her pony's side; that, so far from rejecting her people's love, and being careless of their sympathy, she is touchingly, sensitively eager for both. And now she has come forward in her noble self-abandonment, her most pathetic unreserve—laying aside all the trapping of royalty, and riding through the land like a spiritual Lady Godiva, clothed only in her own thorough womanhede—to set her people free.

Yes, free; for there is no worse slavery for a nation than the habit of carping at its rulers; of slandering and backbiting; of "speaking evil of dignities," merely because they are dignities; of being ever ready to carry from mouth to mouth defamatory or ludicrous stories. Now, as our widowed Godiva passes on through the lonely sunshine we feel that it will be at least through a silent city: the silliest, wickedest tongue will be ashamed to wag about her any more.

* "Leaves from the Journal of our Life in the Highlands. Edited by ARTHUR HELPS." Published by HARPER & BROTHERS.

Though neither of these books can be called exactly literary productions, or judged by the strict canons of the art of authorship, they are in one sense very remarkable contributions to literature, and especially to historic literature. What would we not give for a dozen pages of such fragments out of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, or any other English sovereign! Two hundred years to come how invaluable they will be! Even now it is curious to read them—as was said before of literary letters—with an eye to posterity.

But even to us now living they are very interesting: more than interesting, valuable. However we may gossip about it, and try to pry into it, the middle classes know very little of the inner life of royalty. We have still in our secret hearts a dim suspicion that it must be because her Majesty is in the habit of sleeping in it—and that if we had the honor of meeting her in private life she would certainly carry a gold sceptre instead of a common parasol or umbrella. In fact our ideas are very misty about court life altogether. We do not fall before it on our bended knees, as we did in the time of the Georges, when Sunday after Sunday a loyal adoring crowd followed down the slopes of Windsor that good, jolly, farmer-like man, his plain, prim wife, and their tribe of doubtless very commonplace sons and daughters. It is different now. We do not, as a stanch Tory once observed, "revere the crown though it hung upon a bush." We have ceased to believe in the divine right of kings; but we believe all the more earnestly, as perhaps no generation ever did before, in the divine right of all humanity.

"Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown"—

And this is what makes these royal books so valuable, so interesting in themselves and likely to do so much good—they are intensely human, especially the last one.

To begin from the outside—the widest circle of interest before it narrows down to the pure, fine point of conjugal and parental love, the central star of the whole. For twenty years we had been accustomed to read in journals, and brief court circulars, and lengthy articles by "Our Own Correspondent," of the Queen's progresses, entertainments, ceremonials; ponderous accounts of the crowds, the processions, etc.; and minor details, whenever they could be gleaned, of the royal personages, their looks, sayings, and doings—notably few, and generally rather apocryphal. Now, after this long interval, we see the picture from the other side.

Take, for instance, her Majesty's account of what was a vivid public interest at the time—the first royal visit to Scotland.

Now many Edinburgh people will remember the incidents of that landing—how there was some unfortunate hitch in the ceremonial, causing much trouble and confusion, and bringing a shower of abuse and quizzing and disparaging criticism upon the luckless bailie whose fault it was. But not a word of this does the gentle diarist record. She sees only the pleasantness and the loyalty. And when, at last, these two young people—we must remember they were young people, not above a year or two married, and dearly loving each other's society—escape, "feeling dreadfully tired and giddy," from the endless ceremonial of welcome, to reappear, in an hour or two after, as the cynosures of a large dinner-party, there is still not a word of complaint; only "every body was very kind and civil." Perhaps one of the most touching things in the book is the half-surprised gratefulness—actual gratefulness—with which this simple-natured, high-hearted woman, accidentally born a queen, takes every demonstration of loyalty.

Again, it may be good for the many lady-grumblers, "bored" or "worn to death" by their burdensome and mostly self-imposed social duties, as they call them, to read the story of two days during her Majesty's visit to Dublin, on a tour supposed to be a tour of "enjoyment:"

Wednesday, August 8.—At twenty minutes to one o'clock we left for Dublin, I and all the ladies in evening dresses, all the gentlemen in uniform. We drove straight to the Castle. Every thing here as at St. James's Levée—the staircase and throne-room quite like a palace. I received (on the throne) the addresses of the Lord Mayor and Corporation, the University, the Archbishop and Bishops, both Roman Catholic and Anglican, the Presbyterians, the non-subscribing Presbyterians, and the Quakers. They also presented Albert with addresses. Then followed a very long Levée, which lasted without intermission till twenty minutes to six o'clock! Two thousand people were presented!

Thursday, August 9.—There was a great and brilliant review in the Phœnix Park—six thousand one hundred and sixty men, including the Constabulary. In the evening we two dined alone, and at half past eight o'clock drove into Dublin for the Drawing-room. It is always held here of an evening. I should think, between two and three thousand people passed before us, and one thousand six hundred ladies were presented. After it was over, we walked through St. Patrick's Hall, and the other rooms; and the crowd was very great. We came back to the Phœnix Park at half past twelve, the streets still densely crowded. The city was illuminated.

Verily the poor young Queen was a hard-worked woman.

It is an open question how far the abolition of even cumbrous and vexatious state ceremonials is desirable. They are a link with the past—an inferior past, maybe, to our present: for it is a mistake to suppose that parents are necessarily wiser than their children; often quite the contrary. Still, as we advance in life, we cling tenderly to old things simply because they are old. The pomps and splendors of stately royalty are not to be despised, being the outward and visible sign of a much higher reality. Thus there is some justice in the grumblings of those good "auld-farrant" souls who mourn over the annihilation of the Lord Mayor's Show—the eight cream-colored Hanoverian horses, "eating their heads off," unseen, from year to year, in the royal stables; and especially the unworn royal robes, thrown ignominiously over the back of a chair. Mere forms these things may be, child's play, descended to us from barbaric ages, when the national eye loved to be dazzled with outside show, and very irksome they must have been to those engaged therein. Still, we all have to go through irksome duties for the benefit of society. And royalty has its duties, too, even ceremonial duties, which it can not escape from without periling a little of the patient dignity, the self-denying self-respect, so to speak, which adds lustre to any throne.

Yet it is difficult to judge wisely concerning these things. The crown may be more or less thorny than one of our everyday bonnets; but we are apt to forget that while we wear only this bonnet, our queenly head wears not merely the ordinary matron-coif (alas, the widow's cap now!) but also the crown.

One noticeable fact, by-the-way, in these "Leaves" ought to serve as an admonishment to authors in general and traveling authors in particular—the graphic effects produced by extreme simplicity. We have only to go to Nature, and reproduce her faithfully, and as Ruskin would say "lovingly," in order to arrive at results more telling than the most labored and unnatural art. Little thought the gentle-hearted journalist, setting down in the simplest phraseology her "visits to the old women," that she was painting a subject which the hand of a future Sterne, Wilkie, or Wordsworth may do into endless poems and pictures for the benefit of posterity. Such "Studies," if we may profane them by using an artistic term, are numerous throughout the book, which, simple as is its character, gives evidence of not only a cultivated but an original mind. Undoubtedly the last thing her Majesty thought of was painting her own portrait; yet she has done it, and in colors vivid and true beyond the touch of time to efface. Therein the most prominent characteristic is the one already noticed—the very last we would expect in a queen—an absence of self-consciousness; in fact, a total abnegation of self so pathetic as to be often almost sublime. Then there is, as a natural consequence, an unlimited sympathy in other people. From the highest to the lowest every one seems to have a place, small or large, in this warm heart—this tenacious and accurate memory. Even persons casually met, such as "Mr. Taylor, mineral agent to the Duchy of Cornwall, a very intelligent young man, married to a niece of Sir Charles Lemons;" "Mr. Fox, a Quaker, who lives at Falmouth, and has sent us flowers, fruits, and many other things," will feel something better than mere curiosity in seeing themselves thus remembered.

Besides her friends, the Queen seems to exercise a peculiar care over her servants. It should be a sharp example to those fine ladies among the middle classes who almost ignore domestics, treat them as automatons or slaves, and then complain that good servants are impossible, to see what a thoroughly feudal relationship seems to subsist between the highest lady in the realm and her servants. "Jane Shackle," "the good Grant," Brown, "handy and willing to do every thing and any thing, and to overcome every difficulty, which makes him one of my best servants any where;" nay, even "poor Battersbury," the English groom at Balmoral, of whom his mistress related, with a gentle drollery, that "he followed me about in his ordinary dress, torn boots and gaiters, and seemed any thing but happy"—all share the same kindly remembrance. Indeed it is touching in going through the book to mark note after note respecting these and other faithful servants, and incidentally all these have been done for them by her Majesty or the Prince Consort in acknowledgment of their fidelity.

Another lesson this book unconsciously teaches to our luxurious eye—how perfectly independent a truly regal nature, in any rank, is of personal luxury. No one can read of the Queen's life in the Highlands without feeling that what she and her husband enjoyed most in it was its excessive simplicity—at times almost amounting to hardship. And when one thinks of the blasé, grumbling, self-indulgent tourists whom one knows—who go about the beautiful world seeing nothing in it, or only things to complain of—the picture of this young Queen and Prince cheerily enjoying their mutual journeying, making the best of every thing, always ready to be grateful and pleased with what was done for them and shown to them, and, best of all, always content with what was their strong-hold of happiness—their own companionship and that of their children—this, though a picture now curtained over by a mysterious hand, will yet remain for all generations as an unfaded glimpse of Arcadia.

No pure happiness ever dies, or ever becomes any thing but happiness. The sharp sense of loss may darken it for a time, but can never wholly annihilate it. Joy, remembered only, is still most perfect joy. Days may come—from the evidence of this book the nation affectionately trusts they are coming now—when the mother of her people may feel, if she does not already feel, that the noblest tribute to him whom we shall forever venerate as is to assume in its utmost responsibility that regal motherhood; to show herself just as she is, in her sacred sorrow as in her long past youthful bliss, unto her myriad children; every one of whom holds out to her—not unmingled with few contrite tears—earnestly longing, reverent arms. She has opened her heart, and confided herself to the heart of the nation; it acknowledges and respects the trust, and will ever be faithful to it.

"The silent father of our kings to be,"

What further is there to be said? if indeed there was need to say any thing, when by this date the book will have been read universally wherever English is spoken throughout the wide proportion of the earth's surface which owns as sovereign and queen this woman. None can give her a higher or better title; it will last her longer than her crown.

One word more—which we are sure the royal lady would be the last to wish left unsaid—even though the strong interest of the work itself a little blinds one to the preface that introduces it. In a most difficult and delicate position as a gentleman and an author advising a not literary lady; as a subject giving both wise counsel and valuable assistance to a sovereign, Mr. Arthur Helps, in his own manly, simple, independent fashion, has done exactly what he ought to have done, and said exactly what he ought to say.

SEARED.

ONLY a little wiser, perhaps,
Yet somewhat sadder, too;
'Tis always sad to awake and find
A pleasant dream untrue.

To find that lips had loved you well,
But Heart stood coldly by,
Nor recked that the white hand trembled so,
Or the lid of the well-taught eye.

Still she did all she had to do,
'Ill blame her not, not I;
She was merely acting the Woman
In the drama of A Lie!

Yet its from this part of Woman,
That one all simple now,
First learns to forget to be true in love,
To smile at the broken vow!

Say then if he see it often played—
Seems it so passing strange
That a heartless love seem sweet enough,
To tempt him ever to change?

If heart be a thing so hard to find,
That he rest from his search a while,
Content to be wooed by the brightest eye,
Or to bask in the smniest smile?

No, she must learn that a heart once seared
Or dies in the end, proud pain,
Or is healed by the smile of as false as she,
But never by hers again.

Yet she does all she has to do,
I'll blame her not, not I;
She is merely acting Woman
In the drama of A Lie!

THE PUBLISHER'S DAUGHTER.

ONE hundred years ago, what Mr. John Murray, of Albemarle Street, is now to the city of London, was Mr. James Haley to the city of Dublin. Besides being a publisher, he was the proprietor of a newspaper called the Dublin Mercury, which possessed such an influence over the Irish mind as induced Lord Townshend to select it as the channel through which the views of the Irish Government.

If Mr. Haley was happy in the possession of a newspaper which found unlimited patronage among the public and the Government, which enrolled among its contributors the names of Mallay, the Bishop of Ferns, and Jephson, the dramatist, and which had for an opponent the Freeman's Journal, directed by the once celebrated Jim Lenny, he was yet more happy in the possession of Elizabeth, his youngest daughter.

This girl was the belle of Dublin. She had won this unenviable distinction as much through the accomplishments of her mind as through the graces of her person. It is recorded that her form was matchless for its symmetry and lightness. She had an abundance of that auburn hair which is neither golden nor auburn, but which seems to partake of the beauties of both, mingling their hues like those clouds which we see floating above and around the setting sun. Her eyes were dark blue and deep, her features classic in their precision—in the short, haughty lip, in the low, straight forehead, the oval, velvet, pale cheek and chin. Her hands were considered to be the smallest and whitest of any woman's in the three kingdoms, and her foot was taken by a well-known boothmaker of the period as a model for the slipper in the extravaganza of "Cinderella." She could converse fluently in several French tongues, she was a superb musician, and her paintings elicited the approbation of the most critical connoisseurs.

The admiration, however, which she excited among the literary, and even aristocratic, circles in which she moved did not in the least affect her. She had a great deal too much sense to be flattered by the almost fulsome compliments which she heard at her acquaintance took every opportunity to whisper to her. She cared little for society. The only companionship she appeared to seek was that of her sister Grace. Indeed, the affection of her sister Grace, but in Mr. Haley she found a father who supplied every want created by the absence of the other parent with a tenderness, a pride, and a care that created a love between them that was little short of idolatry.

Mr. Haley's drawing-room was over the Mercury's office. "In those days fashion had not driven respectability from the west away from their shops; and the place of business which supplied the publisher with his fortune he considered quite good enough for his family to live in as a residence. In addition to the family circle occupying this floor, two-pair—the maid summer's evening were Gabriel Guertier, a great Frenchman, and Charles Talbot.

Talbot was about five-and-twenty years old at the period at which my story opens. Without being a strikingly handsome man, he was possessed of points of symmetry requisite to manly beauty. A lofty, white forehead; large, flashing black eyes; a sweet smile, disclosing the whitest teeth; a fine, strong, well-proportioned, and supple, made him a rather dangerous foe to the peace of mind of those young ladies whom he took it into his head to attack.

Gabriel was Grace's recognized lover. They had been engaged some time, and it was almost impossible to conceive an opposition more pure, more generous, more unvarying than that which existed between the young people.

Elizabeth, though conceived, caressed, and flattered on every side, had as yet no lover of her own. Many other girls placed in her position would, doubtless, have fallen in love pretty swiftly—by other day, considering the amount of attention she got from men for whom all the Dublin girls were sighing. But somehow or other, in proportion as she was more wooed, so she became more exacting. Her suitors all wanted some one thing more than the poor fellows happened to possess; it might be a better-shaped nose, a smaller mouth, whiter hands, a quicker wit, a finer character, a more generous heart, etc. And so it came to pass that she let them all go by her, including even in her estimation a viceroy, without feeling her heart in the slightest degree affected by the trying ordeal through which her beauty had compelled her to pass.

But a change was to come over the dream of her life. The smile and eyes of Charles Talbot were at length to achieve a conquest that it was the general opinion among the beaux of Dublin was wholly impracticable.

Talbot had brought a letter of recommendation from the Earl of Shrewsbury to Mr. Haley. This, together with the specimens of his skill as an engraver, had induced the publisher to give him employment. He acquitted himself so admirably that, in the shortest time possible, he had won for himself the regard and confidence of his employer.

It occurred that during the evening to which I have referred Mr. Haley had left the room for a short time. The night was darkening outside. Elizabeth rose, stirred the fire, and, while the ruddy glow lighted up her lovely features, turned to Talbot, and exclaimed:

"Every body has been a good deal of the Earl of Shrewsbury; but I've seen no one yet, proud pain, yet who knows him personally, saving yourself. What kind of a looking man is he, Mr. Talbot? Is he handsome, or benign with?"

"Tolerably handsome. I don't think him very good-looking, though I believe the reverse is the opinion of a good many."

"Is he old?"

Talbot smiled.

"One of the most piquant traits in a woman's character is curiosity. Let me congratulate you upon the possession of it in the smallest degree."

He showed his white teeth, and fixed his eyes upon her as he spoke. She colored a little, and looked annoyed.

"Is he often in love, Mr. Talbot?" asked Grace.

"Not often. But I would not answer for that view of his character, were he once to set foot in this drawing-room."

"Don't mean for you, Lizzie," said Grace.

"And why not for you?" Talbot inquired.

"Ask him," she answered, laughing, and pointing to Guertier.

Guertier shrugged his shoulders in true French fashion, but remained silent.

The conversation turned on its kind of strain until the return of Mr. Haley, when the two young men rose, and bidding good-night, took their departure.

Six months passed away, during which it happened that a coolness sprung up between Guertier and Talbot, which, as quarrels of the Englishman were sometimes quite intolerable to the Frenchman, took the form of a challenge.

Unhesitatingly Talbot had been amusing himself with sketching a portrait of Charles Lucas, the butt and foe of the wits of the Mercury office. Guertier, a caricature, and presented an absurd resemblance to Haley. Guertier, who drawn nigh, and on catching sight of the drawing of his countenance, flushed scarlet, he placed the sketch in her hands without comment. She glanced at it for a moment, then indignantly exclaimed—

"Did Mr. Talbot do this?"

"Yes," was the laconic reply; then, after a moment's pause, he added, "It's very like, isn't it? But what makes you so angry?"

She answered—

"I do not feel very well. I am not angry."

But her white, contracted brows distinctly denied her words. Scarcely had Guertier left her side when Talbot approached her.

"I have come to take you on the next room," he said, gayly. "It is cooler there, and the tables are spread with the choicest repast I ever saw. Come!"

"Did you draw this picture, Mr. Talbot?" She inspected it for a moment, and then said—"Yes."

"Your father wants you in the next room, Miss Haley," said Guertier, from the door.

"Have you dared, Mr. Talbot, to caricature a man whom I so love?" she said, eagerly and tearfully.

"Your father wants you in the next room, Miss Haley," repeated Guertier.

"I will not entertain this company with a sneer, Mr. Talbot," she went on; "but—"

"Why are you talking so wildly, Miss Haley?" exclaimed Talbot, clasping his hands. "Surely you—you—"

He stopped abruptly, fixing his big eyes upon her with an expression half of rage, half of adoration.

"It would be advisable for us not to meet again," she said, rising and bowing haughtily to him.

He turned deadly pale.

"And all through a caricature of a stupid fool!" he said.

She drew herself up, and gave him one look; then, turning sharply round, she followed Guertier into the adjoining room. In a quarter of an hour after this the party left.

Who shall tell the bitterness of the days and nights to Elizabeth that followed this quarrel with her lover? Her sister had married, but father was dead—she was all alone now.

There had been a total cessation from her sister that had almost killed her. Talbot had not been guilty of the insult which had been the cause of their quarrel. Grace had been told the secret by her husband, and, compassionating her sister's sadness, had communicated it to her.

Her grief had to be endured around her. It was miserable to remember that she had lost a lover whom she so adored. It was almost death to know that he was dead.

She accepted an invitation to spend a few weeks with some friends in London, thinking that new scenes would, if not banish the question to which her mind was now constantly a prey. But the very hum and shock of the huge metropolis seemed only to add a new bitterness to her sense of solitude.

One morning she encountered Charles Talbot in the streets. She had not seen him now for a long, long time. She was, with some friends, passing by the exhibition of engravings in Fleet Street. He did not perceive her, but she knew him at once. He did not look so well as she remembered seeing him when last they met. She would have given the whole heart to speak to him; but even while she hesitated the crowd swept her on and on, and when she looked around he was gone.

Their next meeting was brought about by an extraordinary coincidence. It appeared that the friends with whom Elizabeth was staying possessed some valuable engravings, which they were desirous of selling. They had been placed in the drawing-room, and during the day parties of strangers would drop in for the purpose of inspecting them.

Elizabeth was seated alone in the room, contemplating the engravings with an abstracted gaze. She remembered just as some visitors had taken their departure. Hardly five minutes had elapsed when the door was suddenly thrown open, and Mr. Talbot stood before her. On seeing him Elizabeth uttered a low cry. He stopped, as if struck with astonishment; then, hastily advancing, he said—

"I little expected to meet you here, Miss Haley. Will my presence embarrass you if I remain for about three minutes to inspect some of these sketches?"

She was intensely mortified by his coolness. Without raising her eyes from the ground she answered:

"If I find your presence embarrasses me, I can easily leave the room."

He made no answer, but commenced his inspection. She did not raise her eyes from the ground. Suddenly she heard a deep sigh. Then she found that Talbot was leaning against a screen, with folded arms, and with his eyes intently fixed upon her. The sketches had passed from the room, and was about to leave the room, when, hastily advancing, he seized her by the hand.

"Elizabeth, my darling Elizabeth!" he exclaimed, in nuanced, passionate accents, "do not leave me! You shall see me falsely once—I swear you shall—but still love you! I was wronged—cruelly wronged! You know it! Will you leave me? I am leaving England soon —perhaps forever! I am poor, destitute! Yet I can not leave the old country without hearing one tender word from her whom only I have loved in this world, whom only I have!"

He paused, overwhelmed with his feelings.

All the accumulated love of by-gone days rushed over her as she met his full, loving eyes beaming down into hers. His warm clasp was on her hand, his warm breath was on her cheek—he was drawing her to his heart, and she could not resist him. One sigh, and she was upon his breast, telling him how long and fondly she had loved him.

"My own darling! Heaven bless you! My wife—my own!"

The door was thrown open and the owner of the pictures walked in.

"Why, my lord, is it possible?" he exclaimed, throwing up his hands. "We had no idea you were acquainted with Miss Haley. Elizabeth, how long, pray, have you known the Earl of Shrewsbury?"

Elizabeth started back, white and trembling.

"The Earl of Shrewsbury!" she cried, "what does this mean, Charles? Are you—"

"The Earl of Shrewsbury, Lizzie? Yes, I am. And you are the future Countess of Shrewsbury. Mr. Walker, let me receive your congratulations upon the choice I have made of a girl who this day month will be my wife."

He spoke truly, for on that day month the publisher's daughter became the Countess of Shrewsbury.

MY QUIET GLEN.

A PLACE where Spring delights to dwell,
And Summer weaves a fairy spell,
And Autumn lingers long;
Where trees all day long droop and dream,
Listening the murmur of the stream,
And the full tide of song.

Where waters babble in the noon,
And babble louder beath the moon,
When all the world is still;
While out and in they plash and play,
By branches shaded from the day,
Beneath the greening hill.

God sent me here, I know it well,
A while in rest of heart to dwell
Beyond the din of strife:
Far from the city's dusty street,
From weary hearts and weary feet,
To find a peaceful life.

Here must I gird my armor on,
Here the brave heart's strong harness don.
Here watch the rolling sea;
Then when its waves break o'er my bark,
When winds are loud and waves are dark,
I calm within may be.

ROUGH-RIDING IN OHIO.

I SEE by the papers that our new Minister from China has been enjoying one of the excitements of that country in the shape of an attack from robbers. China, uncivilized as it is, resembles all other countries in this respect, and possesses as many petty thieves as New York, and a great many more brigands than either Italy or Mexico, where I take it is pretty sparingly. I once myself had an encounter with some Chinese brigands, and did some as rough-riding as any Mr. Burlingame; and this was the manner of it:

Some years ago I was sent on a sea voyage for the benefit of my health, and the ship in which I sailed was sent to Amoy, where she lay for some months during the winter waiting to fill up with tea for New York.

One evening some of our friends were making a visit on board the ship, when the conversation turned on the power and endurance of the little shaggy pique horses that we were in the habit of riding at home.

"Ah," said Mr. Field, a merchant of Amoy, "you would believe any thing of them if you saw how Brodericks handles them!"

"And who is Mr. Broderick?" asked one of the party.

A cousin of mine, and the most daring roughrider in the English army," said the Captain; "and you will all have an opportunity of seeing him," he added, "for he is to arrive in the steamer to-morrow."

I felt quite curious to see him, for I have a great admiration for pluck, and I found myself wondering whether he would be able to join the pleasant party that was to be given in honor of our approaching departure.

A picnic in China, when undertaken by Americans, is very like a picnic in America. During the day these gentlemen had been out for their delight. We used to send the provisions on before in the cart or carriage, and we followed after mounted on little "jack-nags," or, more correctly speaking, on the before-mentioned small, shaggy horses, a breed of native animal celebrated for their endurance and sure-footedness. We generally left the town at about ten o'clock in the morning and rode to our destination, where we strolled about talking, laughing, and singing, and after lunch and enjoying the delicious clear winter air, remaining in time to dress for the seven o'clock dinner.

The picnic in question was given us by Mr. Field, the merchant to whose house our ship was consigned.

The morning came, the steamer's letters had all been distributed, and the gentlemen felt as if they had a few days' breathing space. It was a lovely winter morning, and we went on shore mounted on our steeds in the day's sport. As Mr. Field was putting me on to my pony I heard him say, "So you have decided to go, after all, Broderick?"

I looked up to see who "John" might be, and I saw a stalwart Englishman of the pure Saxon type, with an expression of fun, an ounce of spare flesh, with the strong jaw that betokened power still. I imagined at once that this must be the new-comer, whose prowess Mr. Field had extolled a few nights before.

And I was right. A few words introduced "Mr. Broderick," and a few more placed me under his particular care, as the most timid rider in the ladies, and consequently as needing more protection.

Our party consisted of twenty-one gentlemen and four ladies, the wives of missionaries, Mrs. Grew, the Captain's wife, and myself.

As we were starting, Mr. Broderick turned to me, saying,

"Have they given you a leaping-saddle, Miss Mayhew?"

"No," I answered.

"Well," said he, "then it must be changed; for no lady shall ride under my protection unless she is thoroughly equipped."

So I went back, and the saddle was changed, and I have every reason to be thankful for the forethought that suggested the alteration.

Our way lay for six or seven miles across a country with nothing remarkable about it in any way. There could not be much general conversation, for the path was a ridge in the paddy (rice) fields, and was never wide enough for more than two, and often the whole party were stretched out in Indian file.

When we had ridden seven miles we had to pass in the neighborhood of a little Chinese village, and as we went on our horses were met with one or two stones thrown from the town. However, we were not threatened, and marched the temple, and found all the rest of the party dismounted (for the change in the saddle had occasioned a little delay).

The day was an unusually pleasant one. We ate, and drank, and sang, explored the temple, but found neither priests nor worshipers. There is a curious custom in China of leaving the temples open and alone. There is nothing to steal, and the idea of any peculiar sanctity, as attachable to any particular building, seems entirely foreign to the Chinese mind. In India, to have eaten or drunk in one of their temples would have been an offense that only blood could have wiped out.

At four o'clock our horses were caught and saddled, and we prepared for our homeward ride. We had still nearly two hours of light, and, as the afternoon was getting chilly, we all felt that we should be glad to ride briskly for warmth.

When we had ridden about three miles we saw in the distance what looked like an immense blue serpent, but which proved to be, as we came nearer, a procession of Chinamen marching, as far as the soldiers of our party could make a rough estimate, between two and three thousand men.

They were in close parallel with our road going home. As we neared them, the first notice we received of any hostility in their intention was finding ourselves assailed by a shower of sticks and stones.

Our first impulse, of course, was to get out of the way as rapidly as circumstances would permit; but here was a grand difficulty—the Chinamen were almost directly along our road. To deviate from that would be to take to the paddy, a tour that our ride would be lengthened beyond the endurance of the horses of the party; and, moreover, should there be any reel evil intention on the part of the natives it would not be safe for us to be cut off from the British lines after dark, for they can manage to communicate with each other in a most mysterious way: whether by couriers, or by the aid of Chinese "fiery cross" arrangement, I can not say.

Seeing the dilemma, the whole party pressed to consider what best to do for the safety of our friends closed round the women of the party; and then gave the order to ride forward, regardless of "paddy," and at a good average speed.

At first it seemed only like a frolic. We swept on as fast as the circumstances of the case would permit. The natives had stopped throwing, and fastened a long leather strap to my horse's bridle, that in case of fright on my part, or on the part of the horse, we should not be separated.

I looked into his face and saw, from the way that the blue eyes burned in their sockets with, as steadily, a concentrated fire, and the lips were shut mouth and teeth, that he dreaded much for us all.

The Chinamen are usually so peaceable that when they are roused they are devils incarnate. It must not be forgotten that we were riding abreast of a procession, and that we were actually running the gauntlet by these infuriated men.

I began to feel alarmed, and, when I saw a heavy stone cast by the robbers cut a long gash on Mr. Field's forehead, and felt a sharp sting of pain in my cheek as another wounded me, I became nearly wild with fright.

All our party were more or less hurt, and our clothes were torn to ribbons; still we rode on, our only safety in keeping steadily on. We were going at a tremendous pace across the country, leaping hedges and ditches. The dust was fearful spread, and every Chinaman was ready to fall his mite of stone or stick.

Just as we were coming to a hedge, that we hoped when once passed would shut us out from danger, a sharp flint struck my bridle hand, cutting open the back of the hand, and so severely paralyzing the nerves, so that I dropped my rein.

My pony at that instant, hit I suppose with some sharp stone, reared, and, as I dashed on, I felt a dead-weight pull my bridle hand from the strap.

I had no time to look back, but I knew that the strap had broken, and that my horse was gone. I was, however, ready to give credit to all that Mr. Field could tell of the bravery and captain horsemanship of John Broderick.

NEW YORK CITY.

THE Cornhill Magazine for April has an article on New York City in which the writer labors under some strange impressions—among others, that one-half the population are non-producing, because not an agricultural class. The following are extracts from the article, which will enable New Yorkers to see themselves as others see them:

Seven hundred and twenty-six thousand three hundred and eighty-six human beings lie down to sleep in the city of New York, more beings lie down to sleep than one of these thousands produces. Let us not, however, be led away by these statistics of other things. Of these 726,386 human beings there are 50,000 who produce human wants. It follows, therefore, that all are not and can not be married. Indeed, I suppose that the majority of persons in this city are not married.

The question will be asked, Why are these people in so unnatural and dangerous a condition? The answer is most complex, and no two persons would give precisely the same reply. Nevertheless, I think that I can correctly indicate the chief causes which do not stick to raise the food they eat.

Not only is there no food produced in the city of New York, but water to drink has to be brought some distance from it. The building of a pipe across the High Bridge at the Harlem River would produce a temporary rush of millions of gallons of water constantly pouring into the city through great pipes of masonry four feet in diameter, tapping the Croton River, which water the people of this city now drink. This water would cost about $30,000,000; and for the use of the water for ever after, a tax about equal to $3,000,000 would be added to the interest on the cost. Bakers near $5,000,000 would not be able to make loaves in New York. But it is not only this $3,000,000 worth of water that is brought into the city from the Croton River, but some 5000 grog-shops, which dispense every kind of drink, except water, from cocktails to gin. There are about 3,000,000 gallons of whisky brought into the city every year, besides the beer which is made and what is brought from Europe, it follows that the people of New York drink 3,000,000 gallons of water and the whisky, there is imported from foreign countries a sum annually of $3,000,000. Now, arrack, cordials, and other curious preparations to induce the people to drink water, must be added to the drink to an incredible extent. The importations of these articles into New York, during the year ending June 30, 1866, amounted to $6,092,000. It is significant that this sum exactly doubles the cost of the character.

The population of New York implicitly rely upon having enough to eat every day of their lives, and yet not a single human being is employed in the field of grown and flour is made in Tennessee and Wisconsin, and Minnesota, and Illinois, and Ohio, and Kentucky, and some 4,000,000 barrels of flour and 9,000,000 bushels of wheat are annually sent to New York from Italy. And so with every thing else. There is not an ox in Texas, or a sheep in Australia, or a pig in Chicago, which may not arrive at the supreme felicity of being eaten in New York. But the chief cause of the general happiness it is to live in the city of New York.

There were about 4,000,000 bushels of all roads lead to Rome. All roads in America lead to New York. Some 22,000 miles of railroads are spread over the land, extending from the Kennebec River to the Colorado Mountains. Every day these 22,000 miles, which never tires is dragging, day and night the livestock and the harvests of the earth which feeds the great cities, a great part of which reaches New York. The beautiful New England cities send to it the boys and lotels, and from every one dart out shoops full of passengers laden with food for the mouths of New Yorkers. They come, too, from the coast as far down as Florida, and from the inlets of Maine they bring lobsters, from Cuba oranges, from Smyrna figs, from the Mediterranean wines, from China tea. The great Erie Canal also pours in its wealth of food, and the Great Inland Sea finishes the work which the railroads began, hastening forward with it for the use of the city. But when it arrives it is only in the form of millions of hungry mouths. What then?

Millions of hungry mouths make the great distributing centres. Do not visit them; they are shabby, slovenly, dirty, and full of poverty and vice. They not somebody gets from their rentals $100,000 a year; somebody else gets $200,000 from their shops. From the early hour of three o'clock in the morning these centres are crowded with a busy throng of hawkers, a throng of wagons, trucks, and carts crowd, and the loud bustle of business fills the air. Through all the confusion, on furnishing breakfasts and dinners to the hungry mouths. What then? Why, the food day by day.

But all this food paid for? Here is a great question, which it is impossible to answer. We can only hazard guesses. It is, I think, probable that it is in mind that the smartest men and women get to the front, and that, therefore, they are the best fed people's money, fifty or forty.

There are in New York close to 25,000 persons or firms, who are engaged in 1100 different trades, professions, and occupations. Of these 1100 I find These 25,000 employ many hands; and range from judges on the bench to the poorest organ-grinders; from great publishers to Masonic emblem-makers, of whom I find seventeen in one list. Of these 25,000 I find what profession enlists the largest numbers. The business of dry-goods comes first. The number of liquor dealers are as many as 2000. Eating comes next. There are 1000 grocers, 1000 butchers, 1000 bakers, about 600 confectioners, about 300. Then come—lawyers, about 1000; brokers, about 1000; physicians, doctors, about 1100; druggists (their providers), about 200; agents, about 1000; insurance agents, about 1000. But the hair-dressers, 850, about equal the clergymen, 800; undertakers, 300; auctioneers, 300; and tobacconists some 300. It will be noted that nearly all these are employed in supplying wants, not simply nothing. This does not mean that they are useless members of the community, but it does mean that they well what great good many of them do, and that they are by no means the most useful to the general producer of the world.

There are other causes why be called non-producers, such as merchants, brokers, and traders of all kinds, some 5000 in all. But these people, who only handle food or merchandise of any kind, it is their business to take their share of the food produced by profit; and in this way get the money which they pay for their subsistence.

The merchant class is now a mighty army, and it wields a mighty power. Under the Exchange Assembly room in Front Street or such Street, one man may be seen pacing up and down during all the business hours of the day. He may never see or handle an article which he controls, which by a stroke of the pen he consigns to the inhabitants of China, or the citizens of London, but nevertheless he directs currents of trade, which bear countless millions from one country to another, and which may be said to feed the world at large. We see how opinion has debauched and degraded the people of Great Britain, and how powerful the hands of the great Pacific. Commerce is not always a blessing.

The merchants in New York dominate all other classes. There are two dealing at $75 goods each of whose sales, in 1865, amounted, to some $70,000,000. The lawyer, the doctor, the preacher, the professor, the artist, pay court to the merchant, for the merchant it is who controls money and dispenses patronage. New York is one vast market, a perpetual fair, in endless bazar, to which all the people of the United States come to buy or to sell. The most marked characteristic of the city is an unmeasured activity, a business fever, a money-making craze.

The following figures will in some measure express this characteristic. The foreign and domestic tonnage which entered the port of New York for the year ending June 30, 1865, was 4,807,316; and that which cleared was 2,588,883. Bear in mind that each of these figures represents a ton of merchandise brought here or carried away, and some idea may be formed of the amount of work done in the city.

For the year 1865 the custom-house returns of merchandise imported at the port exhibit: Imports, $219,044,714; exports, $209,548,960; all of which is paid for through the agency of the banks of the workshop.

The seventy-one banks of the city represent a capital of $85,000,000. The daily business at the clearing-house is some $700,000,000, and has at one time risen to $175,000,000. This approximates to the city's daily business.

It must not be supposed, however, that the New York life is nothing but work. The great number of theatres and shops are what first strike the eye of the stranger, and the streets are filled with busy men and ladies and trucks seem to indicate that the transfer of merchandise from hand to hand is the sole occupation of its inhabitants. But go off the line of Broadway, along the eider-street, and up and down the East and Hudson rivers, and you will hear the sound of the hammer and the din of the noise of mighty machinery, which, with the aid of human hands, is producing—producing—producing, and producing with such rapidity, for the sake of wealth, and the innate force of industry. There is quite is not without its pleasures. In many establishments, grown from the humblest beginnings which have attained almost to the rank of an institution.

The manufactures of New York city in the year 1865 stood thus: Number of establishments, 5464; capital invested, $61,251,757; cost of raw materials, $59,177,809; number of hands employed, 96,483; females, 24,351; wages, $36,304; annual cost of labor, $38,485,986; annual value of products, $109,107,205.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE Union League Club-house—originally built for the American Jockey Club—has recently been opened for the use of its members. This clubhouse is one of the largest and most complete in the country, and has been fitted up and furnished in an expensive and costly thousand dollars. On the first-floor there is a large reading-room, a billiard-room, drink-room, a dumb-waiter leading to all the upper floors, and a gallery, and a billiard-room. On the second-floor there is five private parlors, elegantly furnished. A large parlor and reception-room, a library, and a supper-room. On the third-floor there is also a large saloon leading to the theatre, which latter has accommodations for about 1000 persons. On the fourth and fifth floors are sleeping-rooms for the use of members of the club, dressing-rooms, bath-rooms, &c. The building is heated by steam for the use of the servants, and is reached by a winding staircase, not connected with the building. Also there is a large cellar of water for use in case of fire. The basement contains kitchens, servants' rooms, and a bar-room. It is said there will be given, about the middle of this month, a reception for ladies connected with the members of the Club.

Recently an applause for preserving life in water has been patented by a gentleman of this city. It consists simply of a cork jacket and a loose rubber jacket, to be worn over the former and covering the entire person, with the exception of the face and hands. The whole weighs 8½ pounds, and is put on in two or three minutes. The cork jacket is the principal life ballast.

It is said that the "Steam Man" has the dyspepsia, or the gout, or some similar ailment, and refuses to take exercise. However that may be, an invention of the character of the steam man has been just completed in Scotland. It is a road steamer, intended to travel over the ordinary macadamized roads, and not on the railroad tracks. Its greatest point of novelty consists in the tires of the wheels, which are made not of the rubber, about five inches thick and two feet broad. These tires are fitted over those which they press, while stones and other obstructions readily slide into the yielding and pliable material. One of these wheels is said in front, and another behind, the engine and the centre of gravity. The machine weighs about five tons, and is capable of running sixty tons at a slow speed. Its speed is easily graduated; and, although it travels with greater rapidity on a true surface, it traverses without difficulty the roughest land. It has been recently on the road between Leith and Edinburgh, where it drew the heaviest loads with ease, to the astonishment of spectators.

Another child murder is reported. A wretch, living in Quebec, and his wife have been arrested on the charge of having caused the death of their child, a little boy of about three years, through abuse. For a long time past, the poor child had been subjected to cruel treatment, and the most inhuman—barbarous, exposure, hunger, thirst, and cruel abuse. He was compelled to stand in the freezing cold of winter with insufficient clothing, and beaten if he put on an extra garment offered him by a compassionate neighbor. At last, the child, as was said to be ill to be of any use, and if not succeeded in disposing of all his stock, would be punished by being shut up in a dark closet in the morning as a punishment. It is a satisfactory thing to know that our contact is beyond reach of the brutal wretches called father and mother; and that there are in the world those who, which should not deal lightly with such offenders.

Explosions from the use of kerosene are so frequent and appalling that every method of diminishing the quality of the oil may save many lives. This may be done by mixing it with benzoline, a little with water, and a spoonful of the oil. Fill the cup with warm water, the temperature of which is not higher than 120 degrees of Fahrenheit, pour the oil on the water; apply flame to the floating oil by means of a match or otherwise. As the oil burns, it will take fire, but to use in a lamp is dangerous, for it is liable to explode. If the experiment is tried, it will not take fire, but rest, similar to this, is generally used by judicious dealers.

The other day a gentleman went into the Sub-Treasury building in this city to obtain some clean currency. It is now the custom, when a bank or a fresh pieces in one's porte-monnaie rather than be bothered with dirty bills. It was his first visit to the crived from counters. The gentleman laid a small roll of bills on the counter before the clerk in attendance, saying, "In tens, twenty-fives, and fifties, if you please." The nimble fingers quickly put money into looking packages in place of the bills. The gentleman ran his eye over them hastily, then went back and counted over carefully each package.

"Is this right?" he inquired, returning the packages to the clerk, who after an instant's examination, replied, "Yes, sir, it is right."

The gentleman looked into his pocket-book with a puzzled air—every thing was all right, and no more —thrust his fingers first into one vest-pocket and then another, but brought nothing forth.

"Have you lost any thing?" inquired the clerk.

"Well, I thought I gave you fifty dollars, but it seems not."

"Here's the money," said the clerk: "three tens and two fives. Look on the floor," continued he, with a puzzled interest, "perhaps you've dropped it."

The gentleman stooped, picked up the missing X, and expressed his thanks.

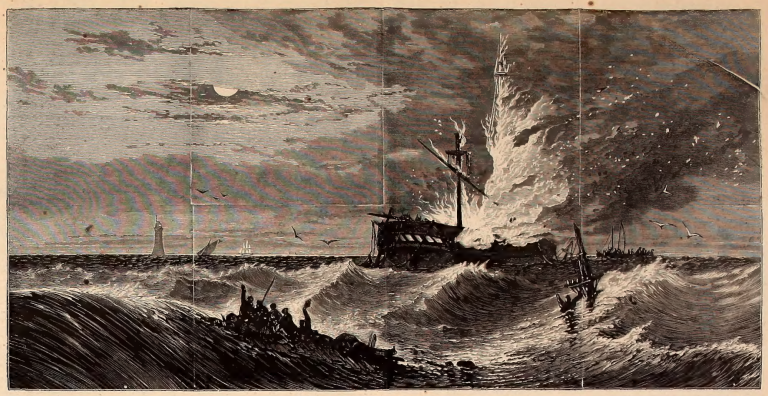
"Two or three times a day," remarked the clerk, "persons come here and think they have lost money. They look around, look on the floor, and some come out of ties they find it."

This little incident is trifling in itself, though a practical lesson in regard to care of money may be drawn from it. But it specially suggests to us that great credit is due to a large class of persons in private establishments, and very generally to those in governmental departments, for courtesy, attention, and consideration toward the public. Of course it is for their own private interest to be so; but there are many persons so cross-grained that they can not bring themselves to be fairly polite, even though they know it will be a comfort to others and money in their own pockets. While there often is, on the one hand, a marked want of consideration toward others in our shops, there are some places where persons never desire to go a second time, because they are persistently urged to buy what they do not want, or have uncivil words flung at them if goods do not suit. A special contrast are most of our larger establishments—as a rule—to many smaller ones, where goods are readily exhibited, their reliable merits honestly explained, and purchasers then allowed to use their own taste and judgment. In many instances the greatest courtesy to strangers is our leading book-stores, in shops which are devoted to works of art and science. There is a love of the beautiful in the manufacturer himself, which makes him desire that his goods when taken in hand by the purchaser, if that particular thing can not supply it, the offered seat, and sundry nameless civilities, if tendered in the genuine line of service, are nevertheless a comfort to the weary.

Some brilliant English sportsmen recently had their pleasure for a day spoiled, and cried it by putting it in the kitchen oven, using meanwhile in the meantime, big ale. It exploded, of course; two of them were killed, and the other severely injured. Such acts of genius on this side the Atlantic undertook to grind some grains powder in a coffee-mill, with a similar result.

OPENING OF NAVIGATION.

THE winter of 1868 did not long linger in the lap of the spring of the same year: the Ides of March witnessed the final relaxation of his icy grasp and the dissolution of his frozen fetters, and thereat many rejoiced, and among the most joyful were the thousands and tens of thousands who go down to the sea in ships, and tread the canal boats in barges, and the lakes and rivers in steamers, and on flat-boats and rafts.



The severe winters in Arkansaw result generally in closing all inland navigation for about three and a half months in the year. Generally navigation on the southern streams and lakes closes about the 15th of December and opens again about the first of April, seldom later, but sometimes as early as February. Many years ago (1847) the Hudson River was closed by ice on December 20, and opened on February 4, but that is the only instance on record of so early an end to the ice blockade in that section. Mississippi steamers, however, are laid up and idled often earlier, generally by the first of March. The Ohio, which THOMAS H. BENTON, once declared is "the most beautiful river in creation," is closed for only about two months of the year.

During this period the railroads are the chief means of transportation, but the other numerous means, however; and the thousands of steamers, barges, tugs, sailing vessels, etc., which convey some of the immense agricultural and manufactures of the country to the great commercial ports are, of course, idle. They are laid up in great numbers in the rivers, bays, docks, and creeks, "hulks," "hooks," etc., which abound, serving in winter the homes of the crews. Wholesale fitting out of the vessels, and repairs of the entire, owned by the heads thereof; and children are born, reared, and live and die in these floating homes of the mariner. When the ice finally gives way those imprisoned vessels, loaded with the accumulated freight of months, are released, and are at once put in motion toward the great centres of trade.

For engraving on page 252 handsomely illustrates the scenes which accompany this interesting event. The artist has represented the "Opening of Navigation on the Hudson, on Long Island Sound, and on the Mississippi River: thus at the same time varying the scene, and introducing the different kinds of vessels which are employed on the various streams of the country. The Sound and Hudson River steamers are very different in appearance and appearance from those to be seen on the Mississippi River, and the scene portrayed are of a widely different character.

LAND IN SIGHT!—HOME AT LAST!

THE langhing sea rolls blue and free,
And on every face there is joy and glee;
For the west wind harps, in the rigging, soft,
And the broad white canvas, that's spread aloft,
Strains fuller now to the homeward wind;
And even the sea-bird's left behind,
As the ship cleaves faster the crimson wave
In the sunset red as a warrior's grave.

"Land in sight!" and "Home at last!"
That is the cry that spreads so fast;
And they fancy already they hear the bells
Ringing from old familiar dells.

Soon, soon the granite cliffs will rise
To cheer the longing and straining eyes;
Once past you burning sunset line,
They'll see the well-known headlands shine.

The sea grows greener every hour,
The deep keel plows with a keener power;
The dusk is spreading its shroud of gloom,
And night, like the lid of a pond'rous tomb,
Falls slow; but the laugh and the song rise up,
As the bubbles spring in a Champagne-cup;
For there in the east the magnet star
Of a light-house is welcoming them from far.

Sleep, brave men, sleep, for home is near;
Sleep, mothers, sleep, without dream of fear;
Sleep, children, sleep, for the sea's at rest,
Rocking you all to its fost'ring breast:
The ship so stanch and true and strong,
With the tyrant sea has battled long.
In an hour the loud cry, "Shell and sand!"
Will tell the advent of the land.

Night spreads its canopy of stars
High o'er the good ship's swaying spars—
Halcyon night, with its balm to all;
Soft, sweet night with its drowsy pall.

Already the scent of the new-mown hay
Breathes from the meadow-land far away;
And Hope brings dreams of happier time,
Of changeless joy, and a sunnier clime.

The land's in sight—that glimpse of the moon
Disclosed the nearest headland; soon
The church-tower on the cliff will show—
When you dark cloud away shall blow.
Plow faster, ship; they pine for rest;
Hadst thou a heart within thy breast,
Swifter, oh, swifter thy homeward flight,
To that long, low line of glimmering white.

THE DAWN OF TRUTH—"WHO WITH HIS COMPASS PAIN WOULD SPAN GREAT NATURE'S MYSTERIES."

ILL TIDINGS—"THEN CAME THE NEWS—HER FEARS WERE TRUE; HER LOVE—HE SLEPT ETERNALLY."

What scream was that?—that anguish starts
From bleeding and from breaking hearts.
A blue smoke oozes from the hold,
And cheeks grow pale, and hearts grow cold;
Broad flames from all the portholes leap,
Keen flames along the cordage creep—
Soon the tall masts are lopped in fire,
Fanned by the winds the flames mount higher.

Red flows the sea as the fierce flame blows,
The inky cloud all crimson grows.
Loud ring their shrieks, as the only boat
With half-crazed women is set afloat;
And now with cries of smoke and fire
From the blazing vessel the winds wait higher;
And the weed that floats on o'er the glowing wave,
Of all within her the burning grave.

Men on the cliffs, looking out to sea—
A pale and shuddering company!—
See, as the winds shift to the west,
A floating light on the ocean-crest.
And then a frame with thick ribs charred—
A chaldron vast, with timbers bared;
And within the floating basket-cage
A fierce fire with a shrieking human rage.

To leeward a cloud of crimson spread,
For over the dying and the dead,
A cloud that's starred with sparks that fast
From the wreck in burning showers are cast.
Slowly again night's pitying gray
Spreads o'er the sea and the high cliff wall
And those who are saved from the fire and waves
Kneel and pray to the God who saves.

THE DAWN OF TRUTH.

Sweet rides the moon o'er tower and deep,
The city, like a child asleep,
Basks in that tender light;
And o'er steep streets and winding ways,
And over the silence of the quays,
Broods the cool shade of night.

One watcher watereth with the moon,
Watcher for whom day comes too soon,
Fair prince of the skies:
Who with his compass fain would span—
Delirium of the priesthood's ban—
Great Nature's mysteries.

Through years of solitude and care,
With that they will not credit—prayer—
Has this man sought to reach
The meaning of that perfect scheme,
Grander than Papacy's wildest dream,
Nor set beyond man's reach.

For He whose hand the stars can bind
Gave gas, the ductile wind,
His fever-thirst to sweep,
Not sweet to Him the bigot's curse
On eyes that read the universe,
And mark stars come and go.

Oh, not by Him is set the line
That shuts in science's shrine
Within appointed space;
Not aligh enough man's soul can soar,
Till all the base he shall explore,
And see God face to face.

Each new star tracked by mortal ken,
Each new link in creation's chain,
Is one step nearer home:
Observe the maze through which we grope,
But bright above the star of hope,
Our watchword, "Lo, we come!"

ILL TIDINGS.

See Illustration on page 253.

Scarce three days since her lover sailed:
Sudden the evening message came
But love was strength: his soul ne'er failed
He thought of her, and thought of fame.
He left with youth upon his brow,
And courage master of his heart.
Love well would guide his good ship's prow,
And hope could soothe e'en parting's smart!

And she—ah, blessed thought!—why fear?
There 'twas he left her quiet home.
The great sea rolled forever near,
Over which her prayers' bark would roam!
And oft along the sounding shore,
When waves roll high and day grew dim,
She listened for the coming oar,
That seemed to tell her soul of him.

One night she heard the storm come down,
As by the mighty magic she stood:
For out the crested breakers thrown
Whitened with wrath the angry flood.
And to her sad'ning heart recalled
Some strange murmurs from the wind above:
"Great God," she said, "from night till morn
"Oh guard him safe, my love, my love!"

Days passed: there lingered still behind
The shadow of that fearful night.
She dared no longer trust the wind,
The sea grew deathlike to her sight.
Then came a message—ere hours were nine:
Her love—he slept eternally
Down fathoms deep. That night, she knew,
Death's note had sounded in the sea!

A BULL AND TIGER FIGHT.

I MET Don Ricardo first at the Hôtel Peninsulaire, Puerta del Sol, Madrid. He was then about forty years old, five feet eleven inches in height, and powerfully made. A more pleasant companion in every way it is impossible to have. How full of information he was! How thoroughly he knew Spain! What stories he had of brigands, duels, camps, and courts! What conversation was he! Well, I should think originally he was Irish, but for the latter twenty years of his life he had lived in Spain. He it was who took me to my first bull-fight. I would go, as I have done, from one end of Spain to another to see a good bull-fight. I consider it the most exciting and beautiful spectacle to be seen in the present day. Yes! it was Don Ricardo that I went to my first bull-fight—he, an old connoisseur, sitting close to me, pointing out the various points, etc., etc. How I enjoyed it! And between the intervals sold me of the scene of bloodshed he had once seen in that Plaza de Toros.

"The season," said Don Ricardo, "had been remarkably dull. Either the people were poorer than usual, or the bulls were of an inferior breed. One thing was very certain: that fight after fight took place, and the Plaza, instead of being crowded, as it is to-day, with ten thousand people, had a meagre five or three hundred scattered about. It became evident that the contractor, unless he could fill the ring again, would shortly be a ruined man. A chance that other than this time there arrived in Madrid a traveling menagerie. Among other animals, it contained a very fine tiger. An idea entered into the head of the contractor that he would entertain the gay world of Madrid with a spectacle such as had not been seen since the days of the Romans. He accordingly, after a good deal of bargaining, succeeded in purchasing from the showman his large tiger; and a day or two afterward the walls of Madrid were plastered with announcements of a fight that would take place on a certain day between a tiger of enormous size and ferocity and a bull of the celebrated breed of Don Fulano. The day arrived, and the Plaza was crowded. Never a bull fight generally averages about two and a half hours, and the contractor had bothered his brain how he should spin the time out. He began accordingly with a fight between a bull-dog and a donkey."

"Good gracious!" I could not help exclaiming, "you don't mean to say that was worth seeing?"

"Indeed," continued Don Ricardo, "it proved a most excellent fight, and lasted about twenty minutes, before the bull-dog was killed. Some of us thought the bull-dog would be the conqueror, till we saw how clever the donkey stood him with his fore-feet, and fell upon him with his knees, when the dog seized him by the throat. This being ended, the sand raked over, the band finished their tune, and the multitude banging over the sides of the arena in that breathless silence which precedes excitement, the door out of the bull, the door was flung back and a noble bull dashed into the ring with that impetuous rush which is its birth. It looked around, entered the ring once or twice, apparently astonished at finding nothing to encounter, and then took up his position in the centre of the ring, pawing up and shaking his curly black locks over his small, stag-like muzzle. A door facing him was then opened and the tiger let out. It is very singular to remark the different way that the tiger came out of its den—no wild rush or roar, but, sneaking out like a cat, it crept close to the barrier, and, crouching against it, looked with half-closed eyes at his enemy. The bull, directly he saw him, gave one or two wild bounds out of vigor and passion, and backed a few paces. He did not seem afraid, but conscious he was in the presence of a new enemy and began to be irritated with. So they continued gazing at each other for some seconds. Presently the tiger seemed to crouch gradually lower and lower till he lay literally veatre a terre, and commenced dragging himself paw by paw nearer to the bull. He in his turn retreated two or three steps, and then stood still, awaiting the event—no movement but an occasional petulant shake of his head, and a slight noise like a deep sigh. You might have heard a pin drop in the Plaza, so intense was the excitement. Slowly, slowly, the tiger drew near. Suddenly! in a moment! he seemed to double himself into a ball, and then lay out like a piece of elastic steel. He fell with no roar, in perfect silence, he sprang! A wild, furious snort on the bull's part, as he met him, and we saw him rearing high in the air on his horns. For an instant one claw hung on the bull's glossy shoulder, and then he fell a corpse on the sand for the bull had transpierced his chest and heart. The conqueror sniffed once or twice at the body, made a plunge at it, and then cantered round the barrier like a wild horse, as last feat he had accomplished. The band struck up a lively air, in cantered the mules, the dead tiger was dragged out, the sand was raked, and the spectators sat still. About three-quarters of an hour had elapsed, and the unlucky contractor had nothing more upon which to speculate. After visiting a little, while, the shout—uttered in that peculiar long-song always used in the bull-ring—began of "Otra tigre! Otra tigre!" and was taken up by voice after voice, till the whole circus seemed to ring with "Otra tigre." (Another tiger! another tiger!) The poor contractor was furious—mad; he knew not what to do; he would not, he could not, disappoint—he assured his friends it was utterly impossible to procure another tiger. Still the cry went steadily on, "Otra tigre." Then the impatience became nervous, then frightened, and finally fled. Then the capitan-general announced from the queen's box that the fight was over, and commanded the populace to withdraw. No notice; nothing but the cry, 'Otra tigre.' Then the military were called in and ordered to clear the ring. A regiment is always on guard outside during a bull-fight; then the mamolos began to strike the little, weak, cowardly people they could not resist—light to a puer fan, and in another minute all the tumult were lighting the hangings and the benches. Then, alas! some one gave the order to fire, and the troops fired! Some twenty were killed and wounded; the remainder of us fled as hard as we could. So ended this fight between a tiger and bull," said Don Ricardo. "I remained till the firing began, when I belted as hard as I could go; for one never knows in this country when a revolution may break out, or on what pretense I may be arrested, and there are breaks for less reason. The military were blamed by some, but defended by many on the score that if they had not fired Madrid might in a few hours have been in flames, as indeed was very likely with such an excitable people as the Spaniards."

The bull who had fought so well I believe was spared and sent to the stud. I have only heard of one other instance of a bull's life being granted him; and a lawsuit was going on about him when I was in Madrid (1861). He was a renowned bull, and had performed prodigies of valor. . . . How many times I went down before him. At last the supply of horses ran short, the bull having killed some twenty-five. His name was announced, and that he was granted the bull's life, which was granted—a wonderful instance of mercy, and proving what uncommonly good sport he must have showed for a Spaniard to cry out, "Hola! enough." The contractor sent him up to his farm; the forcados of the bull, however, used the contractor, stating that he had sold the bull to be killed, not to propagate his valuable breed with. The contractor stating he bought him to do what he liked with him. This case, as I said before, was going on while I was in Madrid, but how it ended I know not—I should fancy the poor brute was condemned.

UNIMPEACHABLE.

Indigestion—the most fruitful generator of disease, so common as not to be considered dangerous—slowly and surely saps the foundation of health; for, with impaired digestion, the system is unable to feed with strength to the system. Dyspepsia invariably follows this disease, and dyspeptics owe all their sufferings to indigestion. Nervousness, sick headache also sympathize from derangement of the digestive organs. Persons of sedentary habits frequently suffer from these evils, which are attended with a nervous irritability of temper extremely unpleasant to others and a source of misery to themselves.

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS

has been found the safest and best means of removing all digestive obstructions, as well as bracing up the failing system. Those whose occupations are mental recognize in this preparation the perfection of medical skill, as it soothes the excited brain, headache disappears under its gentle influence, and the patient rapidly regains health and strength by its restoring power. To the aged, as well as to delicate ladies and children, it is admirably suited, as it possesses the quality of invigorating without excitement or reaction.

As immense amount of unimpeachable evidence can be produced to prove this is unequaled for its prompt and ever-reliable action in alleviating and curing all diseases of the stomach. Its superior excellence and consequent renown is readily accounted for from the well-known fact that it is made under the personal supervision of the proprietors, in strict accordance with pharmaceutic science.

A MAN ROBBED HORRIBLY BEATEN, AND LEFT FOR DEAD.

Gustave Fahn, who was assaulted by five ruffians, and robbed in the Astor House, Broadway, having three of his ribs broken over his left lung, was taken to the Hospital, in charge of Officer Cody, but the officers would not allow him admittance, on account of his fearful injuries, and he was taken to the Bellevue Hospital Infirmary received. His case was considered hopeless, and it was so reported in Sunday's Herald, Brooklyn Eagle, and other daily papers. At this critical moment a friend suggested the use of the gold Medal of WOLCOTT'S PAIN PAINT, and saw that the remedy was faithfully applied. The relief produced was more than marvelous, for within ten minutes all pain had vanished, and he was himself once more. He has had no other medical treatment, and is now considered out of danger. Call and see the best proprietor of this speedy recovery. We would add that Mr. Fahn is a hatter working at present at 214 Grand street, under circumstances. Is it possible that a man or woman is willing to suffer for a moment, what will relieve worthy humity to suffer? Mr. Fahn lives on the corner of Smith and Bleecker streets, Brooklyn.

Is not Pain Nature's Voice?

What is good and what is bad
Time tells.

And this is true especially of medicines. If good, they live; if bad, they die. When we have pain, shall we apply smotherers or remedies which remove its cause?

BRANDRETH'S PILLS

remove pain by the stomach and bowels, and of this there is no doubt.

To cork up pain by deadening the nerves of the part may possibly be putting pain out at interest, the cause accumulating in the system, until, at last,

PARALYSIS OR SUDDEN DEATH
CLOSES THE SCENE.

Proofs swarm, and fifty thousand can follow, showing how BRANDRETH'S PILLS cure.

TESTIMONIALS.

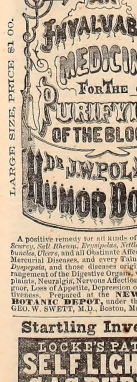
SING SING, March 24, 1868.

MY DEAR DOCTOR: My case of remarkable cure by your pills is known to almost every one in Sing Sing. I have been for nine years a martyr to inflammatory rheumatism, and for three years confined to my house and bed, unable to do anything. I tried every thing and about every doctor, but there was no help. At last my wife forced me to take a dose of your pills. As soon as their operation was over I felt much easier. I continued taking them in large doses, sometimes as high as fifteen or twenty pills, and with every dose I felt better and stronger. I am now well and attending my business, at the corner of Main Street and Eastern Avenue. Your pills after having all other remedies taken in vain pointed out to me by a number of residents I have seen advertised for the cure of rheumatism.

JOHN TINDALL.

SING SING, March 25, 1868.

MY DEAR SIR: My daughter Alice, thirteen years old, has been completely cured of that horrible disease, scrofula, which for years overloaded her with torment. After all medicines and many physicians had been tried and failed, I commenced giving her your pills. She took them almost every day for three months, constantly improving. She has now entirely recovered, and is a living evidence of the virtues of Brandreth's Pills. Yours truly,



DANIEL LETHER,
at Stephen Ayres's Shoe Store.

TESTIMONIALS.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: VICKSBURG, Miss., February 20, 1868.

GENTS.—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the Oroide Watches I ordered. They are very beautiful, and keep time, and hold their color perfectly, and pass very well for gold; in fact, they are all you represent them to be. I am well pleased. You will please forward to my address, in the same manner as before, Memphis, Miss., another Oroide Watch, price $15. Also, I want to work five dollars. ($5.) You will hear from me frequently. Very respectfully, your obedient servant, C. S. CHITTENDEN.

P.S.—I enclose you a letter to show you how well your watches wear for gold:

C. S. Crittenden, Vicksburg, Miss.: February 16, 1868.

I received the beautiful watch you sent me. It is a nice present, for which accept the kind regards of your old comrade. You will not think hard of me when I tell you that I sold the watch for $150, and with this money I will visit you. Please order another watch, and send it to Vicksburg next week, and I believe, if you will assist me, I will speculate a little in watches. Don't you think my old left hand is improving? I wonder where my poor right arm is. Send for a watch. Your old comrade, LUKE STATON, S. R. D. R. H.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: SPRING CITY, ALABAMA, February 17, 1868.

GENTS.—The watch you expressed to me on the 20th of January came to hand all right (except crystal broken). I have had it tested, and am well pleased with it. I keep as time one of P. S. Bartlett's best patent levers. I have shown it to a good many, and they pronounce it a good watch and no humbug.

Respectfully yours, C. M. DARNELL.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF NORTH CAROLINA, RALEIGH, N. C., February 25, 1868.

SIRS.—I have just inspected one of your fifteen-dollar watches which I purchased with the same. Please send me one of the large size (gentlemen's). I have no doubt but that some of the members will favor you with their orders should the one that you send me be a good one. Respectfully, Send by express addressed to G. A. LACY, Raleigh, Wake County, N.C.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: CYNTHIANA, KENTUCKY, December 14, 1867.

I received my watch as ordered, and am highly pleased with it in every respect. My expectations are fully realized. You will find enclosed $15, for which please send me one of your Oroide watches, with chains of that price. Yours respectfully, CYRUS A. PETERSON, Fredericktown, Mo.

P.S.—You may expect a larger order from myself and friends soon. C. A. P.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: HUMBOLDT, GIBSON COUNTY, TENNESSEE.

Please send me one Oroide Watch of the same kind you sent me before. I want a gentleman's size. I think I can sell a half dozen every month. I will order more in a few weeks. Send by express as before.

A. F. BROWN.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: BROOKLYN, POWESHIEK COUNTY, IOWA, December 1, 1867.

Enclosed you will find an order for six of your watches, and three ladies' watches. Send to Brooklyn, Poweshiek County, Iowa. The watch you sent me three months ago proves as good a time-keeper as a $150 watch. I have exhibited my watch to my neighbors, so that I can send a large club of six for watches. Address to J. L. BARNSTON.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: MERIDIAN, January 13, 1868.

The watch ordered by express came to hand to-day. I am well pleased with its appearance, and if it keeps actual time I am perfectly satisfied. In the mean time I wish to order two for my friends, of the same quality as the one sent me. Respectfully, A. W. BELL.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, December 3, 1868.

DEAR SIRS.—I received the watch which I ordered all safe, some days ago, and I must say it fully exceeded my expectation: it is all and more than I could desire for the money. Yours truly, C. STEWART.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: SIDNEY, OHIO, December 3, 1868.

SIRS.—Please send to the undersigned one of your Fifteen-Dollar Oroide Cased Watches, gent's size, and chain. The one I got from you before gives universal satisfaction, and many friends desire me to obtain one for him. A silver-plated chain, and such, gent's size. Fraternally, A. HARRY EGGERS, Allegheny Co., Pa.

Ground Coffee, 20c., 25c., 30c., 35c., best 40c. per pound. Hotels, Saloons, Boarding-House Keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our French Breakfast and Dinner Coffee, which we sell at the low price of 30c. per pound; and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 25 to 50 per cent. by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St. (Post-Office Box, No. 5643), New York City.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 20 days, and have the money refunded.

Through our system of supplying Clubs, consumers in all parts of the United States can order Teas and Coffees at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouse in New York.

Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a club send his order for what tea or coffee he wants, and select the kind and price per pound from the list as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on our list, and when the club is complete send it to us by mail, and we will put each party's order in a separate package, and mark the name upon them, with the cost, so there need be no confusion in their distribution (each party enclosing exactly the amount of money due). The cost of transportation the members of the club can divide equitably among themselves.

The funds to pay for the goods ordered can be sent by drafts on New York, by post-office money orders, or by express, as may suit the convenience of the club. Or, if the amount ordered exceed $30, we will, if desired, send the goods by express to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We will also send a complimentary package to clubs of less than $30, but we will be as liberal as we can afford.

BEWARE of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our Establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are bogus concerns. We have no branches, and do not, in any case, authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office orders and drafts make payable to the order of the Great American Tea Company. Direct letters and orders to the

I received the beautiful watch you sent me. It is a nice present, for which accept the kind regards of your old comrade. You will not think hard of me when I tell you that I sold the watch for $150, and with this money I will visit you. Please order another watch, and send it to Vicksburg next week, and I believe, if you will assist me, I will speculate a little in watches. Don't you think my old left hand is improving? I wonder where my poor right arm is. Send for a watch. Your old comrade, LUKE STATON, S. R. D. R. H.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: SPRING CITY, ALABAMA, February 17, 1868.

GENTS.—The watch you expressed to me on the 20th of January came to hand all right (except crystal broken). I have had it tested, and am well pleased with it. I keep as time one of P. S. Bartlett's best patent levers. I have shown it to a good many, and they pronounce it a good watch and no humbug.

Respectfully yours, C. M. DARNELL.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF NORTH CAROLINA, RALEIGH, N. C., February 25, 1868.

SIRS.—I have just inspected one of your fifteen-dollar watches which I purchased with the same. Please send me one of the large size (gentlemen's). I have no doubt but that some of the members will favor you with their orders should the one that you send me be a good one. Respectfully, Send by express addressed to G. A. LACY, Raleigh, Wake County, N.C.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: CYNTHIANA, KENTUCKY, December 14, 1867.

I received my watch as ordered, and am highly pleased with it in every respect. My expectations are fully realized. You will find enclosed $15, for which please send me one of your Oroide watches, with chains of that price. Yours respectfully, CYRUS A. PETERSON, Fredericktown, Mo.

P.S.—You may expect a larger order from myself and friends soon. C. A. P.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: HUMBOLDT, GIBSON COUNTY, TENNESSEE.

Please send me one Oroide Watch of the same kind you sent me before. I want a gentleman's size. I think I can sell a half dozen every month. I will order more in a few weeks. Send by express as before.

A. F. BROWN.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: BROOKLYN, POWESHIEK COUNTY, IOWA, December 1, 1867.

Enclosed you will find an order for six of your watches, and three ladies' watches. Send to Brooklyn, Poweshiek County, Iowa. The watch you sent me three months ago proves as good a time-keeper as a $150 watch. I have exhibited my watch to my neighbors, so that I can send a large club of six for watches. Address to J. L. BARNSTON.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: MERIDIAN, January 13, 1868.

The watch ordered by express came to hand to-day. I am well pleased with its appearance, and if it keeps actual time I am perfectly satisfied. In the mean time I wish to order two for my friends, of the same quality as the one sent me. Respectfully, A. W. BELL.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, December 3, 1868.

DEAR SIRS.—I received the watch which I ordered all safe, some days ago, and I must say it fully exceeded my expectation: it is all and more than I could desire for the money. Yours truly, C. STEWART.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: SIDNEY, OHIO, December 3, 1868.

SIRS.—Please send to the undersigned one of your Fifteen-Dollar Oroide Cased Watches, gent's size, and chain. The one I got from you before gives universal satisfaction, and many friends desire me to obtain one for him. A silver-plated chain, and such, gent's size. Fraternally, A. HARRY EGGERS, Allegheny Co., Pa.

HOWE & STEVENS'S Family Dye Colors.

CAUTION.

All persons who keep HOWE & STEVENS'S FAMILY DYE COLORS for sale can be relied on for fair dealing, for the reason that they cost the retailer twenty-five cents per dozen more than other kinds of Dyes in the market, while he retails them all at the same price: consequently he makes twenty-five cents per dozen more by selling an inferior article.

We publish this caution to guard our customers against imposition. Accept none but HOWE & STEVENS'S PATENT FAMILY DYE COLORS. They are the original inventors of an improvement which originated a new system of business, and made dyeing a domestic art. They have had, also, five years' experience in this particular business, and have been constantly securing the quality of their Dyes. All the colors, both in liquid and powder form, are manufactured by the undersigned, and we can supply our customers with either. The liquids do not require so much time in dyeing; but the powder colors will color the most goods and cost the same per package. In coloring blacks, browns, and drabs, we would advise the use of the powder colors in preference to the liquid, unless for ribbons or some very small article.

IMPROVED BRONZE ALUMINIUM HUNTING-CASED WATCHES"

(The qualities and resemblance of this new metal are such, compared to gold, that even judges are deceived) and "ROSKOPF'S PATENTED PEOPLE'S WATCH."

The Improved Bronze Aluminium of which my watches are made is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. It has seriously occupied the attention of scientific men, and has not only called forth the eulogiums of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition, and even been favorably noticed by the Secretary of the Bullionist Five Ex., authorizing its use in the manufacturing of Church goods.

Purchasers of this metal are such that it is surpassed by none, if we except gold itself, and that only on account of the intrinsic value of the latter. Further details will be found in my circular, which will be sent postpaid on demand.

My watches are made of three sizes, all huntingcased—one small for ladies, one for lads, and two for gents. The movements are well finished, carefully put together by skilful workmen, and perfectly regulated. I can therefore warrant them excellent time-keepers. These goods being manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to supply any of the above sizes at the extremely low price of $20 each. A full assortment of all kinds of chains always on hand.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. XII.—No. 591.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 25, 1868. [SINGLE COPIES, TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1868, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court of the United States, for the Southern District of New York.

THE TIGRESS IN CENTRAL PARK.

THE citizens of New York will find this summer a great many improvements and beauties in their great Central Park, and renewed reasons for congratulating themselves on the good taste and judgment of their Park Commissioners.

Among the most valuable of the additions to the statuary of the Park is the bronze statue of "the Tigress bringing the first-fruit to her young," an engraving of which we produce on this page. This work is the production of the famous French sculptor, CAIN, and was presented to the Park Commissioners by Messrs. S. F. B. MORSE, JOHN JAY, ROBERT HOE, WILLIAM T. BLODGETT, and other American gentlemen.

In his letter, acknowledging the tender of this magnificent donation, the Controller of the Park, ANDREW H. GREEN, Esq., very justly says:

"The Commissioners of the Park accept this munificent gift with peculiar gratification, as well for its artistic merit as an evidence of the public spirit and discriminating taste of the absent citizens, who thus effectively co-operate with these at home in the intention to place our city in the same rank in the field of literature and art that she occupies in the affairs of commerce. The artist, by the freedom, vigor, and commanding expression with which he has treated his subject, has placed himself among the first of the school of sculpture to which it belongs—a school especially adapted to the landscape of the Park. The design, its execution, and the liberal disposition of its donors, among whom I recognize with pleasure names widely known in this community as influential promoters of the interests of art, all combine to render this addition to the Park collection the subject of special interest and regard."

The citizens of New York will have ample opportunity of confirming Mr. GREEN'S opinions of the beauty of this work. It is located to the left of the Mall, on the hill near and overlooking the Lake, and adds materially to the beauty of that picturesque spot. Other improvements and beauties have been lately added to this portion of the Park; the Terrace near the Lake has been changed, the large fountain at its foot has been remodeled, while two others at the northern extremity of the Mall have been completed. The floral attractions of the Mall and the vicinity of the Lake have been very materially increased; nature has increased, too, the foliage and the beauty of the Ramble; the natural curiosities have been considerably augmented; and many artistic and other valuable artificial decorations have been added since last season.

ASSASSINATION OF THOMAS D'ARCY M'GEE.

THE midnight murder of THOMAS D'ARCY M'GEE, a member of the present Canadian administration and a prominent politician of the Confederation, has caused great excitement throughout Canada, and much feeling in this country. The prominence of the victim, less than our horror of the deed and the assassin, has been the cause of the latter, while much of the excitement in Canada is attributable to the connection of the deed with rumors of Fenian conspiracies. How far this surmise is true can not be determined, as the assassin has not yet been positively discovered, though suspected parties have been arrested and held for examination.

The circumstances under which the murder was committed, as partly developed on the inquest, are about as follows: Mr. M'GEE, as the representative of Montreal in the Canadian Parliament, had spoken, on April 6, until a very late hour of the night, and did not return to his rooms until about two o'clock on the morning of the 7th. He had reached the door of his lodgings in Sparks Street, and had put his key to the night-latch, when he was approached from behind by an unknown person and shot in the back of the head. The ball passed through his head and lodged in the door which Mr. M'GEE was in the act of opening. A son of Mrs. TROTTER, the lady at whose house he lodged, one of the Parliament pages, was returning home, and was some distance from the house when he heard the shot. On reaching his mother's door he found Mr. M'GEE dead on the pavement. He saw no person in the neighborhood and heard no footsteps. The night was bright and clear, and the assassin must have been either concealed behind the fence of a vacant lot opposite, or made a very hasty retreat immediately on firing the shot. Mr. M'GEE had just left the Parliament House and had a cigar in his mouth when he was killed. His brains exuded from the wound, and the sidewalk was covered with his blood. This fact, in connection with that of the ball lodging in the door-post, seems to indicate that the weapon was held close to his head when fired.

The Government of Canada at once offered $5000, the Government of Ontario and Quebec $5000, and the Mayor of Ottawa $1000 reward for the apprehension of the guilty party. The authorities at all points were directed to use their best diligence in hunting up the murderer, and to arrest all suspicious persons. On April 7, the day of the murder, two men named WHELAN and DOYLE were arrested charged with the murder, and were held for trial.

Mr. M'GEE was a native of Ireland, and was within a few days of being forty-three years of age. At the age of seventeen he came to the United States and settled in Boston, where he became connected with the Boston Pilot. On his arrival he was friendless and penniless, but his industrious habits and fine talents soon brought about him friends and improved his condition. He was in a short time placed upon the editorial staff as a leading writer, and finally became editor of the Pilot. After remaining a few years in Boston he returned to his native land, and became attached to the Dublin Nation as an editorial writer. When the revolutionary troubles broke out in 1848 he was compromised in the movements, and was compelled to leave Ireland and seek refuge in this country. On his arrival here he started, with JOHN MITCHEL, the Amerman Celt, an organ of Irish feeling and sentiment. Abandoning this enterprise on account of financial difficulties, after remaining a while longer in New York as a sort of political leader of his countrymen here, he went to Canada and settled in Montreal. There his political opinions seem to have undergone a decided and radical change. Once an ardent republican, he became a strong royalist, and was soon taken in hand by the Government and placed in the path of political preferment and success. He was President of the Executive Council in Canada from 1864 to 1867, and held the office of Minister of Agriculture, was made chief commissioner to the Paris Exposition in 1855 and to the Dublin Exhibition in 1864, and also to the local Paris Exposition. He was also a delegate to all the conferences held to promote the union of the colonies of British North America.

Mr. M'GEE was a fluent and eloquent speaker, witty, but discursive, and not always effective. In literature, as in politics, Mr. M'GEE was prominent. His poetry was of a high order. In it he displayed a delicate fancy united to a happy expression, which made his effusions decidedly popular.

Socially, Mr. M'GEE was more brilliant and popular even than in the political or literary world. Genial, witty, full of anecdote, a master of the art of conversation, he never failed to make himself a charming companion in every circle that was fortunate enough to count him a member.

HOW TO RECONSTRUCT?

IT is one of the many memorable remarks of EDMUND BURKE that when a community is discontented a sagacious statesman does not inquire whether it ought to be discontented, but in what manner it can most easily be pacified. This principle has been a great deal misapplied in the case of the Southern States. "Of what use," it is asked, "is it to talk about equal rights and liberties, and feeling when the truth is that the Southern people are dissatisfied and alienated, and heartily despise the colored population, whether they ought to or not? Their condition and feelings are very unreasonable, but men in general are not very logical, and least of all when they have been baffled by force in the passionate pursuit of a precious purpose."

This is apparently sensible—it is at least plausible. "Look at Ireland," continues the objector; "what is the use of talking to Irishmen inspiring spectacles? Do we wish to make an Ireland or a Poland of the Southern States? And yet if we disregard the wishes and feelings of the people of that section, are we not repeating the dreary folly of England and the crime of Russia? Are we not in danger of striking upon the very reef of which Burke always felt such horror in politics—the reef of a theory? Can we hope to spin useful garments out of moonshine?" Well, upon the whole, no. Moonshine is flimsy wear. If the case were quite as simple as it is represented in this kind of remark, the conclusion that we were all wrong in what we have done and in what is doing would be not only plausible but inevitable.

But this is not the case. We certainly agree that, whatever the situation may be, it is not a simple one; and the application of undeniable principles to it may be difficult. If it were true that the Southern people were dissatisfied and alienated, it would be necessary to reconsider many things. But the mistake of those who ask these questions and dwell upon this answer is, that while they speak of the people they do not think of the people. They think of a part only of the people. When we speak of the discontent of Ireland we justly think of the whole population, except the English interest. When we speak of Poland we think in the same manner, and justly, of the population as a unit. But when we speak of the "people of the South," if he means the whole people, he can not truthfully allege general discontent. If he means a part, he can not truthfully call them the people.

When we speak of the people of the city of New York, we certainly do not except white not called in the census the lower classes, or even really low in ignorance and degradation a part of the city population may be. Yet the same general political opinions that influence count and flatter the New York mob—if such a word can possibly be supposed to have any meaning in this city—constantly refuse to recognize the interests of the population in the State of South Carolina, or of Mississippi, and persistently call a minority in those States the people. We mention this merely to expose the fallacy of the comparison between the relation of the United States Government to the Southern States, and that of Russia to Poland, or of England to Ireland. The populations of Ireland and Poland are homogeneous—they are united in sympathy and purpose. The cause of Poland is substantially that of all Poles; the cause of Ireland of all Irish. But what is called the cause of the South is not that of the people of the South, but only of a certain part of them. It is therefore useless to confuse a profoundly important subject by an inaccurate and very delusive comparison.

On the other hand, we do not deny that the political division of those communities by color is a fact which perplexes the situation. It is due to many causes—such as the former servile condition of the colored population—their sympathy with the Government in its victory over the rebellion of the late master class—and the present identification with the same and power of the Union—and, by no means least, the malign influence of the President. Separation from a party is not necessarily disloyalty; but treachery to a great and declared principle may lead to the most fatal reconstruction. If the President had remained true to the great political principle he was ever known to announce, namely, that in reconstruction "rebels must take back seats," it is fair to presume that the condition of the country would have been very much more satisfactory than it is. The evident meaning of the favorite phrase of the President for a month after his accession was that the States must be reorganized by loyal men, and his letter to Governor SHARKEY showed that he thought it wise to extend the right of suffrage to the colored men under certain conditions, and he told Senator SUMNER that he did not substantially differ with him upon that subject. From that position he immediately shifted into one of hostility to every class of colored vote, and from that moment the feeling of the late rebels against the colored race has constantly deepened in rancor. This Presidential influence has quickened all the worst forces, and the result is the political division of which we have spoken.

Now there is unquestionably a large white element of the population perfectly willing to co-operate with the colored citizens, although now restrained by terror. Thus, in Alabama, the total vote for the constitution was 70,433, of which, despite the terror, 18,553 were white. The vote upon the Constitution showed a heavy reduction of the white vote, the white force was less than 50,000. The qualifications of voting, both physical and moral, were enormous. This is, probably, as poor a case for the white vote as in any State.

Meanwhile the question is whether reconstruction shall proceed at once; and if so, whether it is wise to pacify the discontented part of the population by putting the ballot in their hands, or to offer a share in political power to all upon equal conditions. The first course is simply absurd. The second is much right but is not conditions so plain as to exclude so many of the population as virtually to come to the same result as the first. Congress has therefore sought to avoid both extremes by general suffrage; and it is for those who are dissatisfied to indicate some wiser method under the circumstances to accomplish the result. General MEADE says that "to insure a larger proportion of what must be the governing class a more acceptable Constitution should be presented to them for adoption." We have already given and suggest how it should be made more acceptable. And it is an interesting question whether he would unreservedly to make it so by conditions which must necessarily exclude a very large proportion of the loyal population. Or, would he hold that there is no rebellion, and that consequently every body is loyal?

The situation would be simpler if the opinion of the loyal States were virtually unanimous. But it is not. The Democratic party takes sides in the hostility of race and proclaims itself a white man's party. If, therefore, the country would not be guilty of the most shameful betrayal of its fundamental principle, and of those who have been gallant in defense of Florida in the disturbed section, it must steadily remember that no measures of reconstruction are reasonable or statesmanlike that deliberately outrage the plainest rule of justice.

THE SOUTHERN ELECTIONS.

THE vote upon the new Constitution of South Carolina began upon the 14th of April, and was to continue for three days; and General MEADE has issued orders, which will be strictly enforced in the disturbed section, it must steadily remember that no measures of reconstruction are reasonable or statesmanlike that deliberately outrage the plainest rule of justice.

THE SOUTHERN ELECTIONS.

THE vote upon the new Constitution of South Carolina began upon the 14th of April, and was to continue for three days; and General MEADE has issued orders, which will be strictly enforced in the disturbed section, but we beg all sensible people to reflect that if regular civil government is ever to be restored to the States, it must, under the existing circumstances, begin under military supervision. A military despotism that secures a fair expression of the public will is surely preferable to a mob despotism that compels an unfair expression.

From the relentless and unscrupulous misrepresentations in the Democratic papers of the action of the Conventions that have framed the new Constitutions for the States lately in rebellion, it would be supposed that they were monuments of injustice and folly—instruments wholly destitute of the qualities most approved by experience, and most desirable in a fundamental law. A careful study of them, or even a mere intelligent reading, will show that such an impression would be as mistaken as the effort to create it is malicious. But the papers of which we speak, knowing that not one in a thousand of their readers will ever see the Constitutions, act accordingly. The din about "Pan-Africanism" or "Black-and-Tan" Conventions, the ribaldry of the reports in the New York World, revealing nothing but contemptuous hostility toward the colored population and loyal Union men, with the amusingly reckless vituperation incessantly uttered by the World's rebel allies in the Southern States, one of which in Alabama reaches the height of absurdity in calling one of these instruments "the putrid Convention," are doubtless the chief efforts to throw the political power in those States wholly into the hands of the class most disaffected to the Union and the Government.

Most of the new Constitutions are framed in general upon the Constitution of the United States, amplified with the more exact detail necessary for the organic law of a State. They resemble in general form and phraseology the Constitutions of all the other States, and in some respects are superior to those now in force elsewhere. Those of Georgia and Florida the Judges are to be appointed instead of elected, a wise provision which the late Constitutional Convention of New York was unable to carry, although the idea was very nearly divided. The bill of rights in these Constitutions is very detailed and comprehensive, as is to be expected in a reconstructed community in which a large part of the population has been just emancipated. Yet there are few of the guarantees that would seem unwise to any thoughtful man. They very stringently protect personal liberty, and very distinctly declare the supreme authority of the United States. This last, however, is not done in a manner to conflict with the necessary exercise of local power, or to lead to any perilous centralization. Thus the Florida Bill of Rights asserts: "This State shall ever remain a member of the American Union, the people thereof a part of the American nation, and any attempt, from whatever source or upon whatever pretense, to dissolve said Union or to sever said nation, ought to be resisted with the whole power of the State." Georgia has the same general declaration. The North Carolina Bill of Rights uses a still fuller form of language, and also declares that the people of the State have the inherent, sole, and exclusive right of regulating the internal government and police thereof, and of ordaining and establishing such a constitution and such laws as are not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States."

The chief interest in all of these Constitutions, and of course the chief change, is in the suffrage article. They all secure equal political rights, and it is this which makes them "particular" to the people who lost cause and to the Democratic party at the North. Yet of the new Constitutions that we have seen, that of Louisiana seems to be almost exceptional in the conditions of the suffrage article. The Louisiana Constitution disfranchises certain classes of the late rebels which it describes, and declines to restore to them the right of voting until they shall have taken the oath and sign a certificate acknowledging the late rebellion to have been morally and politically wrong. The difficulty with this kind of security is that it secures nothing. It is merely the swearing upon a brickbat of the first days of the war. Honorable men it excludes, but the dishonorable it admits, and it is the dishonorable who are dangerous. The Georgia Constitution has no such exclusion. It is as simple and comprehensive as that of Florida, and the one with that of Florida; and the committee of the North Carolina Convention, in their address to the people, say, with a force and wisdom which we commend to the attention of those who have may have been led by the most ruthless false hoods to believe in the utter feebleness and folly of these Conventions:

"While granting due to the colored people, the Convention has not been so inconsistent with itself as with the great principles of republican government as to deny it to any portion of the whites. It is an undeniable monument to the wisdom and equity and moderation of the Convention of North Carolina, that in these years after the close of a bloody and devastating civil war, in which wrongs and outrages were endured that can never be forgotten, they have framed a Constitution which not a trace of vindictivity or vindictiveness can be found: in which the wrongs of the past are ignored for the sake of the peace of the future; in which we are now here to their country are invited to participate in its government. Such wise forbearance is certain of its reward in the approval of reflecting men now, and of all posterity."

It is men who think and write thus, who are faithfully and wisely striving to heal the terrible wounds of the war by the most practical and sagacious measures, whom the World and the Democratic papers delight to deride and misrepresent, and with them mean that the Republican party works, and to their hands and to their spirit it would intrust the political power of the Southern States. It is with their encouragement that the Democratic party allies itself, and would intrust the political power in the Southern States to the spirit from which springs the Ku-Klux Klan, and to the hands that execute its behests. Between these parties the country will judge. With two-fifths of the population in the Southern States colored, and with the problem offered of the political reorganization of those States upon the American Republican principle, is it probable that a party that despises that race, denies its capacity, and, as a party, denies its equal humanity, is a party as likely to secure a wise and equitable settlement, as one that cherishes no hostility or class or race, that aims only at justice as the security of permanent peace, and that honestly calls differences only the most conspicuous and dangerous leaders of the late rebellion?

THE OPENING OF THE PRESIDENT'S COUNSEL.

THE case for the President was opened by Mr. CURTIS. His great renown as an able lawyer, possibly the head of his profession in the country, and the weight of his personal character, gave peculiar interest to his plea. It was known that no one could say the best that could be said for his client; that he would subject the letter of the law to the most trying ordeal of possible interpretation; and that he would ingeniously shift the lights and shadows upon the facts of the case to favor his own view, in the manner of all great advocates, and with an effect deepened by the apparent unconsciousness of his manner. Indeed the advocate has no art so profoundly skilful as the air of severe judicial impartiality: the appearance of seeking the truth for the truth's sake merely, and urging the acquittal of his client as a bounty which a magnanimous jury or Senate will naturally be anxious to offer to their own high sense of justice. This quality Mr. CURTIS possesses, and he has been trained in a school favorable to its development, for he has been Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Yet, when the best has been said for the President, how unsatisfactory it is! The first thing that impresses the reader of the argument of Mr. CURTIS is that, however able, there is nothing new in it. The whole case is so simple and so open to the public appreciation that the line of defense which we indicated at the very beginning of the trial as the only possible line, is the one that has been followed. Mr. CURTIS's argument would be a Court-of-Office Act to the most searching verbal analysis; but while it marshals probabilities and possibilities, and suggestions and surmises, with consummate skill, the great facts steadily and unpregnably confront them all. Mr. CURTIS contends that Mr. STANTON is not within the scope of the law; that the law is against precedent and intention; that, therefore, amidst the conflict of authorities and the uniformity of practice, to question the validity of the law is not necessarily disloyal to the Government; that Mr. STANTON has not been removed; and that Mr. STANTON having been removed the office was vacant.

These points are elaborated with great ability; but the mind remains unconvinced, because it is part of the skill of the orator to omit a whole series of facts which bear upon the case, and which are familiar to the country. The argument of Mr. CURTIS assumes that an upright magistrate, anxious to execute the laws, and theoretically respecting the rights and promotions earned at a time of great national disturbance, finds himself at last constrained to doubt the validity of a law, and therefore seeks a judicial interpretation of constitutionality. We think such surely the case, Mr. CURTIS would perhaps not have made his ingenious plea, for the President would very possibly not have been impeached. But he impeached because the violation of a law by this particular President under the peculiar circumstances in which he stands is of itself evidence of intention. Another case it might not be. In another case, as we have formerly supposed, and as Mr. BUTLER stated in his opening speech, there might have been a friendly understanding between the Executive and the Legislature in order to test the law. But this is a very different case. If, under any circumstances, such conduct upon the part of the Executive ought to be tolerated, and it is certainly very doubtful, in this case it would be madness. Men must be judged by their conduct and character. If of intolerable character it might not be. set aside laws because he professed to have scruples as to their constitutionality, the country would receive the anarchy into which it would inevitably fall.

Mr. CURTIS fortifies the doubts which the President professes to entertain by the opinions of many eminent lawyers that the law is obscure to be the settled interpretation. But the question is not of opinions, but of laws. The Tenure-of-Office Bill may seem unwise to the shades of the great departed, but if laws were to be disregarded because great men had prospectively condemned them, government would be at an end. Mr. CURTIS further says that if the President did not take the responsibility of testing the law in the Courts, it could not be tested. But if he takes the responsibility he must also take the risk. One law properly passed is as binding upon him as another. If he is to execute only the laws which he thinks constitutional, it makes no difference to an honest officer whether they immediately concern himself or others. He has no right, as Mr. CURTIS suggests, to keep in the office a little case to be tested by those whom they affect.

If a law be unconstitutional, the Executive ought not to connive at its execution; and if he is to be the judge in any case, he is the judge in all cases. Nothing can be plainer, and no principle more vitally important, than that the President must execute all the laws, without exception, which have not been adjudged unconstitutional, or resign. If possible inconveniences result, they are not to be compared with the certain injury of any other course.

We doubt if MR. STANBERY or MR. EVARTS can add weight to the argument of MR. CURTIS. Even should the witnesses for the President establish what they intend, with, we do not see how it could be sufficient. They certainly can not disprove that the Tenure-of-Office Act is a law regularly enacted; that it has not been declared unconstitutional; that it authorizes the Secretary of War, and the other Secretaries, to hold their offices "for and during the term for the President by whom they may have been appointed, and one month thereafter, subject to removal by and with the advice and consent of the Senate;" and that the President removed the Secretary of War without the advice and consent of the Senate. And if MR. CURTIS has been unable to show that MR. STANTON does not stand within the terms of the law are his colleagues likely to do it?

UNDERGROUND AND OTHER CITY RAILROADS.

THE question by what means the communication between the upper and lower portions of the city shall be improved, is again before the Legislature without the advantage of a fully matured plan. But undoubtedly public opinion has settled down in favor of an underground road in preference to one either on or above the surface. It will be scarcely possible, however, to afford full accommodation without certain material changes in the general arrangement of city conveniences. By removing our markets to the upper part of the city, establishing ferries further up town and contracting the direction of the accommodation for shipping, the motive for traveling to the lower part of the city will be lessened. Indeed, the construction of an underground road is found to be one of questions of great moment which need to be very carefully considered; such, for instance, as the supply of water through Croton pipes and its discharge through sewers.

The conveyance of persons from one portion of the city to another is wholly subordinate to questions affecting the supply of water, and that is but one mode of supply, and if it were much interrupted there would be not only great suffering but grave danger of extensive fires. No scheme is to be thought of which would seriously interrupt the supply of water. The sewerage of the city stands next in importance to the introduction of water. A very large portion of the northern part of Canal Street is drained into the outlet through Canal Street. This outlet carries a considerable stream from what was formerly known as the Collect; which stream, with the water from the Croton, constitutes the power or carrier for removing the refuse from many thousands of houses. The interruption of this even for a day would cause great inconvenience, and if somewhat continued would fill up the sewers and cellars with water; clog all the house drains, and fatally imperil the public health. We can not suppose that the Legislature will, for any reason whatever, seriously disturb the full operation of this plan of supply and discharge, since they constitute almost the complete system essential to the public convenience and safety.

The public welfare imperatively demands that in authorizing the construction of a road on the underground plan there shall be the most complete protection of these two points. No private corporation can safely be intrusted with the power to disturb the water system of the city, which can be properly touched only in subordination to the authority of the Croton Water Department. It is understood that MR. CRAVEN, the intelligent and experienced Engineer of that Board, has presented his remonstrance against the adoption of any scheme which could possibly put over these important subjects on the officers of a private corporation. The act creating the Broadway Underground Arcade Railroad, however, grants the power to a Board consisting of the "State Engineer and Surveyor, the Street Commissioner of the City of New York, as engineer to be appointed by the Mayor of said city, the President of the Company, and Chief Engineer of the same." A careful inspection will show that a majority of these officers will probably be wholly in the interest of the Company, and that the city is virtually unprotected in these vital points. This should be carefully considered by the Legislature and the Executive.

The two measures now engaging the attention of the Senate—both having passed the Assembly—are the Arcadia plan of a road up Broadway from the Battery to Fourteenth Street as part of its line, and the Brown plan, as it is called, from the Park between Broadway and Centre Street, through the centre of blocks and unimportant streets. The latter is substantially the London underground plan; and we learn that it is regarded favorably by Senator CAMPBELL, Chairman of the Railroad Committee of the Senate, in whose judgment we have great confidence. MR. CRAVEN, we are informed, also considers this the preferable measure.

The authority proposed to be conferred on the Arcade underground road, so far as concerns the depth of excavation, is unlimited. They may excavate "a sufficient depth and width," not only from the Battery to Fourteenth Street, but also for the distance of one hundred feet up and down each street which crosses Broadway. The depth required is twenty-two feet six inches, as testified by MR. CRAVEN. The width is the entire width of Broadway from wall to wall, and the same in each cross-street. This excavation at Canal Street would reach from ten to twelve feet below the bottom of the main sewer, and below the line of high-water. It would also extend about the same distance below the foundations of stores.

The engineering difficulties at this point are of such magnitude that months will be required to overcome them, if it is at all possible. The Act creating the Company allows five years for the completion of the line; and we are not sure but that, if the excavation be made up and down Canal Street for one hundred feet from the exterior line of Broadway, the Company may vary for the depth of twenty-two and a half feet, a very great portion of that time will be required solely to complete this part of the road. The block thus surrounded by a deep excavation would be practically uninhabitable even if it were possible to hold up the buildings. The opinion of MR. DAVIS, who acts as engineer for a company of forty stores and saloons on Broadway, that they would be deserted universally by tenants, must, in view of these facts, be deemed well-founded.

But still another difficulty presents itself, arising from the required excavation and the character of the soil. From the neighborhood of Canal Street to the Battery there is a universally of sand. Geologists agree in opinion that at the time when the coast from Long Island to Florida was upheaved it was covered with sand dunes, of the city, leaving this sandy deposit, which constitutes a very treacherous foundation. As a general rule, the foundations of the greater number of buildings on Broadway are not near as deep as the Arcade excavation must necessarily be, and hence it is very clear that many buildings will be undermined in the consequence of it, even should there be no storms. But, during a severe storm at such a time, the water running in from the roofs of houses and from the streets, would occasion very serious damage.

The fourteenth section of the bill declares that the "Company shall be liable to any owner or lessee of any building, structure, premises or lands"——"by reason of any direct injury caused thereto by the construction of such railway;" but no method for ascertaining the injury is specified, and the clause is fettered with the extraordinary condition that in all proceedings to ascertain the "damages all the circumstances shall be taken into consideration, and when it shall appear that the construction of the said road will enhance the value of the property of the person or party claiming damage to a certain amount or degree that the amount of the injury sustained," there shall be no recovery of damages.

The Company may range over the whole island to find property benefited, belonging to the owner or tenant whose store has been thrown down, and they may plead this Supreme Act as a shield to the action. Inasmuch as the Commissioners to ascertain the damage may be appointed, on the nomination of the Company, by any Judge of the Supreme Court for this district, some estimate may be formed of the chances which exist for obtaining justice by a person whose property has been carelessly destroyed.

It will be seen that the project proposed by the bill involves very serious considerations. The power practically to withdraw Broadway from public use, or seriously to obstruct it as a highway for five years, should not be granted until the necessity is plain beyond dispute. That there must be improved communication between the upper and lower parts of the city is unquestionable; but we have never been able to see why the enormous expense involved in the building of any road must necessarily occasion should fall upon Broadway.

SINGULAR FORGETFULNESS.

ONE little fact has been exposed in the course of the trial of the President which deserves more attention than it has received. SOUTHARD HOFFMAN, of Alabama, who was appointed in 1865 by President JOHNSON, came to the North and went as far as Boston to ask assistance for his impoverished and ignorant people. He was accompanied by MR. BEECHER, who had been made acquainted with Governor PARSONS by Secretary STANTON, and he made a favorable impression; although Senator SUMNER said that while he would gladly send food and aid to Alabama, he was opposed to making a loan until there was some prospect that the plan proposed for the reconstruction of the State that the loan would be repaid. Governor PARSONS, we say, made a generally favorable impression. But how are we to explain the following facts?

On the 17th of January, 1867, Governor PARSONS telegraphed to the President from Montgomery that the Legislature was in session; that an effort was making to reconsider the vote by which the Constitutional Amendment was adopted; that it was reported an enabling act would pass in Washington, and that nobody in Montgomery knew what to believe. On the 19th of the President telegraphed as follows in reply to Governor PARSONS:

"What possible good can be obtained by reconsidering the Constitutional Amendment? I know of none in the present posture of affairs. I do not believe the people of the Montgomery will sustain any act of infidelity in the attempt to change the whole character of our government by enabling acts in this way. I believe, on the contrary, that they will overwhelmingly uphold all who have patriotism and courage to stand by the Constitution, and who place their confidence in the people. There should be no faltering on the part of the friends of the Union in the determination to maintain the several co-ordinate departments of the Government in accordance with its original design."

On the 6th of February, three weeks after this correspondence, Governor PARSONS was examined before the Judiciary Committee of the House, and gave the following testimony:

"Q. Has he [President JOHNSON, ever, at any time, to you, or to your presence, given any counsel or advice as to what should be done by yourself or any body else on the subject of ratifying or rejecting the Constitutional Amendment?—A. I can not recollect that he has.

"Q. Do you know of any thing done by President JOHNSON in reference to the ratification or rejection of it, of any sort that I do; I do not recollect any thing that he has ever done on that subject."

Had Governor PARSONS forgotten the dispatch of the President, or—?

PERILS OF THE "POOL."

THE gigantic operations of our speculators on Change now during the transactions of Gold Court during the time of England's most serious difficulties. Almost weekly does Wall Street quake with some new monetary spasm. The "fear," long discussed, is now eclipsed by a new sensation. The great event in financial circles within the past ten days has been the break in "Atlantic Mail." The collapse of this stock balloon has created an unusual panic among the brokers, and the developments resulting would seem to furnish a key to the mysterious course of stock manipulations as at present conducted.

On the morning of the 6th instant a rumor got about that the leading broker and manipulator of the "pool" was "sick with brain-fever, and that his father had been conveyed to a lunatic asylum." This was a suitable precursor of what was to follow. On the morning of the 6th, at the early session of the Open Board, the first hundred shares of this stock sold at 86¾; in less than three minutes it was sold at 85, and in another hour it fell to 25—a fall of 61¼ per cent.! Such an extraordinary decline is wholly without precedent in the annals of Stock Exchange. In 1857, during the panic, the greatest decline in any description of security was only 55¾ in seven weeks. In 1864, Fort Wayne led the rout in a fall of 45 per cent. in a day. Simultaneously with this disaster to the fortunes of Atlantic Mail, the failure of the broker alluded to was announced. The profits of this unfortunate individual in the combinations, reported at over a million for the two years past, were swallowed up in a twinkling!

The remedy sought for this fall are various. The stock had long been held by a small clique who had bid it up from 76 in April, 1867, to 124¾ in December of the same year, buying to attract the public. Failing in this, they sought to attract purchasers who would take the stock off their hands, by declaring a dividend of 2½ per cent. a few months ago; but this scheme also failed. The Company is said to be deeply in debt, and to have lost heavily in consequence of certain transactions in Lake Shore stock, which were supposed to obtain control of the last-named Company's stock. At that time there was a tight money market, and no one seemed disposed to relieve the large holders of Lake Shore, and so the great law of gravitation asserted itself, and down fell the stock in four short months from 124 to 25—a total decline of 99 per cent. It is currently reported that a president of an up-town Savings Bank, who was in the "pool," is heavily involved in the crash! It is also an item of current talk that the purchaser of the stock which sold at 86¾ on the 9th inst., and who was a prominent broker at the Open Board, bought it for the purpose of closing a "short" contract which he had made shortly before at 87½ with the leading manipulator whose failure is mentioned, and who was the same party who sold the stock for Atlantic Mail. This was fortunately unearthed by the subsequent failure of the other party, losing only his prospective profit of 1 per cent. It is instanced as one of the many hair-breadth escapes which illustrate the history of the Stock Exchange.

While the general public are not sufferers by this disastrous collapse, it will nevertheless serve to incite thinking men to inquire into the causes of the ruin, find speculate upon its remote consequences. There is obviously "something rotten" in the present system of money getting and money trading: begotten, doubtless, by the luxury and extravagance which the war engendered, and the abnormal condition in which the war has left us. The quick apprehension of bank managers, which intuitively scents danger in certain facts, has already prompted them to scrutinize securities more closely and demand wider margins, while bank directors begin to pursue a more cautious policy in making advances. It is notorious that the larger portion of railway securities in Wall Street are held in comparatively few hands, and artificially inflated, as the Atlantic Mail was. With all due regard to the shrewdness and wealth of the leading holders of such securities, it must be granted that a continued tightness in the money market, an accident, or the death of either of the great Railroad Kings, might involve consequences which men are reluctant to contemplate. It is becoming a matter of manifest concern whether a few wealthy capitalists can hold railroad securities to the amount of 75 or 100 millions at prices which all safe and conservative financiers believe are 25 or 30 per cent. more than they are selling for in the market. It was doubtless a vague apprehension of possible danger, quite natural under the circumstances, which released a decline of 10 per cent. in Hudson River stock within three days subsequent to the Atlantic Mail collapse. Such a mistake as that in this particular stock is significant when it is remarked that other descriptions of railway shares did not sympathize with the movement to any great extent. The stock was distrustful of one man supremacy. It behooves capitalists and those who would tempt fate among the quicksands of the Stock Exchange, to ponder well the present aspect of the railway market.

The Pacific Mail Company's capital was nominally $6,000,000. Their property consisted of several steamships, largely mortgaged, plying between New York and New Orleans, and 26,000 shares of Pacific Mail stock, which was sold a few months ago, when the Company fell endeavoring to obtain control of the Pacific Mail; but were prevented by an injunction. These transactions in Pacific Mail were disastrous, more only to the individual investors, but to the interests and prosperity of the Company.

GIRARD COLLEGE.

IN our issue of the 7th of December last there was a reference to the current opinion in regard to the management of Girard College in Philadelphia, which necessarily reflected upon the late Board of Trustees and Executive. The new President RICHARD NORRIS SMITH, Esq., has since published official reports made to the Common Council of Philadelphia in reference to the removal of that gentleman; and it is simply justice to him to say that, whether favorable to his removal or not, the reports vindicate both his character and his abilities, and fully exonerate him from the charges of cruelty that were published against him. We are very sorry that any thing in our columns, although only by allusion to current rumors, should have served to give vogue to what we believe to have been unfounded accusations.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

THE Senate is considering a bill for the confinement of the President's Bureau.

The Senate passed a bill, on April 8, providing that no person shall be held incompetent to act as a juror in consequence of having formed or expressed an opinion based on newspaper reports. The Committee on Reconstruction reported a resolution declaring that the people of the district and State where the case may arise, if any, shall have the control in the case of SURRATT and JEFF DAVIS to summon jurors from any State in the Union.

A proposed amendment to the Constitution was introduced in the Senate, April 9, providing that no one shall serve as President for two terms.

On the 9th, MORTON, of the House of Representatives, on April 10, to test the Constitutionality of the Tenure-of-Office Act, moved the President be impeached, and, by providing for a suit on friendly collusion, the Attorney-General, and to be conducted by the Speaker of the House, MR. COLFAX, in order to effect the bill finally either in whole or in part.

NEWS ITEMS.

A decent was made on an alleged KU-KLUX KLAN in Alabama on April 6, when seventy persons, mostly boys, were arrested, and a constitution, with the oath of the Klan, found on them. It is said to have the ruling robbers and murderers out of the South, by assassination, if refused, was discovered, and also a few implements of their paraphernalia.

While St. Mary's Church, Chicago, was densely packed on April 10, a cry of fire occasioned a panic, in which 30 were killed and 200 wounded instantly and severely injuring several persons.

Advices from Arizona of April 2nd state that an attack upon the Americans to Sticks is apprehended from the Indians. Hostilities to such a massacre is imminent unless the troops are reinforced.

Advices are current in Florida that the Indian tribes in that State have declared war against the United States, and committed the overt act by burning a white man at the stake.

FOREIGN NEWS.

OVER seven thousand emigrants left German ports for America during the week ending April 1, and the precedents that this emigration this year will be greater than ever.

The new French army bill is driving large numbers of Frenchmen to this country. The office of the United States Legation in Paris is daily crowded by them, seeking information in regard to emigration to this country.

A letter from Dr. David Livingstone, the African explorer, was received in London on April 8, by Sir Roderick Murchison. Dr. Livingstone writes that he has discovered the source of exploration, and has been successful, and that he will soon return to England.

THE PRESIDENT'S COUNSEL.

WE gave in the last Number of the Weekly the portraits of Messrs. STANBERY, CURTIS, and EVARTS, of President JOHNSON'S counsel, employed in the Impeachment trial. We give in this Number an accurate portrait of Mr. WILLIAM S. GROESBECK.

Mr. GROESBECK is a native of New York, and about forty-two years of age. He removed to Cincinnati, Ohio, at an early age. He was a member of the Commission of 1852 for codifying the laws of Ohio, and also of the Constitutional Convention of the previous year. He was a member of the Thirty-fifth Congress. He was also a member of the Peace Congress of 1861, and was subsequently in the State Senate of Ohio.

The trial of the impeachment of the President was resumed in the Senate on April 9, with the opening speech for the defense made by Mr. CURTIS. On the subsequent day Adjutant-General THOMAS was examined as to the instructions under which he attempted to take possession of the War Office. The testimony as far as elicited does not as yet show the line of defense proposed by the counsel of the President.

WM. S. GROESBECK, ESQ., OF THE PRESIDENT'S COUNSEL.—[PHOT. BY BRADY & CO.]

FAREWELL TO DICKENS.

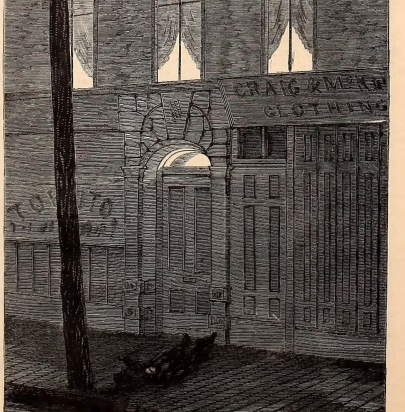
OLD Sol's impatient coursers, Boz, have brought the rapid hour
When I, who sent your welcome sang, a farewell note must pour.
The time allows a parting word, and brief the strain must be,
For yonder lies the ready ship to bear you o'er the sea;
Nor may we hope that here again with nimble foot you'll tread
So lightly o'er the crowded stage, to tell us "Marley's dead!"

Well, we have met you face to face; have heard you read your best,
While laurel decked your ample brow—that famous rose your breast.
We've hung enraptured on your voice as its mysterious spell
Waked into life the pleasant forms we've loved so long and well;
We see Bob Cratchet at his board; we see his winsome wife
The wondrous pudding proudly bear—her "great success" in life!
We hear with sympathetic joy (Oh, may we hear them long!)
The plaintive tones of Tiny Tim flow heavenward in song.
And when he breathes his earnest prayer for God to bless each one,
Who envies not the happy group such blessing rests upon?
E'en sordid Scrooge is overcome; his moistened eye grows dim
While pleading with his Spirit-guide to watch o'er Tiny Tim!
Was ever sermon more sublime, or ethics ever fraught
With more of love and charity, or more divinely taught?

But change the scene:—let humbled Scrooge pursue his new career,
And turn to where the Cricket chirps, the heart of Dot to cheer—
Ah, charming Dot! thy winning ways almost persuadeth me
To seek among thy sisterhood for one resembling thee.
What dreams of sweet domestic joys thy lovely presence brings
To lonely hearth of bachelor, where never cricket sings!
Who paints with such rare truthfulness the scenes of lowly life?
Who ever flung so many charms about a peasant's wife?
E'en Wilkie's pencil never bade the speaking canvas tell
The "simple annals of the poor" so exquisitely well.
How plainly to the mental eye each life-like scene appears,
And how we watch the Carrier's fate with mingled hopes and fears!
We hear the faithful Cricket chirp, the precious Baby cry;
We even see the busy Cart, and Boxer dashing by.
And how we melt with sympathy to see Old Caleb make
A palace of his wind-swept hut for poor blind Bertha's sake!
God pardon thee, thou fond old man! such guile is little less
Than virtue, in a breast like thine that knows not selfishness!

If aught but simple truth offend the searching glance of Heaven,
Deceit that calms a broken heart may surely be forgiven!
But, hark! I hear the pleasant "Chimes" come pealing on the air;
"Dearly, Dearly," say the "Bells," repeating Lilian's prayer!
And yonder is the bright-eyed Meg, as fair a maid as ere
The holly wove at Christmas-tide to deck the parting year;
And see, beside the joyous girl, the gladdened father stands,
Her glowing face the while compressed within his toil-some hands!
Lives there a philosophic Cute on such a scene would frown,
And seek to elevate mankind by putting feeling "down?"
Yes; there be they, and not a few, whose cold, dry hearts would check
These bursts of tender passion that ennoble Trotty Veck.
Ah! Toby Veck, "a good heart keep," repress that heavy sigh,
Thou hast in such a daughter's care what gold can never buy!
Indeed you "have some business here," for God is over all,
And loves thy humble hearth above the gloss of Bowley Hall!

Oh, Boz, thou good Samaritan, those Christmas Tales of thine,
In breasts a sordid world has bruised, distill the oil and wine!
And either sex, and every rank, brisk Youth and hoary Age,
Like Christian, feel their burden drop as they peruse thy page.
I own my debt; and while I live my love will not conceal
For him who rings the Christmas Bells with such a glorious peal:
Who spreads a feast for Toil and Want, and bids the proud go see
If Wealth and Rank taste purer joys than honest Poverty;
Who strikes with wondrous power the chord each human breast within,
Whose throb is Nature's magic touch that makes the world akin.



He who has made so many blest; whose wit and pathos move
The sternest souls to tenderness, is worthy of our love.
And long may you deserve it, Boz—long may you live to find
How greatly genius, moralized, can benefit mankind.
We wept when noble Thackeray exchanged the laurel wreath
That bound his manly forehead for the cypress crown of Death:
We grieve that classic Lytton's pen of late has nothing writ,
And ask that polished son of Song "What will he Do with It?"
But while we mourn this twofold loss, our hearts do not forget
That on thy cheek—and breast—dear Boz, the rose is blooming yet!
And oh! we trust that tireless brain, now in meridian glow,
May long retain its present might, and never fall below;
And e'er the Summer's leaf is twirled in Autumn's frolic wind,
To us be borne fresh evidence of that exhaustless mind.

We hope you've passed a pleasant time; and, as we Yankees say,
Who always have an eye to gain, that you have "made it pay."
Our country's feasts and finances in every town you've seen,
And doubtless know which you prefer—our canvas-back or green;
But as you've made a fair return, whatever your success,
I'm sure there beats no honest heart can wish it had been less.
So farewell, Boz! take home our love; and don't forget to tell
John Bull that Brother Jonathan has used you passing well.
Though oft we disagree with John, and vent an angry word,
We'd sooner grasp his burly hand than cross with him the sword;
However wide our views may be, whiche'er may have the right,
We'd rather pledge him in a glass than meet him in the fight:
But not from fear, as John will own; but that we ne'er forget
The blood that warmed him into life throbs in our bosoms yet!

THE MOONSTONE.

BY WILKIE COLLINS.

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," etc.

Printed from the Author's Manuscript.

RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.

CHAPTER IV.—(Continued.)

I OCCUPIED the parlor floor at that period of my residence in London. The front parlor was my sitting-room. Very small, very low in the ceiling, very poorly furnished—but oh, so neat! I looked into the passage to see which of Lady Verinder's servants had asked for me. It was the young footman, Samuel—a civil, fresh-colored person, with a teachable look and a very obliging manner. He always felt a spiritual interest in Samuel, and a wish to try him with a few serious words. On this occasion I invited him into my sitting-room.

He came in, with a large parcel under his arm. When he put the parcel down it appeared to frighten him. "My lady's love, Miss; and it was to say that you would find a letter inside." Having given that message, the fresh-colored young footman surprised me by looking as if he would have liked to run away.

I detained him to make a few kind inquiries. Could I see my aunt, if I called in Montagu Square? No: she had gone out for a drive. Miss Rachel had gone with her, and Mr. Ablewhite had taken a seat in the carriage too. Knowing how sadly dear Mr. Godfrey's charitable work was in arrear, I thought it odd that he should be going out driving, like an idle man. I stopped Samuel at the door, and made a few more kind inquiries. Miss Rachel was going to a ball that night, and Mr. Ablewhite had arranged to come to coffee and go with her. There was a morning concert understood for to-morrow, and Samuel was ordered to take places for a large party, including a place for Mr. Ablewhite.

"All the tickets may be gone, Miss," said this innocent youth, "if I don't run and get them at once!" He ran as he said the words—and I found myself alone again, with some anxious thoughts to occupy me.

We had a special meeting of the Mothers'-Small-Clothes-Conversion-Society, that night, summoned expressly with a view to obtaining Mr. Godfrey's advice and assistance. Instead of sustaining our sisterhood, under an overwhelming flow of Drawers which had quite prostrated our little community, he had arranged to take coffee in Montagu Square, and to go to a ball afterward! The afternoon of the next day had been selected for the Festival of the British-Ladies'-Servants'-Sunday-Sweetness-Supervision-Society. Instead of being present, the life and soul of that struggling Institution, he had engaged to make one of a party of worldlings at a morning concert! I asked myself, What did it mean? Alas! it meant that our Christian Hero was to reveal himself to me in a new character, and to become associated in my mind with one of the most awful backslidings of modern times.

To return, however, to the history of the passing day. On finding myself alone in my room, I naturally turned my attention to the parcel which appeared to have so strangely intimidated the fresh-colored young footman. Had my aunt sent me my promised legacy? and had it taken the form of cast-off clothes, or worn-out silver spoons, or unfashionable jewelry, or any thing of that sort? Prepared to accept all, and to resent nothing, I opened the parcel—and what met my view? The twelve precious publications which I had scattered through the house on the previous day; all returned to me by the doctor's orders! Well might the youthful Samuel shrink when he brought his parcel into my room! Well might he run when he had performed his miserable errand! As to my aunt's letter it simply astounded, poor soul, to this—that she dare not disobey her medical man.

What was to be done now? With my training and my principles, I never had a moment's doubt.

Once self-supported by conscience, once embarked on a career of manifest usefulness, the true Christian never yields. Neither public nor private influences produce the slightest effect on us, when we have once got our mission. Taxation may be the consequence of a mission; riots may be the consequence of a mission; wars may be the consequence of a mission: we go on with our work, irrespective of every human consideration which moves the world outside us. We are above reason: we are beyond ridicule; we see with nobody's eyes, we hear with nobody's ears, we feel with nobody's hearts but our own. Glorious, glorious privilege! And where is it earned? Ah, my friends, you may spare yourselves the useless inquiry! We are the only people who can earn it—for we are the only people who are always right.

In the case of my misguided aunt, the form which pious perseverance was next to take revealed itself to me plainly enough.

Preparation by clerical friends had failed, owing to Lady Verinder's own reluctance. Preparation by books had failed, owing to the doctor's infidel obstinacy. So be it! What was the next thing to try? The next thing to try was—Preparation by Little Notes. In other words, the books themselves having been sent back, select extracts from the books, copied out by different hands, and all addressed as letters to my aunt, were, some to be sent by post, and some to be distributed about the house on with the tea, as adopted on the previous day. As letters they would excite no suspicion; as letters they would be opened—and, once opened, might be read. Some of them I wrote myself. "Dear aunt, may I ask your attention to a few lines?" etc. "Dear aunt, I was reading last night, and I chanced on the following passage," etc. Other letters were written for me, by my valued fellow-workers, the sisterhood at the Mothers'-Small-Clothes. "Dear Madam, pardon the interest taken in you by a true, though humble, friend." "Dear Madam, may a serious person surprise you by saying a few cheering words?" Using these and other similar forms of courteous appeal, we introduced all my precious passages under a form which not even the doctor's watchful materialism could suspect. Before the second day had closed around us I had a dozen awakening letters for my aunt, instead of a dozen awakening books. Six I made myself responsible for sending through the post, and six I kept in my pocket for personal distribution in the house the next day.

Soon after two o'clock I was again on the field of pious conflict, addressing more kind inquiries to Samuel at the door. He looked at me.

My aunt had had a bad night. She was again in the room in which I had witnessed her Will-making on the 24th, and was trying to get a little sleep. I said I would wait in the library, on the chance of seeing her. In the fervor of my zeal to distribute the letters, I had quite omitted to inquire about Rachel. The house was quiet, and it was past the hour at which the musical performance began. I took it for granted that she and her party of pleasure-seekers (Mr. Godfrey, alas! included) were all at the concert, and eagerly devoted myself to my good work, while time and opportunity were still at my own disposal.

My aunt's correspondence of the morning—including the six awakening letters which I had posted overnight—was lying unopened on the library table. She had evidently not felt herself equal to dealing with a large mass of letters—and she might be daunted by the number of them, if she entered the library later in the day. I put one of my second set of six letters on the chimney-piece by itself; leaving it to attract her curiosity, by means of its solitary position, apart from the rest. A second letter I put purposely on the floor in the breakfast-room. The first servant who went in after me would conclude that my aunt had dropped it, and would be specially careful to restore it to her. The field thus sown on the basement story, I ran lightly up stairs to scatter my mercies next over the drawing-room floor.

Just as I entered the front-room I heard a double knock at the street-door—a soft, fluttering, considerate little knock. Before I could think of slipping back to the library (in which I was supposed to be waiting) the active young footman was in the hall, answering the door. It mattered little, as I thought. In my aunt's state of health visitors in general were not admitted. To my horror and amazement the familiar roar of the soft little knock proved to be an exception to general rules. Samuel's voice below me (after apparently answering some questions which I did not hear) said, unmistakably, "Up stairs, if you please, Sir." The next moment I heard footsteps—a man's footsteps—approaching the drawing-room door. Who could this favored male visitor possibly be? Almost as soon as I asked myself the question the answer occurred to me. Who could it be but the doctor?

In the case of any other visitor I should have allowed myself to be discovered in the drawing-room. There would have been nothing out of the common in my having got tired of the library, and having gone up stairs for a change. But my own self-respect stood in the way of my meeting the person who had insulted me by sending me back my books. I slipped into the little third room, which I have mentioned as communicating with the back drawing-room, and dropped the curtains which closed the open doorway. If I only waited there for a minute or two, the usual result in such cases would take place. That is to say, the doctor would be conducted to his patient's room.

I waited a minute or two, and more than a minute or two. I heard the visitor walking restlessly backward and forward. I also heard him talking to himself. I even thought I recognized the voice. Had I made a mistake? Was it not the doctor, but somebody else? Mr. Bruff, for instance? No! an unerring instinct told me it was not Mr. Bruff. Whoever he was, he was still talking to himself. I parted the heavy curtains the least little morsel in the world, and listened.

The words I heard were, "I'll do it to-day!" And the voice that spoke them was Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite's.

CHAPTER V.

MY hand dropped from the curtain. But don't suppose that I—or any virtuous—that the dreadful embarrassment of my situation was the uppermost idea in my mind! So fervent still was the sisterly interest I felt in Mr. Godfrey that I never stopped to ask myself why he was not at the concert. No! I thought only of the words—the startling words—which had just fallen from his lips. He would do it to-day. He had said, in a tone of terrible resolution, he would do it to-day. What, oh, what, would he do! Something even more deplorably unworthy of him than what he had done already? Would he apostatize from the faith? Would he abandon us at the Mothers'-Small-Clothes? Had we seen the last of his angelic smile in the committee-room? Had we heard the last of his unrivaled eloquence at Exeter Hall? I was so wrought up by the bare idea of such awful eventualities as those, in connection with such a man, that I believe I should have rushed from my place of concealment, and implored him in the name of all the Ladies' Committees in London to explain himself—when I suddenly heard another voice in the room. It penetrated through the curtains; it was loud, it was bold, it was wanting in every female charm. The voice of Rachel Verinder!

"Why have you come up here, Godfrey?" she asked. "Why didn't you go into the library?"

He laughed softly, and answered, "Miss Clack is in the library."

"Clack in the library!" She instantly seated herself on the ottoman in the back drawing-room. "You are quite right, Godfrey. We had much better stop here."

I had been in a burning fever a moment since, and in some doubt what to do next. I became extremely cold now, and felt no doubt whatever. To show myself after what I had heard, was impossible. To retreat—except into the fire-place—was equally out of the question. A martyrdom was before me. In justice to myself, I ruthlessly arranged the curtains so that I could both see and hear. And then I met my martyrdom with the spirit of a primitive Christian.

"Don't sit on the ottoman," the young lady proceeded. "Bring a chair, Godfrey. I like people to be opposite to me when I talk to them."

He took the nearest seat. It was a low chair. He was very tall, and many sizes too large for it. I never saw his legs to such disadvantage before.

"Well?" she went on. "What did you say to them?"

"Just what you said, dear Rachel, to me."

"That mamma was not at all well to-day? And that I didn't quite like leaving her to go to the concert?"

"Those were the words. They were grieved to lose you at the concert, but they quite understood. All sent their love; and all expressed a gleaming belief that Lady Verinder's indisposition would soon pass away."

"You don't think it's serious, do you, Godfrey?"

"Far from it! In a few days, I feel quite sure, all will be well again."

"I think so, too. I was a little frightened at first, but I think so too. It was very kind to go and make my excuses for me to people who are almost strangers to you. But why not have gone with them to the concert? It seems very hard that you should miss the music, too."

"Don't say that, Rachel! If you only knew how much happier I am—here, with you!"

He clasped his hands, and looked at her. In the position which he occupied, when he did that, he turned my way. Can words describe how I sickened when I noticed exactly the same pathetic expression on his face, which had characterized me when he was pleading for destitute millions of his fellow-creatures on the platform at Exeter Hall!

"It's hard to get over one's bad habits, Godfrey. But do try to get over the habit of paying compliments—do to please me."

"I never paid you a compliment, Rachel, in my life. Successful love may sometimes use the language of flattery, I admit. But hopeless love, dearest, always speaks the truth."

He drew his chair close, and took her hand, when he said "hopeless love." There was a momentary silence. He who thrilled every body had doubtless thrilled her. I thought I now understood the words which had dropped from him when he was alone in the drawing-room. "I'll do it to-day." Alas! the most rigid propriety could hardly have failed to discover that he was doing it now.

"Have you forgotten what we agreed on, Godfrey, when you spoke to me in the country? We agreed that we were to be cousins, and nothing more."

"I break the agreement, Rachel, every time I see you."

"Then don't see me."

"Quite useless! I break the agreement every time I think of you. Oh, Rachel! how kindly you told me, only the other day, that my place in your estimation was a higher place than it had ever been yet! Am I mad to hold the hope I do on those dear words? Am I mad to dream of some future day when your heart may soften to me? Don't tell me so, if I am! Leave me my delusion, dearest! I must have that to cherish, and to comfort me, if I have nothing else?"

"MAY MODESTY MENTION THAT HE PUT HIS ARMS ROUND HER NEXT?"

His voice trembled, and he put his white handkerchief to his eyes. Exeter Hall again! Nothing wanting to complete the parallel but the audience, the cheers, and the glass of water.

Even her elaborate nature was touched. I saw her lean a little nearer to him. I heard a new tone of interest in her next words.

"Are you really sure, Godfrey, that you are as fond of me as that?"

"Sure! You know what I was, Rachel. Let me tell you what I am. I have lost every interest in life, but my interest in you. A transformation has come over me which I can't account for, myself. Would you believe it? My charitable business is an unendurable nuisance to me; and what is a Ladies' Committee now, I wish to heaven? I am myself at the uttermost ends of the earth!"

If the annals of apostasy offer any thing comparable to such a declaration as that, I can only say that the case in point is not producible from the stores of my reading. I thought of the Members'-Small-Clothes. I thought of the Sunday-Sweetheart-Supervision. I thought of the other Societies, too numerous to mention, all built up on this man as on a tower of strength. I thought of the struggling Female Boards, who, so to speak, bore their bread and butter business-like through the nostrils of Mr. Godfrey—of that same Mr. Godfrey who had just received out good work as a proof that he had declared that he wished he was at the uttermost ends of the earth when he found himself in our company! My young female breast will feel encouraged to persevere, when I mention that it tried even my discipline before I could devour my own righteous indignation in silence.

At the same time, it is only just fice to myself to add, that I didn't lose a syllable of the conversation. Rachel was the next to speak.

"You have made your confession," she said. "I wonder what I should make you say if your unhappy attachment to me, if I made mine?"

He started. I confess I started too. He thought, and I thought, that she was about to divulge the mystery of the Moonstone.

"Would you think, to look at me," she went on, "that I am the wretchedest girl living? It's true, Godfrey. What greater wretchedness can there be than to live degraded in your own estimation? That is my life now."

"My dear Rachel! it's impossible you can have any reason to speak of yourself in that way!"

"How do you know? I have no reason?"

"Can you ask me the question? I know it, because I know you. Your silence, dearest, has never lowered you in the estimation of one of your friends. The disappearance of your precious birthday gift may seem strange; your unexplained connection with that event may seem stranger still—"

"Are you speaking of the Moonstone, Godfrey?"

"I certainly thought that you referred—"

"I referred to nothing of the sort. I can hear of the loss of the Moonstone, let who will speak of it, without feeling degraded in my own estimation. If the story of the Diamond ever comes to light, it will be known that I accepted a dreadful responsibility; it will be known that I involved myself in the keeping of a miserable secret—and it will be clear as the sun at noonday that I did nothing mean! You have not understood me, Godfrey. It is my fault for not speaking out plainly. Cost me what it may, I will be plainer now. Suppose you were not in love with me? Suppose you were in love with some other woman?"

"Yes?"

"Suppose you discovered that woman to be utterly unworthy of you? Suppose you were quite convinced that it was a disgrace to you to waste another thought on her? Suppose you bare idea of ever marrying such a person made your face burn, only with thinking of it?"

"Yes?"

"And, suppose, in spite of all that—you couldn't tear her from your heart? Suppose the feeling that you sound in you (at the time when you believed in her) was a feeling not to be bidden? Suppose the love this wretch had inspired in you—Oh, how can I find words to say it in! How can I make a woman understand that a feeling which horrifies me at myself can be a feeling that fascinates me at the same time? It is the breath of my life, Godfrey, and it's the poison that kills me—both in one! Go away! Leave me out of my mind! I think I am talking now. No! you mustn't leave me—you mustn't carry away a wrong impression. I must not and shall not be said in my own defence. Mind this! He doesn't know—he never will know, what I have told you. I will answer for him—I don't care what happens—I will never, never, never see him again! Don't ask me his name! Don't ask me any more! Let's change the subject. Are you doctor enough, Godfrey, to tell me why I feel as if I was stifling for want of breath? Is there a form of hysterics that bursts into words instead of tears? I dare say! What does it matter? You will get over my trouble I have confessed you, easily enough now. I have dropped to my right place in your estimation, haven't I? Don't notice me! Don't pity me! For God's sake, go away!"

She turned round on a sudden, and beat her hands wildly on the back of the ottoman. Her head drooped on the cushions; and she burst out crying. Before I had time to feel shocked at this, I was horror-struck by an entirely unexpected proceeding on the part of Mr. Godfrey. Will it be credited that he fell on his knees at her feet?—on both knees, I solemnly declare! May mercy mention that he put his arm round her neck? And may reluctant admiration acknowledge that he electrified her with two words?

"Noble creature!"

No more than that! But he did it with one of the bursts which have made his fame as a public speaker. She sat, white quite thunder-struck, or quite fascinated?—I cannot know which—without even making an effort to put his arms back where his arms ought to have been. As for me, my sense of propriety was completely bewildered. I was so painfully uncertain whether it was my first duty to close my eyes, or to stop my ears, that I did neither. I attribute my being still able to hold the curtain in the right position for looking and listening, entirely to suppressed hysterics. In suppressed hysterics I was also overcome by the doctors, that one must hold something.

"Yes," he said, with all the fascination of his evangelical voice and manner, "you are a noble creature! A woman who can speak the truth, for the truth's sake—a woman who will not sacrifice her pride, rather than sacrifice an honest man who loves her—is the most priceless of all treasures. Such a woman deserves, if her husband only wins her esteem and regard, he wins enough to ennoble his whole life. You have spoken, dearest, of your place in my estimation. Judge what that place is—when I implore you on my knees, to let the care of your poor wounded heart be mine! Rachel! will you honor me, will you bless me, by being my wife?"

By this time I should certainly have decided on stopping my ears, if Rachel had not encouraged me to keep them open, by answering him in the first sensible words I had heard fall from her lips.

"Godfrey!" she said, "you must be mad!"

"I never spoke more reasonably, dearest—in your interests, as well as in mine. Look for a moment to the future. As your husband, I am the sacrificed man who has never known how you feel toward him, and whom you are resolved never to see again. I am the man who will be able to forget this ill-fated attachment? and is forgetfulness to be found in the life you are leading now? You have told me the truth, and you are wearing it already. Surround yourself with nobler interests than the wretched interests of the world. A heart like yours and hands like yours, are created for the holiest employment—a home whose peaceful claims and happy duties win gently on you day by day—try the consolation, Rachel, which is to be found little! I don't ask for your love—I will be content with your affection and regard. Let the rest be left, confidently left, to Time. Time will bring round you the calm that heals even wounds as deep as yours."

She began to yield already. Oh, what a bringing up she must have had! Oh, how differently I should have acted in her place!

"Don't tempt me, Godfrey," she said; "I am wretched enough and reckless enough as it is. Don't tempt me to be more wretched and more reckless still!"

"One question, Rachel. Have you any personal objection to me?"

"If I should tell you. After what you have just said to me, I should be insensible indeed if I didn't respect and admire you as well."

"Do you think you can ever like me, Rachel, who respect and admire their husbands? And yet they and their husbands get on very well. Many happy homes in the world are built on that world hear inspection by the men who take them there? And yet it doesn't end unhappily somewhere further on in the conjugal settlement yogs on. The truth is, that women try marriage as a Refuge, far more numerously than they are willing to admit; and, in the long run, it is found that marriage has justified their confidence in it. Look at your own case once again. At your age, and with your attractions, is it possible for you to sentence yourself to a single life? Trust my knowledge of the world—nothing is less possible. It is merely a question of time. Time will marry some other man, some years hence. Or you may marry the man, dearest, who is now at your feet, and who places your interests and happiness above the love of any other woman on the face of the earth."

"Godfrey, Godfrey! you are putting something into my head which I never thought of before. You are tempting me with a new prospect, when all my other prospects are closed. Suppose I were to tell you again, I am miserable enough and desperate enough, if you say another word, to marry you on your own terms. Take me—marrying and go!"

I won't even risk from my knees till you have said yes!"

"If I say yes you will repent, and I shall repent what it is to say!"

"We shall both bless the day, darling, when I pressed, and when you yielded."

"Do you feel as confidently as you speak?"

"You shall judge for yourself. I speak from what I have seen in my own family. Tell me when you think of our household at Frizinghall. Do my father and mother live unhappily together?"

"Far from it—so far as I can see."

"When my mother was a girl, Rachel (it is no secret in the family), she had loved as you have—had given her heart to a man who was unworthy of her. She married my father, respecting him, admiring him, but nothing more. I saw you again and again, Rachel. Is there no encouragement in it for you and for me?"

"You won't hurry me, Godfrey?"

"My time shall be yours."

"You won't ask me for more than I can give?"

"My angel! I only ask you to give me yourself."

"Take me!"

In those two words she accepted him!

I have been lavish—heaven knows!—of unholy rapture this time. He drew her nearer and nearer to him till her face touched his; and then— No! I really can not prevail upon myself to carry this shocking disclosure any farther. Let me only say that I tried to close my eyes before it happened, and that I was just one moment too late. I had calculated, you see, on her resisting. She submitted. To every right-feeling person of my own sex volumes could say no more.

Even my innocence in such matters began to see its way to the end of the interview now. They moved each other so thoroughly by this time that I fully expected to see them walk off together, and be married. They remained, however, judging by Mr. Godfrey's next words, to be one more trifling formality which I am forbidden to observe. He seated himself—unforbidden this time—on the ottoman by her side. "Shall I speak to your dear mother?" he asked. "Or will you?"

She declined both alternatives.

"Let my mother hear nothing from either of us until she is better. I wish it to be kept a secret for the present, Godfrey. Go now, and come back this evening." We have been here then together quite long enough."

She rose, and, in rising, looked for the first time toward the little room in which my martyrdom was going on.

"Who has drawn those curtains?" she exclaimed. "The room is close enough, as it is, without keeping the air out of it in that way."

She advanced to the curtains. At the moment when she laid her hand on them—at the moment when she laid her hand on them—at the moment when she laid her hand on them—a pause of one appeased to be quite inevitable—the voice of the fresh-colored young footman, on the stairs, suddenly announced my father and mother.

I remained where I was, however, and free to go down stairs by the back way, quite unobserved.

Mr. Godfrey passed me in the hall, hurrying out, to fetch the doctor. "Go in, and keep Rachel up!" he said, pointing to the room. I found Rachel on her knees by the sofa, with her mother's head in her lap. Love look at my aunt's face (knowing what I knew) was enough to warn me of the dreadful truth. I kept my thoughts to myself until the doctor came in. He was not long before he arrived. He began by sending Rachel out of the room—and then he looked at my aunt. One look at Yevindale was more. Serious persons, in search of proofs of hardened skepticism, may be interested in hearing that he showed no signs of remorse when he looked at Me.

At a later hour I peeped into the breakfast-room and the library. My aunt had died without opening one of the letters which I had addressed to her. I was so shocked at this that I never ventured to look at my own diary afterward, that she had also died without giving me my little legacy.

UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

IT was after banking-hours, and Marvin Winkle's house had become still. An hour or so the upper step of the back piazza without speaking. He was timing the bees that flew to and fro between Deacon Gilder's hives and the sweet scarlet roses hedging in the brick-walk that led from the little side-gate around to the kitchen-door.

Suddenly he pushed back his straw-hat. "Holloa, Clara! What is up?" he cried.

Evidently Clara herself, for one thing, was up; for immediately there was a stir in the small summer parlor and a face looked through the window opening upon the piazza, with a rising reflection in it. A pretty, rounded face, lighted up by a gentle gray eyes, and a warm, ready smile; and belonging to Marvin Hillhouse's sister, Mrs. Forsythe.

"Poleg is out to-day with a basket and his umbrella. Any body going to be married?" continued Marvin, lifting his eyes on one bee a little busier than its fellows, but fluttered off and returned to the hive as usual, again, to the open heart of a half-blown rose.

"Mrs. Dunks didn't know it this morning when she came for the receipt for it. She just mistrusts there is something between that young clerk at Fodder's book-store and Florence Bell, but that was all she could broach," replied Mrs. Forsythe, with the ready smile.

"Then it can't be a wedding," returned her brother. "Florence Bell would suppose any body could get so far on even a quilting-party without Marm Dunks's knowing it. There he comes! He has been gone six minutes and a quarter," he added, quickly.

Mrs. Forsythe put her head a little farther from the window. "How absent-minded he is! Sees incredulously at a bee just losing itself in the scarlet neck of a honey-cup that grew on a stalk of tulips at the foot of the piazza. "Just as though you could know one bee from another, when they are coming and going constantly."

Marvin smiled, presently, when he was interrupted by the sound of the gate opening and falling together again; and immediately a blue cotton umbrella came around the lilac-bushes at the corner of the house. So instead of words of wisdom on the science of aviology, the open mouth only dropped the commonplace. "Is this you, Pelog? What you got there?"

Poleg, who walked under the blue umbrella, and was Mrs. Dunks's eldest and only son, wore a full suit of white linen even to gloves, and carried a new parchment basket-lined for although he was every body's errand-boy and man-of-all-work, he held himself, personally, exceedingly high.

"It is a note or billet from Mrs. Cahoon to her son's wooden-working. "N. J." in the counsmeans 'no presents,' they don't want any brought. Next Wednesday will be five years since their son was married, and that is why the cards are grained," explained Poleg, in his genteelest tone.

"Just so," replied Marvin Hillhouse, holding his hand for the card. "And that is why you had your hair shingled, I suppose, and that shaving hanging to your coat."

Poleg looked over his shoulder in dandyish horror; then smiled a smile that made his mouth look like a dentist's office.

"You're a one-old, isn't it, Mr. Hillhouse?" said he, starting off with the air of heading a procession.

He turned upon himself before marching entirely around behind the lilacs: "It is a warm day," he said, with the appearance of taking off his profanation, as he wiped his face daintily with the perfumed handkerchief.

But in truth Mrs. Dunks had good reason for not coming in with her generous tongue. She was at that instant polishing silver in Mrs. Cahoon's bath-pantry, with her head covered up in puckers and wrinkles, answering to every motion of her hands. When she did any thing she always did it by rule; how she knew why, and the basier she worked the faster she talked.

"I should say a pyramid of colored c-cream on a glass dish in the table, one white and one pink, if you please, would make a good show, and be quite a set-off. My Poleg tells me that is how Fodder's Bell ornamented their table last Easter's Day. Poleg was there to wait on the door and keep up the fires and such. I don't know how it is, Mrs. Cahoon, but I am satisfied with pride, "but somehow, nothing can come off without my Poleg having a hand in; so I most generally know from him what's what, and who's who.

"That is a very pretty notion about the ice-cream. I never knew where the fritters got theirs?" said Mrs. Cahoon, who was busy grating, sometimes cocoa-nut and sometimes her fingers.

"At Rabbit's party. He gets up the biggest best of any body in the place, and full as reasonable, too, if not more so.

"I'll ask Mrs. Cahoon to speak to Macomb about it to-night. We are a little straitened for time, Mrs. Dunks, not making up our minds to give the party at this time till most to-day. But sending to Riverview for the fancy cakes and confectionery takes off a great deal, so I guess we'll get through with it. I am glad you spoke about the ice-cream," said Mrs. Cahoon, who was thankful to get any suggestions; for, to tell the truth, she was a dismal mess at home in dishing-up dinners for a table full of hungry men that she was in the elegances of fashionable life.

For thirty years she had looked after the picking of pork, the fattening of pigs and poultry, and the killing and salting of meats in a single family; keeping at the same time a sharp and capable eye on her husband's lumber-yard and sawmill. And now, having made a fortune they had bought the handsomest house in Hanfield, and were trying to spread themselves out in a style become their money. They were received at once into society, and treated with all the attention due so many dukes; the Presbyterians vying with the Congregationalists to be first in making the new-comers feel at home each in their own church.

The Cahoughons has all been very kind, and we want to show them some attention in return; so we are going to make this party on a grand scale. I shall take in all," said Mrs. Cahoon, with condescending confidence to Mrs. Dunks; and thus directly to the whole parish, for Mrs. Dunks was as good a conductor as a telegraph-wire.

At this moment, however, the confidence was cut off by the jangling of the back-door knocker. Mrs. Cahoon happened to be passing the door at the instant with her pan of grated cocoa-nut in her hand, and her married neighbor, Mrs. Forsythe, standing outside.

"Mrs. Cahoon," said she. She had a habit of introducing herself since coming into a community of strangers, and with a polite little courtesy, partly in respect for herself, and partly in respect for others. "I was just passing, and so I opened the door myself," she continued, in a tone of apology, "and as I was asked in, with a friendly manner, "Come in and take a look over the house, Mrs. Forsythe!"

"Mrs. Cahoon," said she, "I can't stop now. I just ran over to say if you wish for extra milk, more than you can get from your milkman, we can supply you, as we keep a cow and have an abundance."

"I am much obliged, I am sure, ma'am. The neighbors are very kind, and I still mean I can get homesick for the old place if I try, though there are some things I miss. But you just come in and see the house, for while we have fixed it up so it is quite tenable now."

"Not to-day, thank you, Mrs. Cahoon. I left company at home, and I know you are busy. Besides you remember I have been over it once; it is a very nice house, and I hope you will enjoy it," said Mrs. Forsythe, beginning to move away.

But Mrs. Cahoon was not to be shorn of her hospitality. "Mr. Cahoon expects me to show the house to every body who calls. Come," said she, so decidedly that Mrs. Forsythe could not she must follow. "Up stairs, down stairs, and in my lady's chamber," where every thing was finished and furnished with all the magnificence that the upholsterer could suggest and money could pay for; but where refined tastes and practiced fingers never followed with their softening touches. The establishment was grand as a first-class wareroom; but no more homelike.

"These carpets is velvet, and cost us six hundred dollars in New York," said the show-woman, expert with frequent practice. "We are told, and by them that we thought knew, that Mrs. Fluffer has the next best carpet in town, and hers only cost five hundred. And the style of this room," she continued, opening a door into a chamber, finished on wainscot and moulding in papier-maché, and furnished with rose-colored damask, "the architecture tells us is entirely unquique. This picture we bought of the painter himself, and it represents a display of the Erroria Borealis. We are told the frame is the most expensive in the county; but I suppose we got it rather under. It saves, you know, not take quite so much money as you think it will cost. Sometimes they will let you off a little. However, with all our savings here and there, Mr. Cahoon says twenty thousand won't cover our expenses this year; but then we can afford it. Take care! You are treading on that mat," she cried out, suddenly, jumping expertly over a fluff of white down that looked like a thistle-ball, lying on the carpet by the front-parlor door, as she spoke.

And then having made the entire round from garret to basement, Mrs. Cahoon opened the front-door and courtesied out her visitor. After that she hurried back to the kitchen.

"These calls are such a put-out to a body's work, and you can't know when to expect them any more than when thunder is coming," said she, with a resigned sigh.

Mrs. Cahoon's gentility sat upon her something like her bonnet which was made by an artist, and cost as much as half the bonnets in church put together; but which had the effect of a hornet's nest blown upon her head by the northwest wind There are many things "you can not buy with gold," beside "the old association."

"If I had come from common country life into a handsome town-estate I wouldn't make any pretensions, but just go around with grass in my mouth and done with it," said Marvin Hillhouse, when Mrs. Forsythe came home with the story of her neighborly call.

Meantime Mrs. Cahoon, serenely unconscious of having produced any but a dazzling impression, was once more absorbed in the preparations for her grand party; but she found other obstacles in the way besides the entertainment of visitors, as a cow trying on the airs of a gazelle would be likely to. And nothing went as it should. The oysters were all spoiled in the pickling, the blanc-mange wouldn't thicken and then got too thick; and the cake came out of the oven looking like the face of the earth in the time of Korah.

"However," said Mrs. Cahoon, cheerfully, "I can cover the frissures with a good thick frosting, and after it is cut they will never be noticed in the world. That is the economy of cake-baskets, you can use up the pieces. We don't need to think of economy to be sure," she added, recollecting herself, "but then the time is worth saving."

So she heaped on the icing till it stood up like the Chinese wall, and then it was obstinate and wouldn't dry. There it was Wednesday morning, just as soft as ever, simply sugar and egg-froth, and putting it into the oven to harden, Mrs. Cahoon went off to show the house to a young girl who had come in with a basket of rare flowers. She was courtesying her out in nervous haste when Mrs. Dunks came flurrying up the marble-flagged walk, with a little dried-up rustle and whisk like a dead leaf blown by the wind.

"I called over to see if I could be of any service," said she. "I have set out Peleg's dinner—though as for the matter of that, if my Peleg is put to 't he can get up as nice a meal as I can myself—and Dunks, he is to work for Fluffer's folks to-day, cutting the grass in their orchard-piece, and he took a bite of something along with him. So, says I, I will clap on my things and step up to Mrs. Cahoon's. Be sure she has maids enough, but maids is maids, and they need close looking after. So here I be, and I will stay and help if you say the word."

"Certainly, Mrs. Dunks. You are very kind, as all the neighbors is, and I am glad you come: though we made no such assignment," replied Mrs. Cahoon, too proud to acknowledge the relief she really felt.

Then a man came with some baskets of crockery, and so Mrs. Dunks made her way into the house and kitchen alone. She came back immediately.

"The cake is all burned to a crips as sure as you are born!" she cried. "I smelled it momentarily I crossed the thrashold. It seems Sara Jane came down stairs and built a rousing fire the first thing, without noticing what was in the oven, any thing about it. One loaf and ma'be two will possibly make a do of it; take and frost them over again; but that is all. We'll have to spring around and make some more before the cat can mew twice."

The cat mewed a great many times before the cake was ready, and then it proved the oysters were sour; and at Hanfield, people no more thought of a party without scalloped oysters than they did of a party without guests. But blessed be the man who invented saleratus; mind triumphed over matter, and the scallops and oyster-pies came out "sweet as a rose," said Mrs. Dunks. "And now how about the tables? Supposing we set them at once, and have that done."

Mrs. Cahoon assented, and soon the dining-room was magnificent in all the glory of silver services, frosted cakes, fruits, and vases of bright flowers. The mistress of this splendor stood looking at it as proud as Nebuchadnezzar, when suddenly there came a crashing sound and a muffled scream, followed by a fall of mortar, dropping in little lumps, and flying in a gritty shower over frostings and fruits. Mrs. Cahoon looked up in horror, and saw in the centre of the stuccoed wreath of corn and grapes and apples, a foot and ankle clothed in a number eight shoe and heavy blue stocking, that bore an unmistakable likeness to the shoe and stocking of the luckless Sara Jane. It seemed in going hastily across the unfloored chamber above the dining-room upon the rafters, she had stepped off upon the light lathing between, and before she could catch her balance had literally got her foot in it, spraining her ankle in the operation.

But Mrs. Dunks, whose ingenuity would have kept her dangling about the patent-office, to her cost and her torment, if she had had the misfortune to be of the inventing gender, skillfully pasted over the aperture with white paper, that if nobody took particular observation the fracture would not be especially noticeable. And under her persistent fingers the table was presently looking as gorgeously as ever, though there might perchance be an unpleasant grittiness about the icing here and there.

And at last Lyra and Venus came out, singing as they shone, and, looking through the three-hundred dollar lace curtains, they saw Mrs. Cahoon dressed in fen-colored moiré antique, courtesying to her "neighbors;" presenting her son and his wife who were the passive pivot around which this party—in its character of a wooden-wedding—was supposed to revolve; and her eldest daughter, "Miss Deela." Miss Deela was an unformed rose-bud, at the age when the features are much too large for the face, and there is always an appearance of being mounted on a foot-stool; and the married son looked as though he had much rather be handling mill-logs than white gloves.

As for Mrs. Cahoon, oppressed with her own greatness, she escaped as soon as possible into the kitchen, where her heart and thoughts had been all the while. And she dawned upon that horizon in good time.

"Land alive!" she cried, dropping her manners in the parlor with her last courtesy, "what smells so?"

Sniffing around she opened at last the lid of the coffee-urn. "What is the matter with this coffee? Mrs. Dunks, you try some of it; I am afraid of staining my dress," said she.

"I'll be buttered," replied Mrs. Dunks, sniffing and tasting, "if the eggs Bridget settled it with wasn't bad eggs."

She didn't have to be "buttered," for "the eggs was bad," and very bad. So the next thing was to send to the store for more coffee; but most of the grocers had shut for the night, and the messenger could only get the unground coffee-beans; and Mrs. Cahoon, who had trailed her irksome magnificence back into the parlor, was presently startled by the unmistakable odor of burning coffee; not browned, but burned, black and bitter.

And then following fast after, like Job's messengers, came the boy from the express office, to say the last train was in from Riverview, and the cake and confectionery ordered was not in with it.

"And, heart alive! Why doesn't Macomb send the i-scream?" said Mrs. Dunks. "He is the greatest old laziness-on-legs you ever saw, and it is a chance if he gets it here to-night," she added, soothingly.

There were reasons thick as clovers in a summer meadow why the ice-cream had not been sent. The cow refused to give the milk, the milk refused to turn to cream, the cream refused to get into the dairy-man's can, and the can refused to stop at the restauranter's; so the restauranter was entirely free from blame, as employés always are in failures of contract. And now, after overcoming obstacles to which Columbus's little efforts at discovering us were just the wavering of a butterfly over a field of thistles, Mr. Macomb was preparing to fill his freezers.

Meanwhile midnight came and midnight went; but the later the more genteel, and at last the supper was over, the guests were gone, and there was no sound in all the stately house excepting of a rat dancing between the walls in his dainty satin slippers; for rats, like love, respect neither time nor place.

The next evening Mrs. Forsythe called, in a friendly way, to ask how Mrs. Cahoon found herself after her late exertions. She found herself really ill, it seemed, for she was lying upon a sofa with a sick-headache. But she instantly rose.

"You must go over the house," said she.

"Oh no, Mrs. Cahoon! By no means. I have been over it, you know; and if I never had, here you are not able to hold your head up," protested Mrs. Forsythe.

"That is nothing. I can stand it if you can. Come ahead," replied the hospitable mistress.

"No, but really I don't care to go. It is excessively warm, and I don't feel strong," pleaded Mrs. Forsythe, who was oppressively fleshy, and already overpowered by her walk.

"Come!" returned Mrs. Cahoon, unflinchingly. "You must see the stuff that came from Riverview by express, at any rate. It came this morning, and we paid five hundred dollars for what there is here," she continued, opening the door into the dining-room. "And now tell me, as a neighbor, if it passed off well."

As a neighbor Mrs. Forsythe assured her, pouting and perspiring while she spoke, that the evening was a complete success.

"So they tell me," replied Mrs. Cahoon, complacently.

"We had seventeen bouquets in these three rooms," added "Miss Deela," who was leading a procession of all the younger children, in this great work of showing the house.

"Seventeen, Deela? Wasn't it eighteen? counting the china osiers in the lapis lazuli vase on the double-decked bracket?" corrected the mother. Then she turned again to Mrs. Forsythe. "I am glad you think it went off well. We didn't mean to spare for the cost, and we thought the neighbors seemed to enjoy themselves," said she, making her final courtesy at the front-door.

FOLLOWING THE SUN.

THE wise little swallows—they know the time to fly!
Look, how in clouds they darken the gray November sky!
The last red leaf has fallen, the Autumn reign is done,
And they go where the Summer went, following the sun.

They leave us looking after, and sighing, "Happy things!
Would we stay in the Northland if we had your wings?
From the frozen meadows, to where the waters run,
We too would swiftly southward go, following the sun."

Why should winged creatures brood over empty nests?
Rise my thoughts, and hasten to be the Summer's guests!
For all the airy people here is comfort none,
Fly with the swallows southward then, following the sun.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

AMONG the many excellent hotels in our country, the Continental Hotel in Philadelphia has an enviable reputation. Completed and opened for occupation in the winter of 1860, it speedily won its way into public favor by its convenient, comfortable, and elegant accommodations. It has never fallen below the high standard of excellence set for itself, and the fact that it is so extensively patronized proves that the popularity of a hotel depends upon the confidence of the public in its internal arrangements.

The Continental Hotel is situated on the corner of Chestnut and Ninth streets—a most convenient locality. On these streets it is six stories in height, while on Sansom Street it is eight stories high. It is built of sandstone and brick, is sustained by richly-ornamented cast-iron piers, and the whole edifice is crowned with a heavy modillion cornice of cast-iron. The main hall on the street-floor is 185 feet in depth, in the centre of which is an open business exchange. On this floor also are the Gentlemen's Conversation Room, the Reading Room, the General Office, Wash Room for gentlemen, Coat Room, Telegraph Office, Writing Rooms, Smoking Room, Billiard Saloon, Restaurant, Newspaper Stand, etc., etc. Two special features of this building are the grand self-sustaining stairway, around which an open balcony is formed on the second story, and the vertical Railway, or Elevator, which extends from the ground-floor to the top of the house. This latter contrivance—which is based upon such mechanical principles as to insure perfect safety—appears to the casual visitor to be merely a nicely-furnished little room, into which he can step from any story, seat himself comfortably, and ascend or descend to any floor of the hotel. By this same Elevator he can also be conveyed to the spacious Observatory above the main roof, whence there is a fine view of the city and suburban localities. The large public parlors and dining-rooms are on the second-floor; and the table is supplied with every luxury the most dainty epicure could desire. The culinary department is a curiosity in itself: but the details are too numerous to come within the limits of this paragraph. Much of the cooking is done by steam, and the working portions of the house are all fire-proof. In case, however, of an alarm of fire, such arrangements are made that the whole building could be flooded with water in five minutes. Notwithstanding its size, and the number of occupants, the Continental Hotel is an unusually quiet one. The well-trained servants—of whom there are not less than three hundred employed—tread softly the thickly-carpeted corridors and stairs, and are exceedingly attentive to guests. Chancing to spend a Sabbath recently at the Continental, among numerous other little arrangements which make the stranger feel at home, we noticed the following simple announcement hanging in one of the principal corridors: "Seats reserved for our guests in —— Church." Some inferences on the moral effect of placards might be deduced from this single sentence, especially when compared with equally-conspicuous placards which greet the stranger's eye in sundry hotels farther south. It is somewhat alarming, as you follow your trunk up the stairs of a strange hotel, to see in glaring capitals on the walls, "LOCK YOUR DOOR! LOOK OUT FOR HOTEL THIEVES!" Nor is it comforting to observe the same notice in your room, to have it again intruded upon you in the parlors, and yet again in the dining-room. One feels as if he had fallen into a robber's den! While some information about the ordinary arrangements of a hotel should be placed in every room, nothing makes one feel so little at home as to have thrust upon him at every corner a list of things which he must, or must not do. We remember to have seen the bill-of-fare in a large hotel headed with these words: "Table-napkins must not be taken from the dining-room!" Probably not one in a thousand would ever have thought of doing such a thing if it had not been suggested. But the nine hundred and ninety-nine had the warning thrust in their faces during their meals, for the sake of the one. The proprietor of that hotel would have been wiser to have suffered the loss of a napkin with equanimity.

Two or three weeks ago the newspapers reported a sad account of a little girl who died from the effects of a bite received from a Newfoundland dog, with which she was frolicking, as she was in the habit of freely doing. More recently another terrible death from hydrophobia occurred in Newark. A couple of months ago a gentleman was bitten in the hand by a pet-dog while attempting to punish him. The wound was suffered to heal, and no inconvenience was felt until a short time ago, when the usual violent symptoms appeared. Death was a welcome relief to his terrible sufferings.

A matter worthy the attention of business men and others is the device of generating gas for lighting buildings by burning cheap oils. A reservoir is placed in the cellar, outbuildings, or garret, and the oil is conducted through common gas-pipes. There is no wick, no chimney, no machinery. The arrangement is simple, and is said to give a superior light at very small cost. Cities, towns, churches, houses, and factories can be lighted by this process; and being non-explosive it is perfectly safe.

Scarcely any invention could be more beneficent, or more worthy of universal adoption, than one which would effectually obviate the risks that now attend the use of steam-power. The terrible accidents that so frequently result from boiler-explosions make this a matter of public interest. Consequently our readers will be glad to know something of a new appliance called the Steam-locked Automatic Safety Valve, the practical working of which was recently exhibited in the machine foundry of Messrs. Merrick & Sons of Philadelphia. The valve attached to the boiler on this occasion was adjusted to a 60-pounds pressure—that is, when that maximum of pressure was reached the valve should open and allow the steam to escape. Great curiosity was exhibited by the spectators as to whether the instrument would vindicate its claims; but when the gauge marked exactly sixty there was a shrill blast from the valve. This "valve" is self-acting—so arranged that it is wholly independent of the agency of an engineer, who may forget himself, fall asleep, or be away from his post; the pressure in the boiler can not rise above the limit for which it is adjusted. The valve is compact, and can readily be attached to the boilers of any kind of steam-engine. If special tests prove this appliance to be what it now promises, it will meet a great public want.

A Maine man obtained, a few weeks since, a pair of fowls in Massachusetts styled Magenta, from their beautiful Magenta-colored plumage. They were universally admired, and the lucky owner engaged to sell more eggs than his handsome "biddy" could possibly have laid in a lifetime. Unfortunately the pretty pair were exposed to the damp weather, and got thoroughly wet, when the Magenta disappeared, leaving nothing but a pair of common white barn-yard fowls.

One year ago—so it is stated on good authority—a certain church in Illinois had been reduced by death, removal, and sacrifice in the army, to six female members. Four men wished to join. How should they get in? Should they form a new organization and take the ladies in with them? In that case they would forfeit the two best lots in the town. The only way was for the church to vote to receive them, and so the six voted to receive the four, and then put in their $100 on hand of society money as the first subscription for a house of worship, adding afterward $200 for the furniture, which is of the most substantial kind.

A French journal records a remarkable case of transfusion of blood. A young man who had been poisoned by carbonic acid, was found lying insensible on the floor of his room. Artificial respiration was resorted to, and by perseverance breathing was restored and the pulse returned; but two hours later the patient relapsed into a state bordering on death. Transfusion of blood was then recommended, and the effect produced was astonishing; the pulse rose at once, breathing became more regular, the eyes opened, and after a few minutes the patient was enabled to drink a little water. His state continued precarious for upward of nine hours, after which he speedily recovered.

The Ramie plant, a new substitute for cotton, is said to be largely engaging the attention of Southern planters, who are entering upon its cultivation with enthusiasm. It was brought originally from the Island of Java, and has been domesticated in Mexico, where it grows finely. Its fibre closely resembles the best Sea-Island cotton. According to Southern papers it has been demonstrated that this plant can be easily cultivated at the South; that its fibre is as strong and fine as that of flax or cotton; that it may be made, in the climate of Louisiana, to yield four crops a year, each crop of more pounds to the acre than in any ordinary yield of cotton; that it is not liable to be destroyed by the caterpillar; and that it requires but little labor to cultivate it after the ground is prepared. The Commissioner of Agriculture at Washington has examined specimens of cloth made from the Ramie fibre, and reports that they indicate that superior goods can be manufactured from it.

Parties desiring to become all in all to each other would do well to ascertain whether there is any obvious obstacle before the marriage ceremony is commenced. An expected wedding came to an abrupt termination a few weeks since, in consequence of the prospective bride putting in a stipulation that the to-be-bridegroom should thenceforth eschew his cigar. The young man very absurdly replied that he could get along very much more comfortably without a wife than he could without his weed, and consequently the proposed marriage "ended in smoke." In this connection we may quote the advice which an Albany editor gives his readers: "If you want to keep poor, buy two glasses of ale every day at five cents each, amounting in one year to $36 50; smoke three cigars, one after each meal, counting up in the course of the year to $94 45; and keep a big dog."

A very pertinent question it was which a wise elder put to a certain young man who insisted, in spite of many apparently providential indications to the contrary, that he had a call to preach—"Hast thou noticed whether people seem to have a call to hear thee?"

An Indiana gentleman placed his pocket-book for safe-keeping in the hands of his "better half," and she carefully put it in the oven of the stove for safety. The husband, who—be it said to his discredit—was out late at night, returned to his home half-frozen, and not thinking that the careful wife had made a safe of the cook-stove, at once kindled a fire, and so effectually baked the funds that further use of them was out of the question.

A gang of youthful house-breakers, thirteen in number, have been ravaging the summer residences in Newport. The youngest of this band is a lad of ten years. The house of a gentleman who is abroad has been made the rendezvous, where they slept and ate, and collected together the spoils they plundered in the vicinity. Every room in the house bore evidence of wanton mischief, and some valued family portraits were found grossly mutilated when the police first discovered their retreat. A large proportion of the band have been arrested.

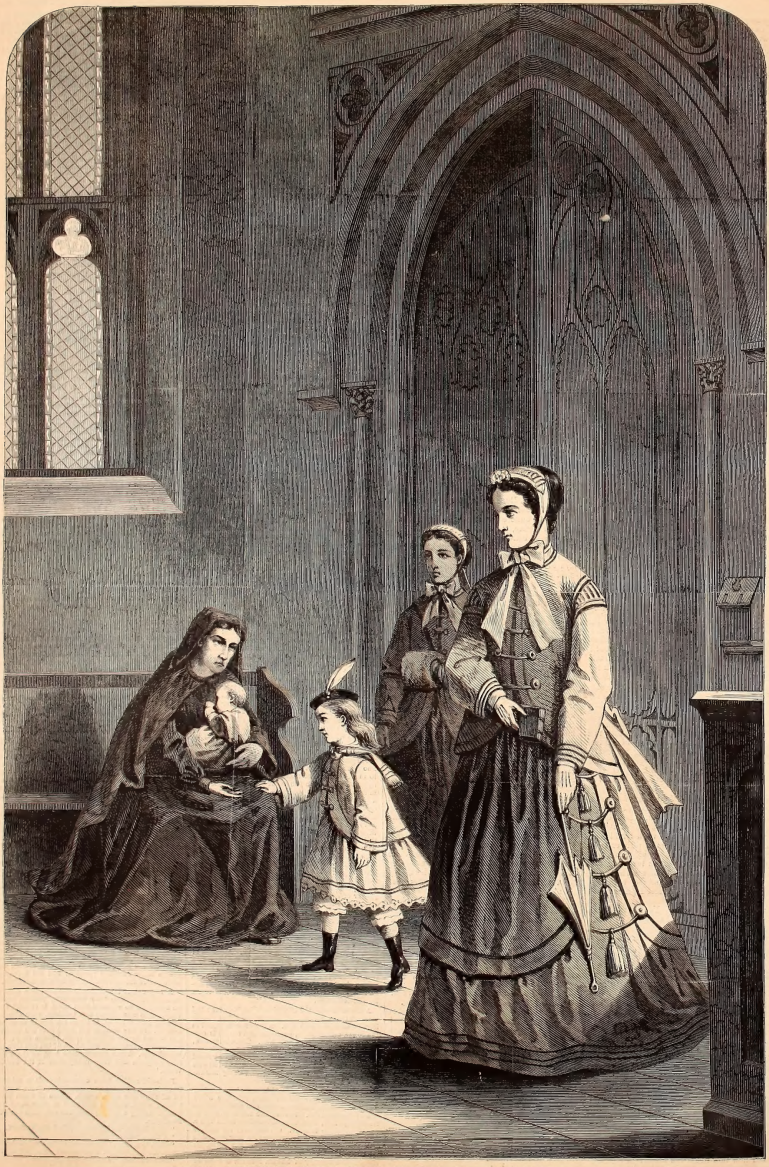
Dogs seem to have been largely introduced into some parts of Belgium as an article of food, though in a more unostentatious manner than horses have been into France. So many dogs have latterly disappeared in Antwerp that some special investigation was made. Two persons were apprehended who confessed that within the year they had stolen some two hundred dogs, the skins of which, sold to toy-makers, went for the manufacture of children's drums; the grease made excellent pomade; and the carcasses were passed through the sausage-making machines.

A very unique illustration is credited to a certain reverend gentleman: "The Scriptures," said he, "may be compared to woman's hair, which is twisted and turned into many forms and fashions, each one arranging hers in the mode which she thinks most becoming. In like manner the Scriptures are twisted and turned by the different sects, though they are a unit in their character, and admit of but one true interpretation. There may be false hair, so there are false prophets and false interpreters of the Sacred Word."

Paris—like other large cities—abounds in misers. They do not all hide away their gold in bags, nor do all of them live upon crusts. Some of them own houses, which they let furnished in suits of apartments. Lately a literary man came to such a miser for a floor.

"What is your business?" inquired the landlord.

"A literary man."



"Well, that sort of thing don't make much noise or shake the foundations. And you are absent all day?"

"On the contrary, I never go out."

"Can't let you have the place then."

"And why not?"

"Because you fellows who stay at home all day wear out the furniture."

CHARITY—A SCENE IN TRINITY CHURCH, NEW YORK.—[DRAWN BY W. D. WASHINGTON.]

NEW ENGLAND PURITANS GOING TO CHURCH.—[Photographed by Gocuel & Co., from the Painting by George H. Boughton.]

BOUGHTON'S PURITANS.

We give on this page an engraving of the painting of "New England Puritans going to Church," by George H. Boughton, an American artist of great and recognized ability, now resident in London. The original of this admirable work was lately purchased in London by Mr. Samuel P. Avery, and was for some time exhibited in his Fine Art Gallery, No. 82 Fifth Avenue. It is now in possession of Mr. R. L. Stuart, by whose permission the copy here presented is made.

The scene depicted by the artist has been graphically described in Bartlett's "History of the Pilgrim Fathers," an extract from which originally suggested the painting; but all historians unite in representing that the religious services of the early Puritans were conducted under such circumstances of danger as are indicated in the painting. The procession to the church was invariably headed and guarded in those days by armed men, and while the majority of the congregation worshiped with their arms at their sides, others stood as sentinels around the church.

THE ACTIVE BORE.

Bores may be divided into two classes—the active and passive—those who bore you by active stupidity or supernatural intelligence, and those who produce an equally exasperating effect by passive idiocy, and merely constitute themselves your echoes. It is difficult to say which carries off the palm, which bores you most; for, although acting in widely different ways, they produce precisely similar results. The active bore is a terrible person. He goes about seeking whom he may devour, and he is capable of clinging to a victim till complete mental prostration supervenes. He may either be a man of fair intelligence, or he may be an ass. If he has any brains they are probably devoted to some hobby, about which no one else in the world can be expected to manifest the slightest interest. It may be scientific, it may be religious; he may be meditating an attack on your soul, or only desirous of involving you in a chaos of chemical formulæ. Or he may have traveled a good deal; and the bore who has traveled is like the Scotch snob, "than which," as the great historian of snobs says, "the world contains no more offensive creature." The traveled bore will give you page after page of the guide-books, interspersed with his own reflections, till you are ready to execrate the abominable activity which caused him to leave his ancestral halls. It is given to but few people who travel to have any thing worth hearing to say about the places they have visited; for the faculty of judging foreign nations fairly is very rare; how rare we can see from the French representations of English women. The active bore may also be facetious, and it is impossible to conceive any infliction greater than that of the society of a man who is what jest-books call "a wag," or a "witty fellow." Jokes are very well in their way, but a perpetual joker is an unutterable bore. It makes no difference whether he be what he is pleased to call humorous, or whether he affects verbal contortions, and puns borrowed from the last burlesque. He is unendurable in any case, and it is the duty of any man or woman who possesses the power to put him down and extinguish him with all possible speed. Even a good joke may be heard too often, but the repetition of a bad one, such as the thorough-paced facetious bore delights in, is almost too much for human nature to endure. He will repeat it, too, with a gusto that, at the outset, nearly persuades you that you are going to hear something new. You are politely attentive. You encourage him by such attention. And then comes the stale, old, stupid story that you have heard a hundred times before, and the exclamation that you mutter under your breath is certainly not a blessing. The political bore, who, perhaps, ought to have come first, is another very exasperating member of the fraternity. His opinions are of the haziest description, but they are supported by a quantity of voluble declamation, and what he flatters himself is argument. He deals solely in magnificent generalities, in sweeping assertions. Nobody's view but his own can possibly be right, and it therefore behooves him to air that view whenever an opportunity occurs. His phrases are picked out of elocution books and vivacious leaders in the penny papers. He is ordinarily a radical, with an intense desire to reform every body and every thing but himself. That reform he is very slow to accomplish; and he will most likely end as he began, a spouter of stale and generally incoherent sedition. He is great at clubs, where quiet men avoid him, and wish they could keep all the newspapers out of his way. And in these days, unfortunately, this species of bore is somewhat on the increase, and has more opportunities of asserting himself and of boring people than heretofore. He is a dangerous specimen of the active bore, and as such to be carefully snubbed whenever such snubbing is possible.

THE LOVES OF ANDREW TOD.

WHEN Andrew Tod was young he was not bad-looking; when Andrew Tod courted pretty Mary M'Ara, the most ill natured friends and unneighborly neighbors allowed that they were as well-matched a lad and lassie as ever made up their minds to go to kirk together. But when Andrew Tod, conjointly with his sister Letty, came in for the property of their parent deceased, the respected Baillie Tod, it was very soon observed that the hard though handsome features of young Andrew got daily harder and by no means handsomer; that, indeed, his face was strikingly indicative of a disposition to be hard rather than handsome in his dealings with men.

With her great-aunt, Elizabeth Pringle, spinster, aged 59, a very prim and very sour virgin, lived the bright, tender-hearted, sweet-faced Mary M'Ara. There was no design, I verily believe, in the breast of the old maid, to treat with cruelty the poor dependent. But there is cruelty which is not that of design; and there were never truer words than those which live in poet's verse—"Evil is wrought from want of thought, more than from want of heart." If Miss Pringle had set herself ingeniously to devise a life of wretchedness for the beautiful girl who served her as a handmaiden, and took the scoldings without the wages of servitude, I don't think the old lady would have been clever enough to have attained a more complete result than that which her purposeless oppression brought about.

Among those who, in their wisdom, so mistook the nature of Miss Pringle's petulant tyranny was the sharp-sighted—but also narrow-sighted—Andrew Tod. On his supposed acquaintance with the feelings of the elder woman, he began to shape his own course with regard to the younger. Should he marry her? He had gone far, but had not committed himself to any engagement. Mary would inherit the fortune of her protectress, if Miss Pringle were to die intestate; and even should she make a will, as matters then stood, it might not improbably be in Mary's favor. On the other hand, a very little might induce the rich old maid—Miss Pringle could not be worth less than ten or twelve thousand pounds—to leave her money away from a girl for whom she appeared to have no spark of affection. Why should not he, Andrew Tod, make a bold stroke, and secure at once the old woman's wealth by—it was not a pleasant thought, but younger men had wooed more ancient dames than Betty Pringle. He would be scoffed at by many, contemned by a few; but, in the event of success, could he not well afford to put up with some considerable amount of obloquy? He must begin with caution; feel his way securely, step by step; and be very careful to leave the ground behind him open for a retreat, in case of failure. A difficult game, doubtless! Without generalship, without the nicest manœuvring, a perilous game—without courage and determination a losing game. To strike boldly and at the same time warily; to push forward and all the while be thinking how it were easiest, in case of defeat, to retire upon the first position, would demand his utmost skill. But he would venture; yes, he would venture.

Delicacy, which stood little in the way of Andrew's plans, had not stood in the way of his employing David Kirn, his sister's rejected suitor, in the publishing branch of the business. David was a scholar, a patient and laborious workman in the craft of letters, and, though rather a dull author, a very good critic. Tod's house had for a full century been famous for the publication of topographical and antiquarian books; and Kirn was an unfailing authority in such lore. His plodding habits, wide erudition, and special knowledge made him invaluable as a reader or "taster" of manuscripts, and also as a reviser for the press. He was a hardy, rawboned student, who could live on a Highland shepherd's wages, or on less than half the weekly pay which would to a cockney imply hopeless debt or certain starvation. As little as would suffice to keep David Kirn's spirit and body together, and a whole coat on his back, thus little did he get by working for Andrew Tod. Thought of Letty had long gone by. It was a dead love. Just as much as if she herself were dead.

Rebecca Duckett, as well as being forty-three and a widow, was fat and was fair. Her skin was without a wrinkle; for the pair of dimples in her cheeks had not as yet elongated out of their original character; and as for a third dimple, on Mrs. Duckett's chin, it actually retained unaltered the juvenile rotundity of long ago. Mrs. Duckett had married young and had left her native place, not to return until a woman of forty and a widow. She had been half over the world with her husband, a surgeon in a Highland regiment; and, having a settlement more than thrice the value of her pension, was in very comfortable circumstances. Her husband, too, had left her money enough to buy the pretty cottage in which she was born—a cottage as rosy and smiling and pleasant as herself. This cheerful abode was a mile out of the town. Mrs. Duckett lived, therefore, "out of the world," as inhabitants of the High Street and the Market Square were wont to observe: and she was, moreover, an alien by long residence in regions yet more remote. In point of fact, her return to that neighborhood had befallen at a time when the general talk of Andrew Tod's supposed engagement to Mary M'Ara had ceased; when Andrew's career as a prosperous burgess had begun; and when people even who still regarded the match as "on" were checked in their open discussion of the affair by those puzzling symptoms which nobody at first likes to notice, but which so very often indicate the coming announcement that a match is "off."

Mrs. Duckett was, I venture to say, entirely innocent of the knowledge that there had ever been any thing seriously indicative of matrimony between Mr. Tod and Miss M'Ara. She would have been the very woman to encourage the courtship; for, like every good soul at her time of life—every good feminine soul, I mean—she was always ready at a moment's notice to take up the part of match-maker. But she knew nothing about this particular matter; or, if any thing, only just enough to incline her to the belief that there had been some faint kind of flirtation, and that it had fallen to the ground. Andrew Tod, the handsome, found favor in the sight of Mrs. Duckett; and Andrew Tod, the hard, relaxed, at all events, the appearance of hardness in his manner when they met. He was not at all sure that the worldly possessions of Mrs. Duckett were contemptible. She was at all events worth keeping in view; for, should other aims be missed, there was no fear of failure—thought Andrew—in this quarter.

One morning Andrew Tod made up his mind that he would lose no more time in carrying out his tender project in regard to Miss Betty Pringle. So, taking advantage of a small order for stationery and sealing-wax, he packed up the parcel himself, and informed his assistant behind the counter that it was his intention to deliver the goods with his own hand.

In making up his mind that this day must be the very day of his paying suit to Miss Betty Pringle, Andrew Tod awkwardly bethought him that he had omitted entirely the little attentions which usually forerun a proposal of marriage. Yet the step must be taken—must, because the force of his will was just sufficient to impel action, without rising to the necessity of control. He could resolve, but he could not govern his resolution. So he patched up his wretched little plans, in a dull, fatuous hurry, and wrote a letter. He purposed leaving the letter and the parcel at the door of the house; and this is what he wrote:

"DEAR MADAM,—You will experience some feeling of surprise, though not, I trust, of a disagreeable kind, in reading the contents of this letter, which I must entreat you to keep an entire secret. That the esteem I have always had for you should lead me to consider your lonely and unprotected position is certainly not astonishing; at least, I can not imagine its being so; but I fear that the too probable opinion of the world may to some extent be shared by you, and that you will, as I have said, be surprised by my avowal of a wish to share my worldly fortunes with you, in the bonds of matrimony. Think, dear Madam, of the motives which, prudential though I admit them in a measure to be, are yet entitled to the credit of sincere and disinterested good-will. My means, though I can not pretend that they would offer any material addition to the comforts insured you by an ample independence, are such as to warrant my undertaking that, as my wife, and as the mistress of my home, you will enjoy a more pleasantly varied existence, from day to day, than you are now able to attain. In short, dear Madam, I offer you my devotion as a husband, with the earnest wish and determination, if you accept my hand, to make you thoroughly happy.

"I shall have the honor of calling an hour or two hence, to receive your answer, which I anxiously presume to hope will be favorable; and I am, my dear Madam, unalterably and devotedly yours,

"ANDREW TOD."

Having concocted this precious epistle the writer sped forth on his hopeful errand. As he skirted the Market Square he espied the reproachful vision of his former love, Mary M'Ara, and, mastering his emotions without any tremendous effort of constraint, he coolly contrived to avoid a meeting. Miss M'Ara was, indeed, on her way to Tod's with a trivial message from her aunt, respecting the small order for stationery and sealing-wax. The journey was not an agreeable one to the poor girl, who had long since perceived the gradual estrangement of her some-time lover, and, to say truth, would have wearily welcomed an opportunity of breaking with a man whose cruelty was of so very mean a sort. A true woman will forgive any thing but the coldness which is that of calculation, not of mere indifference. Even jealousy may end in forgiveness; but how is a girl to be jealous of a banker's book?

On went Andrew Tod, to call on Miss Pringle; and on went Mary M'Ara, to call at Tod's. Letitia Tod was directing the general business in her brother's absence; and it was Letitia Tod who attended in person to that particular business which was the mission of Mary M'Ara. More frigid and repellant than usual was Letitia this morning; and when she disclosed, in an awkward and hesitating manner, the fact of Andrew's having journeyed forth to visit Miss Pringle, Mary could scarce help starting, and was conscious of the color flying from her cheeks. It was many a day since Andrew Tod had set foot within her great-aunt's doors; and it never had been his wont to visit there in the hours of business. To be sure, it was business that had ostensibly taken him thither on this occasion; but there was something strange in his acting the part of light-porter, something stranger yet in the embarrassed tone of Letitia Tod. Mary could not have guessed the real motive of that journey which Andrew had taken; nor do I suppose he had confided it to his sister Letitia; and yet both women felt that the visit had certainly nothing to do with a courtship that stood somewhat in need of renewal or definite repudiation. Mary hastened to get through her trifling business in Tod's shop that she might escape a meeting with the worthy stationer; and when she was outside the door her first thought was the risk of encountering him either at home or on the way. So she resolved to walk in a different direction, and treat herself to a stroll through the pleasant meadows beyond the town.

"Oh, Mr. Tod, I'm glad ye hae come!" These were the words that greeted and surprised Andrew as soon as the door of Miss Pringle's dwelling was opened to him. They were the words, however, not of Miss Pringle, but of Miss Pringle's domestic, Tibbie; and their suddenness, as well as the voice of alarm and excitement with which they were spoken, disturbed the mind of Andrew Tod, who was in a highly nervous condition, and quite ready to be startled by any unlooked-for occurrence.

"What's—what's the matter with the woman?" gasped Andrew.

"Matter wi' her!" echoed Tibbie, who evidently understood the question as applying not to herself but to her mistress. "Matter wi' her! Step intil the sitting-room, Mr. Tod, and jest see for yoursel'."

Andrew Tod paused irresolutely for a few seconds, and then entered the little parlor indicated by the frightened Tibbie. There had been enough to frighten her. The mistress of the house had fallen in a fit; and there was no help at Tibbie's call, until the unexpected visitor had opportunely knocked at the door.

"I'll—I'll run for Doctor Nicholson," said Andrew, when he saw the terrible truth. "This is an awfu' business. Hold her up till I return. I'll not be long gone, and I'll leave the house-door to, so that ye need not come to open it."

And away he went, presently to return with the doctor, whom he found, by good hap, at home.

It was a serious case, as Doctor Nicholson need hardly have told them. Miss Mary not returning so soon as Tibbie expected, that faithful attendant summoned feminine aid, and got the afflicted lady into bed. In a short time Miss Pringle regained her consciousness; but she was partially paralyzed, and the doctor looked very grave when he left the house, promising to come back in an hour.

Andrew Tod, astounded and perhaps a little ashamed, went his way homeward, with his wits too confused to allow him then to revise his plans of matrimony. When he had told his tidings, and had heard casually in return from Letitia that Mary had called while he was away, an uncomfortable feeling took hold upon him, and he was for a time as one conscience-struck. The conscience of a selfish man, when it does strike him through his selfishness, strikes pretty hard. With the thought that he had lost Mary came the thought that she must have begun to despise him. The blow to his self-interest was aggravated by the completeness of his humiliation. The well-balanced mind of Letitia Tod was incapable of comprehending her brother's discomfiture. She was surprised, scarcely startled, certainly not dismayed, by the tidings he gave her of Miss Betty Pringle. In less than half an hour after hearing his story to the end, Letitia told Andrew of a letter having come in his absence, and she calmly placed the missive, which was addressed to him, in his unconscious hand. Seeing that he was too bewildered to notice what he held, she took the letter back again and asked,

"Shall I read it?"

"Ay; do, do;" said Andrew. "My nerves are terribly shaken by this business."

"It comes fra Mistress Duckett," said Letitia; and as she made the statement Andrew became rather more attentive.

"What's it about?" asked he.

"It's an ecuveetation for you and me to a small party at her house next Thursday evening. She's a nice body, and we shall go, of course. Am I to answer the note, and say so?"

"Oh yes, certainly," said Andrew, who began to think again of the comely widow as a possible string to his bow. The thought, as I have already intimated, was not entirely new to him. Mrs. Duckett was tolerably well off. She may have unintentionally deceived her acquaintance into the belief that she was really a rich woman, for she had traveled, and had learned the economic graces of social life, and habitually made a very good appearance at a very frugal cost. But at any rate, she lived well, stinted herself in no comforts, indulged modestly in a few luxuries, and steadily paid her way. A woman, this, not to be rashly slighted by Tods or persons of the Tod way of thinking.

"When you've written your note, Letty, I'll just look over it, please. Then I can put it in an envelope and address it in my own handwriting. It will be like both of us sending an answer."

And so Miss Tod, with the promptitude of a woman of business, wrote the reply, and brought it neatly folded to her brother.

As Andrew took the document, a thought like a spasm came across his already perturbed mind. What had become of the letter he had written for poor Betty Pringle? He had laid that wretched piece of penmanship, sealed and directed, together with the parcel of stationery and sealing-wax, on a side table in the invalid's parlor; and there he had left them—miserable man that he was!

Not staying to inclose the note for Mrs. Duckett, and to pen her direction on the cover, Andrew seized his hat, and hastily intimated a sudden and, till then, forgotten call of duty. The folded note itself, just as it had been handed to him by his sister, he thrust in a breast-pocket of his coat; and away he started to reclaim if possible the other and far more important manifesto.

When Mary reached home she was greatly pained and alarmed by the tidings of what had happened so soon after she had left her aunt apparently well. But the panic passed away in a minute, and she was soon busying herself about the poor paralytic's bedside. Meanwhile, Andrew Tod, having recovered the shock dealt him by the painful incident of his morning call, and having sustained another shock almost as great in the discovery that he had left a document, of the most delicate importance, in a situation where it might be found and scrutinized by persons from whose eyes he would most especially have sought to withhold it, was on his way once again to the house of sickness. He expected, this time, to find Mary M'Ara at home; and therefore was not more disconcerted than he might have been at meeting her, say, in his own shop, or in the town, with the dread hanging over him that she had read that unfortunate letter.

Mary had left her aunt for a short while, and was in the sitting-room on the ground-floor of the house—the same room that poor Miss Pringle was in when she fell in her fit—as Andrew again knocked at the door. Tibbie opened it to him, and gave his name to Miss M'Ara, who desired that he might enter.

Nervously glancing at the side-table, Andrew saw, to his indescribable relief, that the note addressed by him to Miss Pringle was still lying on the little parcel of stationery. Courage entered his heart as he saw that he was in time to achieve the purpose of his almost desperate visit. The courage gave him what he needed, composure; gave him what he seldom lacked, craftiness. His manner to Mary was at once subdued, sympathetic, and affectionately familiar—suited, in fact, to the occasion of a lover's visit of condolence. Never had Andrew felt himself so completely master of a tender situation.

"Oh, Mary, you can not think how this sad business has affected me. It was so long since I had seen you, dear Mary, that I resolved to come this morning. And then the terrible occurrence which I almost witnessed from the beginning! How is your aunt now, Mary dearest?"

"Better, Andrew; a little better; but not out of peril. Her life hangs, Doctor Nicholson says, on a thread. We must have other advice, and with the best that we can get I fear her faculties will never be restored." Miss M'Ara said this in a tone that did not respond very cordially to Andrew's affectionate address. He could hardly wonder at a little coldness. Really he had not treated the girl at all well; and even if she had had no cause of complaint against him, the time was out of joint for love-making.

"It is a very sad visitation, Mary dearest. I thought, we all thought, poor Miss Pringle's constitution so strong and sound. Coming unexpectedly, as this terrible illness has come, I suppose her worldly affairs have not been arranged."

"If you mean to ask me whether or not my aunt has made a will, Andrew, though I should have thought the present time unfitted for the topic, I will relieve your anxiety on that score. It is rather more than a week since Mr. M'Clack drew up such a document as you hint at, which she signed in the presence of witnesses. If I have ever been impatient of poor aunt's ways, I hope I have never seemed unkind to her, for she has been very kind to me."

Andrew wisely interpreted this acknowledgment of Miss Pringle's "kindness" in the one only sense that a man of the world could reconcile with any complacent reference to a will.

"I do, indeed, agree with you, dearest Mary, that this is not the time to talk of such matters; let us therefore dismiss the subject"—virtuously and magnanimously spake Andrew.

"You have no other to speak upon, have you?" she said. "I ask, because, if you have not, you will let me go now to my aunt."

"Stay one moment, Mary dear," said the overbold Andrew. "Let me say what I should have said this morning; what I came hither on purpose to say."

"What is it?" Mary asked, with strangely mingled wonder and indifference. Andrew's courage was a little dashed by the girl's almost weary coldness of speech. But he had hoodwinked himself, and he still went on, blind to consequences.

"This, Mary; this, which you might guess. Have I not, long ago, told you of my love? Was I not here, this very day, to tell you of it again—to say that it is greater than it ever was; and to ask you to be my wife?"

"Wait here," said Mary. And with these strange words, strangely spoken, in a calm, clear voice, she left the room, closing the door behind her.

Andrew Tod was amazed, as well he might be by such unprecedented treatment of a wooer. Mary's absence from the room, however, gave him the opportunity he desired of regaining possession of his note. He seized it; but horror! his fingers closed on the empty cover in which it had been inclosed. The seal had been broken, and the note itself, the written offer of his hand to a woman old enough to be his grandmother, was gone. While he stood like one in a peculiarly disagreeable trance, holding the empty envelope in his trembling hand, Mary returned.

She had been to fetch the note: only to fetch the note—that was all! "Is not this what you came for, Andrew Tod?" she said, scornfully.

"You opened the letter?" said he, not angrily nor with very distinct knowledge of what he was saying.

"I opened it by an accident," she replied.

"It accompanied a parcel, and I thought it was the account; but I should in any case have opened a letter addressed to my aunt, while she is prevented by severe illness from attending to correspondence of all kinds. Take the letter, Andrew Tod—take it, you pitiable man; and go."

She held the folded paper out toward him, and he took it mechanically and unconsciously, slipped it in the breast-pocket of his coat, and turned to go. "Will you not forgive me in time, Mary?" he said, faintly, as he reached the corner door.

"Never, if by forgiveness you mean the renewal of our engagement," she said, after a pause which seemed to give her answer emphasis and decision.

He spoke no more, but went. "There must be some evil spirit," he thought, as he walked nervelessly along, "who busies himself solely in tempting men to write their own judgments, which may rise against them, perhaps many years after, perhaps to-morrow, perhaps to-day. Why could I not have refrained from writing this wretched letter?"

He drew the folded sheet of note-paper from his pocket and tore it in fragments, which he scattered idly bit by bit.

Miss Tod, having no cognizance of her brother's vexations, kept the even tenor of her frigid self-collection, and spoke to him on indifferent matters when he was once again sitting in his little room, half counting-house, half parlor. By-the-by, had he sent her note as he had promised?

"What note?" asked Andrew.

"Why, the answer to Mrs. Duckett's convevtation, to be sure," said Letty. "Didn't you say that you would inclose and direct it in your own handwriting?

"Yes, of course," Andrew replied. "But I was occupied with more important business, and forgot all about Mrs. Duckett's party."

"Well, have you the note in your desk or in your pocket now? You're not doing any thing, and might get this matter out of hand; it will be lost sight of entirely, and that would be hardly candid.

Andrew said no more, but, taking the folded note from his breast-pocket, slipped it into a cover, sealed and addressed the billet, and handed it without a word to his sister, who straightway dispatched a messenger with it to Mrs. Duckett.

Three months after date of the foregoing narrative of events Miss Mary M'Ara, looking not less pretty in black than in any other wear, sat in a bay-window of Mrs. Duckett's rose-embowered dwelling, and conversed with Mrs. Duckett, or rather listened to what Mrs. Duckett had to say.

"I thought at the time, my dear, the man was mad. What else could I think? Here's his ridiculous letter, which I have kept ever since in my work-basket. I was expecting a mere answer to an invitation, and imagine my utter amazement, Mary, when I read such stuff as this: 'My dear Madam, you will experience some feeling of surprise'—surprise indeed! I should think so! 'Lonely and unprotected position;' opinion of the world;' 'share my worldly fortunes with you in the bonds of matrimony.' All this was rather cool for a declaration, wasn't it, Mary? But when the wretch came to his confession of 'personal motives,' I could stand it no longer. A love-letter without a word of love in it was bad enough, you know. For I am not a Gorgon, Mary dear, nor a Medusa, if Medusa was ugly, though I forget whether she was or wasn't. But the notion of marrying me for my money was rather too much; and so I instantly wrote back to Mr. Andrew Tod and told him that I must decline the honor of his visit 'an hour or two hence,' or at any future time. Of course I see now that the whole thing was a mistake of that wicked man's, and that he never meant the letter for me. I suppose your guess is the right one, and that he somehow jumbled the two notes together, perhaps destroyed the one he had written in reply to my invitation for him and his sister, and sent me this rubbish I now hold in my hand. I should have put off the party on account of your aunt's death, my dear; but, honestly, my mind was positive in doing so was the wish to avoid all embarrassment with regard to Sidney Tod. And only think of the dullness of that creature, who has never attempted to explain how it was that a letter signed by him, and evidently not meant for me, came to be sent here. I wonder how he got through the story to his sister; for some story, of course, he must have told her. And you are sure, are you, Mary dear, that this is the identical letter which that base fellow of a sweet-heart of yours—a pretty sweet-heart indeed!—left on your poor aunt the morning of her dreadfully sudden attack? You opened it, thinking it related to some matter of business, eh? A small matter of business it was, too! You did quite right, my love, to let him go on till he was caught in his own trap. How I should have liked to see him take the note back again! You saw him put it in his pocket, did you not? Yes, I thought so. He was in a rather confused state of mind, Mary, we may be quite sure, and didn't know whether he was standing on that tolerably good-looking head of his or on his cloven foot. Well, and then he went away, did he? Ah, poor man! He had had quite enough to turn his wicked brain that morning, and so that's how it was he sent me the wrong letter—the same that he left at your house, and that you returned to him. And do you know, Mary, on that very same day I saw you shake hands and part from David Kirn, not fifty steps from this window, dear? There, don't blush so. Had you been telling a very long walk together? Oh, don't tell me! I know you liked him a little, just a little, before you gave the word 'Right about face'—quick march' to Andrew Tod. He's a good man, is David, and as clever as he is good. I've been trying to read that long article of his in the Edinburgh Review, that has made so much talk, and has won so much praise; and though it gives me the headache, I will understand something about it before I give it up, that I am determined. What a pity for him, wasn't it, to go from Tod's to edit a first-class English newspaper? I hope London won't spoil him, Mary, and make him forget us, eh? He's reading for the bar, too, is he not? Why do I ask? Don't I know he is, and that nothing would persuade him to accept the help of a trifling loan—just a hundred and fifty or two hundred pounds—to pay his fees? He said he would much rather have a struggle for it. Ah, you may depend on his being the man to win what he sets his heart on; and I'm very glad, my dear, that he's honest and brave a heart has been set on winning you."

MIDDLE AGE.

Jove a little dowly I sit alone to-night,
And see on the far horizon's verge the line of a pale gray light,
And hear the mystic music, the deep unceasing roar,
As the restless billows swell and break along the level shore.

Just a little dowly—as I know the hill is turned,
And what of all the glorious things for which my spirit yearned,
While yet the eager footstep sprang along the upward way?—
My dreams lie shivered at my feet, and my hair is turning gray!

Just a little dowly, fool that I am e'en still!
Because all beauty as of yore my heart and eyes can fill;
Because the grandeur of the sea I prise as truly now
As when its breezes blew bright curls from an unwrinkled brow;

Because a high heroic act; because sweet poet-words;
Bright poet-fancies, echo yet buck from my spiritchords;
Because my love is warm and frank; because my pulses hold
Their wildum power—I half forget that I am growing old.

Till, just a little sadly, some trifle brings it all
Sweeping across my sunshine, turning my wine to gall;
And anxious thoughts, and fearful doubts, and yearning sorrows come:
Ah, little fear that Time's stern voice should overlong be dumb!

Just a little dowly—ah, come, my bonnie bairns;
Let Grief, and Loss, and Memory brood o'er their rising cairns!
Creep close to me, my maidens; laugh out, my noble boy!
God spare my flowers, and middle age claims fearlessly her joy.

DESCRIPTION OF TOILETS.

By an Observer.

Miss S., old Smith's daughter, wore a short dress of navel poplin, striped with brown grosgrain, with tight-fitting basque, made out of her ma's last winter's cloak. Sleeves of medoc antique to match her highest under-skirt, and bonnet of red oak bark tied with slippery strings. She looked a little cold, but, withal, amazingly pretty. Miss H——, alleged to be the wealthiest girl on Sugar Street, wears a black and tan Irish terrier poplin suit, trimmed with bits of bombazine, with blue stitching put around the skirts with Spaulding's glue. Short sacque, tight under the arms, and a bonnet of gourd leaves, trimmed with pieces of grape-vine.

BABY LETTER.

By a provoking Sprig, just three weeks old.

Dear old uncle,
I am not sweet
My old nursery
Is very dirty.
Little bit stronger,
Don't want to be sick
Very much longer.
Cold in my head;
Can't knit stronger;
Mammy says he plinks
I'm much bigger!
Dear little baby
Is not a boy,
And to make you sleepy
Nasty jalopy!
Took a shot of tobeby,
Pain's gone as over:
Dear little uncle
Uncle sweet,
Wind on stomick,
Pain pretty hot;
Worse if or sickness
Than I be.
Ever had kitty cat,
Ole Uncle Billy?
Think me fun new,
Pay which we will
Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha!
And they all chuckle
Don't do it now,
Cause baby cry.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?—A paper called the Egyptian Light has been started at Vienna, Illinois. It ought to have a good circulation.

As courtship is a subject thought of in all seasons, we publish the following, gotten off evidently by a chap who knows a thing or two:

Jennie sighed, and Robin squeezed her
Pretty little trembling hand,
Then, with clasping arm he seized her
Half-reluctant form, and—and—

"Loose me!" but he clasped the tighter—
"Jennie, say will thou be mine?"
Then her bright face grew much brighter,
And she whispered, "I am thine."

They then clasped each other fondly,
Close together as two bricks,
And they kissed each other fondly,
And—I left them in that fix!

An American was once teaching English to a German, and, on being asked if there were no irregular verbs in the English, replied by giving the following solitary example: "I go, then wentest, he departed; we made tracks, you cut sticks, they skedaddled." But, in asking for a repetition of it, the German found that it varied every time, and he had at last to give it up in despair.

A country surgeon, who was bald, was visiting a friend's house, whose servant wore a wig. The doctor buttered him for a considerable time, and then said: "You see how bald I am, and yet I don't wear a wig."

To which the servant replied:
"True, Sir; but an empty barn requires no thatch."

SOLDIERS' MONUMENT AT LEWISTON, MAINE.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY MESSER & BLAKE.]

CARDINAL PRINCE LUCIEN BONAPARTE.—[SEE PAGE 269.]

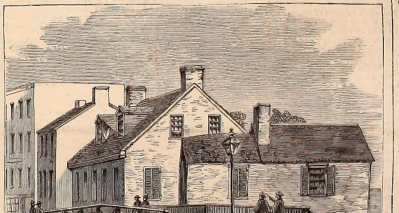
UNION SOLDIERS' MONUMENT.

WE give this week an illustration of another of the many monuments by which the people of the North are endeavoring to honor the memory of the soldiers who perished in the war for the Union. The monument at Lewiston, Maine, was inaugurated on February 28, 1868, with great ceremony. It consists of a granite pedestal, eleven feet high, surmounted by a bronze figure of a private soldier, of the height of six feet nine inches. Each of the four sides of the pedestal bears a bronze tablet, upon which are inscribed the names of soldiers from Lewiston who fell in the war. The tablets bear the following superscriptions: "In our Death is Freedom's Victory;" "We lie here in Obedience to the Spirit of Liberty;" "The Republic's Treasure, the Ashes of her Defenders;" "Justice demanded the Sacrifice. We willingly Offered It."

THE LAKE MICHIGAN DISASTER—BURNING OF THE STEAMER "SEA BIRD," APRIL 9, 1868.—SKETCHED BY W. B. BAIRD.—[SEE PAGE 269.]

FAC-SIMILE OF TWO PAGES OF AN ABYSSINIAN BIBLE.

THE LAKE MICHIGAN DISASTER.



THE opening of lake navigation this year has been made sadly memorable by one of the most frightful disasters ever before recorded. On the morning of April 9 the steamer Sea Bird was found to be on fire while at sea, and before the flames could be arrested she was entirely consumed and sunk. Of the more than one hundred passengers and seamen on board only three were saved. Our engraving opposite gives an accurate illustration of the scene.

CARDINAL LUCIEN BONAPARTE.

IT would appear a strange event in history if St. Peter's chair should be removed to PARIS and a BONAPARTE should fill it; but stranger things have happened. It seems that it is a consummation already dreamed of, and that it is not impossible—not improbable, in fact—that the next Pope of Rome may be a BONAPARTE, and that eventually, when the Papal States have been swallowed up by Italy, that this Bonapartean Pope may make his residence in the capital of the only Catholic country of Europe which is able or which evinces a disposition to sustain and support the Papal authority. The Papal temporal power expires, according to the present arrangement, on the death of PIUS IX.; and even France will hardly be able to continue it after that time, however willing. His relationship to the BONAPARTE family will be a strong argument in favor of the newly-made Cardinal, LUCIEN BONAPARTE, in the next Electing Conclave, and LOUIS NAPOLEON will hardly be blind to the advantages which it will give him to have a BONAPARTE in the Papal chair and resident in his own capital. Since the promotion of LUCIEN BONAPARTE, on March 13, to be a Cardinal of Rome, it has been plainly intimated that such was the Napoleonic idea and policy; and the subject has in consequence become one of great interest in Europe. We give on the preceding page a portrait of the new Cardinal and prospective Pope.

The branch of the BONAPARTE family which Prince, now Cardinal, LUCIEN BONAPARTE represents is formed by the fusion of the two lines of JOSEPH, the eldest, and LUCIEN, the youngest, brother of NAPOLEON the Great. His father was the PRINCE CHARLES BONAPARTE who lived for a number of years in the United States, engaged in scientific pursuits, chiefly ornithological studies. His grandfather on the same side was LUCIEN, NAPOLEON'S youngest brother, who figured extensively as a Jacobin before the rise of his brother, as a diplomatist during his reign, and subsequently as a poet and a delver and searcher among Etrusean remains. The mother of the new Cardinal was ZENAIDE CHARLOTTE JULIE, a daughter of JOSEPH BONAPARTE, the eldest brother of NAPOLEON, and king of Spain and Naples.

Cardinal BONAPARTE was born in 1828, and family who has been called upon to wear the purple. The first was Cardinal FESCH, the maternal uncle of NAPOLEON I., who received the Cardinal's hat in 1803, and was one of the principal agents of NAPOLEON and PIUS VII. in the negotiations which resulted in the Concordat of July 15, 1801, and the firm establishment of the Romish religion in France.

is now just 40 years of age. At the Romish Court he formerly bore the title of His Serene Highness, and in the Church was named one of the Apostolic Prothonotaries. His promotion gives him a seat in the Grand Council of the Romish Church, and a voice in the election of the Pope. Prince BONAPARTE is the second member of his

This nomination of Prince BONAPARTE increases the number of the French Cardinals of Rome to five, a small but influential portion of the whole College. The College of Cardinals when full consists of six cardinal-bishops, fifty cardinal-priests, and fourteen cardinal-deacons; but at present it is composed of only forty-four cardinal-priests and ten cardinal-deacons. Prince BONAPARTE, though not of the first order, is of the highest rank at present represented in the College, and also one of the youngest, so that he has a fair chance of yet becoming, on the death of PIUS IX., now seventy-six years old, a candidate for his place.

AN ABYSSINIAN BIBLE.

THE British Museum maintains with the English army now operating in Abyssinia several representatives who are engaged in collecting manuscripts and other curiosities, and in making sketches of the country. Among other strange documents forwarded by them is an Abyssinian Bible. We give an engraving from a photograph of two pages of this work. The curious pictures of religious subjects with which these two pages are filled show a very primitive condition of art. One page represents the Creation of Adam and Eve, and the Crucifixion in another compartment. The other exhibits the figures of St. Theodore and of St. George and the Dragon.

HISTORIC HOUSES.

ALL over the country there are going up every year numerous monuments, like that which we illustrate on the preceding page, designed to commemorate the names of those who fell in the war for the suppression of the rebellion, and which will in time become hallowed and historic structures. There are also extant in various parts of the country a few historic structures of a past age. Unfortunately they are not numerous now, and it is our shame that these few are badly preserved and ill cared for. Each year sees the demolition of or change in some one or more of these buildings, and it is to be feared that many of them will soon entirely disappear. We give in this issue of the Weekly engravings of three houses which have an historic interest, and which ought to become more sacred as they decay, but which will doubtless—at least we fear will—share the fate of the Revolutionary houses and monuments whose neglect we deprecate in vain, and many of which are already past recovery. The first of these which we notice is the

ANCIENT FRIENDS' MEETING-HOUSE.

This building is located in Lower Merion township, Montgomery County, Pennsylvania, near Columbia Railroad, and about two miles west of Bunnynunk. It was founded by the early Quakers who came to this country from Wales; and was erected, as appears by a date on a tablet, in 1695. Within a few years past the interior has been repaired, but the outside remains as it was built. This meeting-house is the oldest place of worship in the State of Pennsylvania, and is still in use as such.

HOUSE OF BARBARA FRIETCHIE.

The story of BARBARA FRIETCHIE has been made familiar, by the stirring poem of WHITTIER, to every school-boy in the land. It will be remembered that from the house of this fearless old lady the early Union flag in Frederick, Maryland, was flouted flying by STONEWALL JACKSON on his entry into that city in the invasion of 1862. The poem by WHITTIER has been published in full in the Weekly, and is now declaimed in every school at the North, but there are lines in the following passage from it which will be interesting in this connection:

Forty flags with their silver stars,
Forty flags with their crimson bars,
Flapped in the morning wind: the sun
Of noon looked down, and saw not one.
Up rose old Barbara Frietchie then,
Bowed with her fourscore years and ten;
Bravest of all in Frederick town,
She took up the flag the men hauled down;
In her attic-window the staff she set,
To show that one heart was loyal yet.
Up the street came the rebel tread,
Stonewall Jackson riding ahead.
Under his slouched hat left and right
He glanced; the old flag met his sight.
"Halt!"—the dust-brown ranks stood fast,
"Fire!"—out blazed the rifle-blast.
It shivered the window, pane and sash,
It rent the banner with seam and gash.
Quick, as it fell, from the broken staff
Dame Barbara snatched the silken scarf;
She leaned far out on the window-sill,
And shook it forth with a royal will.
"Shoot, if you must, this old gray head,
But spare your country's flag," she said.
A shade of sadness, a blush of shame,
Over the face of the leader came;
The nobler nature within him stirred
To life at that woman's deed and word;
"Who touches a hair of you gray head
Dies like a dog! March on!" he said.
All day long through Frederick street
Sounded the tread of marching feet:
All day long that free flag tost
Over the heads of the rebel host.

THADDEUS STEVENS'S DWELLING.

We also give a picture of the residence and law office of the Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS, at Lancaster, Pennsylvania, occupied by him while practising law, and before he entered on his legislative career. The building is still in existence, and is one of the landmarks of Lancaster.

DAINTY DISHES.

NOTHING is more difficult than to indulge a man, be he civilized or uncivilized, to any new kind of food. This fact has, no doubt, been discovered by the enthusiastic gentlemen who, in imitation of the Roman dining-society, recently lately been getting up "horse banquets" in London.

The natives of Japan refuse beef and milk, but eat rats with avidity. Englishmen run to the opposite extreme. The native Australian prefers white rabbit, whilst, although the white worms to the white man's simple breakfast of bread and butter, tea or coffee. The negroes of the West Indies anrich themselves on black snakes and palm-worms fried in their own fat, but regard a roasted monkey horror a rabbit stew. The Greenlanders drink train-oil, the Hottentots eat tallow-candles, the Barbote crocodile steaks, and Dampier, the buccaneer states that one of his African favorites made a most excellent supper one night from two mice and a blue mole. Captain Cook vouches for the excellence of a dog, boiled or roasted. Mr. Buckland ate boa-constrictor, and found its flesh exceedingly white and firm, and much like veal. Doctor Shaw says lion's flesh also resembles veal; grandmother Darwin is a great admirer of the puma, or American lion; Doctor Brook found cougar's grease not only palatable, but delicious; Sir R. Schomburg enjoyed monkey, though, before dinner, it looked disagreeably like human child; and finally, Gordon Cumming is loud in his praise of baked elephant's trunk and feet. In short, the drink and viands of various nations are a curious lump, and in China the tongues of fowls and ducks are a high-priced dainty. The Celestials relish, also, the skins and fins of the shark. The Australians rejoice in kangaroo tails, while the engagement of North America are loud in the praise of beaver tails; the Boers of South Africa delight in the fat tails of their sheep, which during the scarcity of food are dragged about in a handcart, and after its death are melted into butter, or made into a delicious stew. The tail of the tornado, or mouse, is a staple dish for the Indian of Honduras, though new settlers do not relish any part of the animal on account of its vivid resemblance to man; the female has hands, and holds its young upon its breast precisely as a human mother would. In Robinson Crusoe's Island many thousands of lobsters are annually taken, whose tails are dried, and exported to Valparaiso to serve on the dinner-tables there.

Most of animals are generally liked, from the web feet of ducks and geese in Europe, the trotters of sheep and pettitoes of pigs in London, and the bears' paws praised by North American hunters, down to, or rather up to, elephants' feet, much desiderated by the Caffre and Bushmen. Ox tail, pig's tail, and sheep's tail are in common use. Shark fins are in such demand for soups in China, that from ten to fifteen thousand hundred-weight are annually exported from various parts of India. Indeed, the thousand shark fins are taken annually off Kurrachee, near Bombay, for their back fins, which are the only ones made use of. In Canton rat soup is thought equal to calf's tail soup, and a dozen fat rats are worth two dollars. The British Indian province of Scinde had been for several years so infested with grain-eating rats that the price of grain had risen twenty-five per cent. The nests of the "Hirundo esculenta," so much prised as a delicious morsel by the Chinese and Cambojans, are worth, in Canton, nearly twice their own weight in silver. The finest white nests are found chiefly in caves on the shores of Java and the adjacent islands. In October, the nests are yellow, with a red tinge. They are procured from the caves twice every year, and the opening of the caves on these occasions is performed with many religious superstitious ceremonies. About two hundred and fifty thousand pounds weight are brought to Canton itself every year, and the best are sent to the capital for the use of the Celestial court. The English, the great egg-eaters, receive annually from Ireland one hundred and fifty millions of eggs, and from France over one hundred and thirty millions. In many countries the eggs of lizards are esteemed as a delicacy; and the eggs of the guana are thought a delicacy; and in the Antilles the eggs of the alligator, which are said to taste very much like hens' eggs, while they also resemble in shape. Turtles' eggs are held in great esteem wherever they are found, as well by European as by natives. They have a soft shell, and are about the size of a pigeon's egg. The mother turtles lay thrice a year, at intervals of two or three weeks, depositing about one hundred many as a hundred at a laying. An experienced eye and hand are required to detect the eggs, as they are always deposited under a foot or two of sand; but, when they are hunted, very few escape. The Orinoco Indians obtain from these eggs a kind of butter, which is said to be much like instead of butter. In the month of February, when the high waters of the Orinoco have receded, millions of turtles come on shore to deposit their eggs. The certainty and abundance of the harvest is such that it is estimated by the store. The yearly gathering about the mouths of the river alone is about five thousand jars of oil, and it takes five thousand eggs to make a jar.

At the beginning of the last century fish was eaten only by the very poor in Jamaica; now, however, excepting the turtle, it is one of the delicacies known only to the rich. A soft-shelled turtle abounding in the bayous of Louisiana is much prized as a delicate morsel. There are favorite delicacies in many countries. In Africa they stew them with butter. In the East Indies they are caught in pits, coarsely cleaned, and eaten by mouthfuls afterward, as our children eat candies. In Brazil the largest species are roasted whole in their shells.

While lobster is a favorite dainty with English men and Americans, no one ever thinks of eating locusts. Yet the Arabs, Abyssinians, are to form a welcome meal, and all travelers who have tasted them bear witness that they make a savory dish. The chief parts, exclusive of wings and legs, consisted as an article of diet, is that the first is the coolest feeder known, while the locust, though not absolutely carnivorous, feeds on fresh vegetable substances. While indulging ourselves with filthy lobsters, it is somewhat inconsistent to reproach locust-eaters as filthy feeders, more so to be satirical upon the gentlemen who eat horse and declare it to be palatable and wholesome.

"BLESSED BE THE MAN WHO FIRST INVENTED SLEEP," quoth Sancho Panza. Sleep has often been "murdered," not in Macbeth's case only, but in many modern instances, by Indigestion, Nervous Disorders, Headache, and a host of other complaints. For all such there is a remedy, and sufferers may now reclaim, Blessed be the man who invented the Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE OROIDE WATCH FACTORY.

OROIDE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold ones. These Watches are made by Practical Watch Makers in our own Factory, from the best materials, of the latest and most approved styles, are jewelled in gold settings, with a view to the best results in regard to wear and time. For appearance, durability, and time they have never been equalled by any watch ever sold for less than $100. We will warrant each watch for three years, and keep it in order for two years, by returning to us the watch, and we will repair it without further charge. Each one will be accompanied with a certificate to keep accurate time. Price $15. Gentlemen's and Ladies' sizes. For this reason any one can have a reliable watch, equal in appearance, and as good for time, as a gold one costing $100. Also Oroide Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $2 to $6. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Customers must pay all the express charges.

C. D. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St., N. Y. Opposite P. O. (up stairs).

☞ TO CLUBS.—Where SIX WATCHES are ordered at one time, we will send one EXTRA Watch, making SEVEN WATCHES FOR NINETY DOLLARS.

☞ CAUTION. Since our Oroide Watches have attained so high a reputation, and the demand for them has greatly increased, many persons are offering common and worthless watches for sale, representing them to be Oroide Watches, in some instances stating that they are ours. We would state most positively that we employ no Agents, and that no one else does or can make Oroide; consequently these representations are false. The genuine Oroide Watches can only be obtained by ordering directly from us.

UNRIVALED.

Nothing that has ever been known or heard of as a tonic adds so much to the resistant power of the human system, under circumstances unfavorable to health, as

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters,

If you would escape the threatened horrors of a fit of indigestion, bilious attacks, and bowel complaints, of which cold and damp are the frequent causes, use the BITTERS AS A PROTECTIVE MEDICINE. This is the wisest course; but, if already an invalid, try the preparation as a REMEDIAL AGENT. In either case full reliance may be placed upon its efficacy.

There is no mystery about the causes of its success. It is the only stomachic and alterative in use that combines the grand requisites of a mild, pure, and unvitiated vegetable stimulant, with the finest selection of tonic anti-bilious, anti-dyspeptic, diuretic, and depurative herbs, plants, roots, and barks that have ever been introduced in a medicinal compound.

The Bitters have this distinctive quality, which is not shared, it is believed, by any tonic, tincture, or extract in the world, that it never excites the pulse, though it infuses a wonderful degree of vigor into the nervous system, and strengthens and sustains the whole physical organization.

California and Australia have emphatically endorsed it as the BEST REMEDY for Chills and Fever, and in Spanish America, and all the tropical climate, it is considered the only reliable antidote to epidemic fevers.

The already immense and still increasing consumption of backed by many of the most influential physicians throughout the country, should convince the most skeptical that it is worthy the confidence and approbation of all.

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters,

CORNS. BRIGGS'S CURATIVE for Corns, Bunions, Ingrowing Nails, Frosted Feet, &c., surpasses all other remedies. No more pain from Corns; no more shoes made small from Bunions; no more limping from Ingrowing Nails. Briggs's Curative does not cut or burn, but soothes, softens, and heals all pedal ailments.

Sold by druggists and sent by mail, 40 cents.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20c., 25c., 30c., 35c., best 40c. per pound. Hotels, Saloons, Boarding-House Keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize by using our French Breakfast and Dinner Coffee, which we sell at the low price of 30c. per pound, and warrant to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50c. to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,
Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St. (Post-Office Box, No. 5643), New York City.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense, and the money will have been refunded.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same rates (and in the same quantities of one pound or upwards) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city.

Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a club say how much tea or coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price List, as published in this paper and in our circulars. Make out the names and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete send it to us by mail, and we will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, and send the whole to one address in their neighborhood—each party getting exactly what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the club can divide equitably among themselves.

The funds to pay for the goods ordered can be sent by drafts on New York, by post-office money orders, or by express, as may suit the convenience of the club. Or, if the amount ordered exceed $30, we will, if desired, send the goods by Express to "collect on delivery."

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package for the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We send no complimentary package for Clubs of less than $20.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Tea and Coffees about one-third by sending directly to "The Great American Tea Company."

BEWARE of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our Establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are bogus or confidence. We have no branches, and do not, in any case, authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office orders and drafts make payable to the order of the Great American Tea Company. Direct letters and orders to the Great American Tea Company,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street, Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

The Postage within the United States on the MAGAZINE is 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, which must be paid quarterly, or yearly, at the office where received. Subscriptions to the Canadian British Provinces must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the United States postage.

Subscriptions to the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will find on each wrapper the Number with which their subscription expires. Subscriptions are stopped when the term of subscription closes. It is our invariable rule to require payment in advance.

In ordering the MAGAZINE, the WEEKLY, or the BAZAR, the name of the State should be carefully written. When the direction is to be changed, both the old and new address must be given.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

"IMPROVED BRONZE ALUMINUM HUNTING-CASED WATCHES"

(The qualities and resemblance of this new metal are such, compared to gold, that even judges are deceived.)—See REPORT of Exposition. "FLEVATED PEOPLE'S WATCH."

The Improved Bronze Aluminum of which my watches are made is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. It has seriously occupied the attention of the scientific men, and has not only called forth the eulogiums of the press in consequence of its peculiar qualities, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition, and even been favorably noticed by the Emperor of the Holiness Pius IX., authorizing its use in the manufacture of Church goods.

The qualities of this metal are such that it is surpassed by none, if we except gold itself; and I can say on account of the intrinsic value of the latter. Further details will be found in my circulars, which will be sent postpaid on demand.

My watches are made of three sizes, all hunting-cased—one small for ladies or lads, and two for gents. The movements are well finished, carefully put to gether by skilful workmen, and perfectly regulated. I can therefore warrant them excellent time-keepers. These qualities are guaranteed in my own factory. I am enabled to sell any of the above sizes at one uniform price, viz., $20, the full assortment of all kinds of chains always on hand.

THE ERIE RAILROAD DISASTER—THE WRECKED AND BURNING CARS.—SKETCHED BY STANLEY FOX.—[SEE NEXT PAGE.]

THE ERIE RAILROAD DISASTER.

ANOTHER broken rail and fifty more broken bodies: another insecure stone, another burned car, and half a score of charred remains! The disaster of April 15 on the Erie railroad proves to be only less horrible than that at Angola.

The particulars of the horrible affair show that it was occasioned by fast running of the train to make up lost time. The train was the Buffalo express, due in New York at an early hour of the morning, and at the time of the accident was forty minutes behind time. It was running at the rate of twenty-five or thirty miles an hour, and in going around a sharp curve at Carr's Point the four cars at the rear were thrown from the track and down an embankment of 100 feet into a stream below. The curve runs along the edge of a bluff, the slope of which is marked by jagged rocks. The first car which went over the embankment appears to have plunged headlong from the road-bed to the bottom of the hill and to have been crushed with its living freight in the fall. The others rolled down the hill and the débris was scattered down the slope of the hill. The third car plunged into the creek, and the fourth was entirely consumed, many of its wounded inmates perishing in the flames. The total number known to be killed reaches twenty-six, but it is believed that others have been burned to death. The wounded number sixty-three, and many of them are so badly injured that they can hardly survive.

There is little doubt that the cause of the accident is the same as that which led to the Angola disaster—the breaking of a defective rail. The engineer of the train deposes that this was the cause of the disaster.

Our engraving on the first page represents the scene immediately after the occurrence of the accident and while the car was yet burning.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE LAW.

THE counsel for the President occupied two weeks in opening testimony. But his moral evidence was already in. For three years the country has had the Executive in full view, and no measure on one side or another, wishes that the legitimate results of the war shall be secured, has supposed that such a result would be possible while a man who is degraded by base corruption like that which existed in the late rebel States exclusively to the late rebels is in the Executive chair. Yet he ingeniously availed of committing no technical act which would bring him by the letter as well as by the spirit wholly within the constitutional conditions of impeachment. Consequently the country, willing to impeach, did not demand impeachment. It was felt to be better to endure to the end of his term, and then replace him by a loyal, intelligent Magistrate, who would co-operate with the representatives of the people, instead of thwarting them upon every opportunity. But, as often happens to men in his position, the President's cunning was complicated and betrayed him. He deliberately violated the law. Instantly public opinion assented to the constitutional remedy. The dominant party in Congress, which in December accepted rhetorically refused to impeach, in February promptly and unanimously presented articles of impeachment.

The public interest in the trial has been unflagging. Its daily progress has been most carefully studied, and its significance can not be overestimated. The omit of the pretty clear intentions, acrimonies, and party heats that necessarily follow a civil war, the Chief Magistrate of the nation can be promptly tried, so that the fact assent upon his part, and with entire conformity to the fundamental law, is the most signal illustration of the advance of civilization. There is nothing that would so much add to the gain of political society in the perfect supremacy of law, and nothing, consequently, that would so secure the weakest every government resting upon privilege and force as, after trial and conviction, the peaceable deposition of the President and the quiet progress of the Government. It would then appear that whether the head of the Government be assassinated or legally removed, the political structure does not rest upon a single man but upon all the people, and that the system is not even jarred by any personal fortune.

The President's defense has been wholly conducted by Mr. STANBERY, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. EVARTS, and with a decorum and dignity equal to their ability and befitting the gravity of the cause. The case for the Managers was mainly intrusted to General BUTLER. His skill, coolness, promptitude, and knowledge have been conspicuous; but, unhappily, his want of tact and courtesy and his peculiar training in the courts have been not less so. Inevitable as we believe the result of the trial to be, we can not but think it has been often harmed both by the manner of General BUTLER and by the method of conducting their case adopted by the Managers. It was desirable, within proper limits, to allow testimony, in so exceptional a case and before so exceptional a tribunal, to take a wide range, and it was therefore a mistake to contest every point with the pertinacity of a criminal lawyer in a doubtful trial. The Senate, however, wisely resolved not to make any stringent rule upon the subject, deciding that it was better to settle each question of admissibility as it arose.

The effort of the defense was to prove that the President acted under competent advice, and that his design was simply to test the constitutionality of the law. This was the substance of the contest upon the admission of the testimony of General THOMAS and the end of the Cabinet. The President's counsel evidently hoped to show that the chief officers of the army were of opinion that Mr. STANTON could be removed for the good of the service, and that the President acted only after consultation with the Cabinet and for the highest public welfare. General SHERMAN'S evidence was at last admitted. But, of course, whatever the General might have testified that the President declared, the declaration itself could not be of the least importance. On the 22d of February the President removed the Secretary of War. On the 1st and the 31st of January he told General SHERMAN that he wanted to remove Secretary STANTON and to bring the matter into the courts. Very well; we are then obliged by the President's antecedents and character to ask whether his word upon such a point must naturally be accepted, whether we believe his sole object was not that he declared it to be; whether his dispatch to Governor PARSONS, for instance, or, in fact, his whole course does not reveal an animus which forbids the theory that he was merely an honest magistrate troubled about the validity of a law. Or, again, supposing that he would have removed Secretary STANTON out and an agent of his own in, for the purpose of organizing opposition to the laws, would he be likely to announce it to the Lieutenant-General? Would he not, rather, seek to clear that his purpose was as pure as purity?

During the discussion upon admitting this evidence Mr. EVARTS made a very remarkable assertion: "He said that he relied on the case was not to turn upon "the mere formal technical infraction of the Tenure-of-Office Act. In other words, he insisted that the President was not impeached for violating a law, and he went on to say that the defense hoped to prove that the President had done nothing against the public welfare with the intention of any improper purposes. This is a very remarkable observation, because it assumes that it would not be impeachable for the President deliberately and technically to violate a law unless his motives could be proved to be bad. From such an opinion we wholly dissent. Indeed the essential point of the whole case is that a law is often stated it, and it should be constantly borne in mind. If the President, while having constitutional power to veto a law, which has been constitutionally passed over his veto, still continues to urge that veto and makes it operative by formally and technically violating the law, under whatever pretext, whether of purpose, he usurps a function which the Constitution does not assign to him, and which wholly supersedes the express Constitutional authority of Congress to nullify his veto, and he consequently changes the form of the government.

That is the very head and front of this case, for if the violation of a law may be justified, as if "the mere formal, technical infraction of the Tenure-of-Office Act" is of no consequence, provided the Executive pleads a Constitutional doubt, then the plea of a Constitutional doubt must equally justify him in a formal and technical infraction of every other act and of every law upon the Statute-Book. Such an argument excuses him from all obedience to law. It has been chosen to bring the question of its validity before the Supreme Court, and until the Supreme Court has chosen to do so it is idle for anyone to say that there are some laws that can be tested in no other way. For it is better that some laws should not be tested than that the President should be allowed to decide that the laws he may violate under plea of testing them. Nor is it sufficient to offer to show that there was no bad motive. A Minister may have no bad motive; but the President, even with the best intentions, can not be suffered to become Dictator. If the Tenure-of-Office Act was a bad law, it was binding upon the President with all other laws. If Mr. STANTON stood within the terms of the law and the President removed him without complying with the law, the President is guilty of deliberately violating the law. If this shall be established by the Managers—and it seems to us as plain as any proposition can be made—the President is impeached by the Senate, its decision will confirm him as Dictator.

The elaborate effort of the defense to show purity of motive—which, as we think, the Senate did wisely in admitting a reasonable number of declarations of the President that he had nothing but the best purposes in view, for really there is nothing else for him to say, except that Mr. STANTON is not within the law. We are glad to know all that we can of the President's communications to men like General SHERMAN, and as little as possible of his communications to correspondents with note-book in hand. We know that the Cabinet thought the law unconstitutional. His counsel will show their ability will present his case. It is clear that the Senate is as candid and upright a tribunal as any impeached officer could desire. It will conduct from the beginning shows that it means to do justice. But we shall await with curious interest the argument that shall attempt to prove to the Senate of the United States that President ANDREW JOHNSON, in the present condition of the country and with his notorious sympathies, associations, and hopes, may at his pleasure formally and technically violate the laws.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE AND THE POLITICAL FUTURE.

THE Independent, which has long been an enthusiastic supporter of Mr. CHASE, and has insisted upon his being the candidate of the Republican party, now declares "it recalls its nomination." The Tribune, also, which has warmly supported Mr. CHASE, now speaks as if General GRANT were already virtually the candidate. It may be assumed, therefore, that the nomination of the Chief Justice, which we suppose that he and many of the leading Republican managers ten months ago considered to be certain, is now formally abandoned. Of this we can not be sorry. With all our admiration of the ability and political consistency of Mr. CHASE we have always felt that his successful candidacy was not desirable because of the lamentable precedent, and also of party considerations not now necessary to describe. When Mr. CHASE ascended the Supreme Bench, he should have left political aspirations behind him. That he did not do so alienated the sympathy of very many of his sincerest friends who knew that the real interests of the country required his presence in the Court quite as much as in the White House. The Supreme Court was prostituted during the suppression of slavery in the Government to the basest partisan purpose. The DRED SCOTT opinion, which was not properly speaking a judgment of the Court, was all the clearer from that fact. It was an effort to smirch the purity of the ermine which served to show that the profound national desecration had received the sanction of Judiciary. Mr. CHASE'S succession to Mr. TANEY marked of itself a new and better day. Nothing has obscured the brightness of the promise but the known ambition of Chief Justice for the Presidency. That, we suppose, is now at rest; and a career quite as illustrious as that of President can before him if he chooses to embrace it.

We have hopes, for the Independent in recalling its nomination says, "the fact is now evident that Mr. CHASE no longer links his political future with the Republican party." This seems to imply that the Chief Justice still cherishes political hopes; and if he has separated himself from the Republican party it would seem that he can expect to fulfill those hopes only by the aid of the Democrats. But if, as the Independent says, Mr. CHASE is still faithful to his principles of equal rights he can certainly not look for success to a party which derides and tramples upon them. Either, therefore, he has no political hopes, or he expects to gratify them in a new party. The rumors that the Chief Justice could be a Democratic candidate we have treated with the good-natured contempt they deserve. The party whose really strongest candidate is FENDLETON, a repudiating secessionist, could hardly adopt Mr. CHASE as a compromise.

But the remark of the Independent has more than a mere political interest. If the Independent is not mistaken, and Mr. CHASE, one of the earliest and ablest and most consistent of Republicans, really no longer links his future with that party, it must be because he believes its principles or its policy are unequal to the situation. But its principles are peculiarly his principles: those which the Independent quotes. And its policy grows naturally out of them. It is a policy of equal suffrage, and nobody has more strenuously urged it than the Chief Justice. Certainly he can not suppose the Democratic party to be equal to the emergency, because its principles are confessedly hateful to him, and its policy the legitimate growth of such principles. There remains only the supposition that some new party is to arise with principles and policy sufficient to the situation. But nobody voices Mr. CHASE or of supposing that either of the two great and only parties of the country would disband upon the eve of a Presidential campaign.

We are forced to the conclusion, then, by the Independent's article, that if the Chief Justice, as it implies, still cherishes political aspirations, he is not separated from that party which, if the Republican party, it is not because he prefers the principles and policy of the other party or disapproves those of his late associates, but either because he fears that certain prominent Republican leaders will defeat the Republican policy, or because of a mere personal disappointment. Either of these conclusions is disagreeable for any friend of Mr. CHASE. It can not be supposed that he does not know that his withdrawal from a party whose principles and purposes he approves, because of dislike or distrust of certain leaders, is a virtual betrayal of the cause; while his desertion of a party he approves because of his own disappointment in its President, is a state that would cling to his name forever.

We prefer to believe that the Independent

misapprehends the Chief Justice, and consequently, without the least ill-intention, misrepresents him. The position in which it places him is intolerable for any honorable statesman. Less than a year ago the Republican policy was declared, and Mr. CHASE and many of the most ardent Republicans anticipated his nomination by the party. Nothing essential has meanwhile changed except the probability of the Chief Justice's nomination; yet the Independent thinks he has separated himself from the party. We say that the inevitable conclusion of the Independent's statement is so discreditable to a statesman whom we have hitherto sincerely honored, that we prefer to believe it mistaken until it gives us something more than a general assertion.

IRISH CHURCH REFORM.

IT is evident that the British Parliament has determined to abolish the establishment of the English Church in Ireland, and the resolution is so illustrative of the way we are accustomed to call the instinctive British good sense. It is also remarkable as being one of those positive and radical measures to which British legislation is, we might almost say, more positively averse. And it shows, therefore, how profoundly impressed Parliament is with the necessity of prompt and vigorous reform in Ireland. Even Mr. LOWE, in the champion of ultra-Church conservatism in England, raises his voice from the cavernous depths of Adullam, and declares that the Irish branches of the (so-called English) Church are rotten; and that the living Church of England is tied to the dead Church of Ireland. It is founded, he says, upon injustice. It is there "as it is at Derry, on the cannon in the ground?" The London Times, whose principle is the voice of the majority, calls the Irish Church the cancer of the empire. Its abolition as a state establishment it hails as the dawn of a new day for the empire; and this amusingly ardent accessory after the fact exclaims with a long unction: "The wrong of ages are to be ended, and right done amidst the acclamation of the nation. This must goad astee peace." Unquestionably, if the wrong are to be ended.

But the argument for the abolition is no plainer now than it always has been. The delight which the reform of the system is hailed is no more remarkable for its ingenuity. If any thing is known it is that enthusiasm for their church is deepest among an ignorant people of a passionate temperament; and that nothing among such a people so intensifies this enthusiasm as to be at once conquered and to see their religious faith despised by the conqueror. The dream of political union under such circumstances might be expected in Bedlam but not at St. Stephens. Yet this has been the situation of Ireland while England has been impatient and indignant, alternately wonder-struck and horror-struck by Irish disloyalty. And the church question has been but one of the Irish perplexities.

In Dublin, according to Mr. LOWE, out of one hundred of the population, seventy-eight are Roman Catholics, nine are Presbyterians, and twelve are in the Irish Protestant Church Establishment. The Protestant bishopric of Limerick, for instance, has a population of 394,563, of which only 11,122 belong to the Established Church. And, further, of this portion of the population the bishop receives £4000, and his clergy £12,000 more. But the 383,441 persons are wholly ignored by him and his clergy. There are two archbishops and eight in Ireland. One is Archbishop TRENCH, of the Established English Church, who is the spiritual head of twelve out of every hundred of the population; the other is Cardinal CULLEN, who is the Roman Catholic Primate and the spiritual head of seventy-eight out of the hundred. Archbishop Trench ranks above the Lord High Chancellor, the head of the magistracy of the kingdom; Cardinal CULLEN has no social status whatever. Archbishop TRENCH receives £6569 a year from the state; Cardinal CULLEN does not receive a penny. The clergy of the Archbishop are recognized as of good social rank; the clergy of Cardinal are regarded as "idolatrous priests." The social barrier is thus added to the religious.

While this was and is the incredible absurdity of the ecclesiastical situation, it is undeniable, namely, the whole body of the native people passionately attached to what they consider their precious, persecuted church, while the church of the stranger is fondled and supported by the Government—the tone of the Protestant authorities has been taunting and exasperating. Mr. JAMES FITZJAMES STEPHEN, intelligent and sensible writer upon these subjects in the Fortnightly Review, to whom we have been before indebted, quotes from the charge of the English Bishop of Kilmore in Ireland, who, as he says, kicks the Irish by remarking "that it was a righteous judgment of God that the Roman Catholic Priesthood in their property was confiscated, should, like the unfaithful branch of the family of AARON, 'crouch for a morsel of bread.'" And again: "Should the British Parliament consent to degrade the weaker sister church in Ireland to a level with the Church of Rome, as a recognized teacher of the people, it will spit in the face of the English Church, who must share in the degradation which the other suffers."

That any sensible Englishman should have supposed such a preposterous situation could continue without an almost hopeless alienation seems inconceivable. Mr. GLADSTONE properly describes it when he says: "The situation of Ireland is this: you have had the guarantees of personal liberty suspended for three years, and the country is in possession of an enemy and a police force organized as an army. That is a state of things in which the power of this country keeps down the elements of disaffection, sedition, and disloyalty in Ireland. Is that a condition in which it is safe for this country to continue?" But it has continued until Ireland is in sentiment more than ever a foreign and hostile nation. The effect of a reconciliation begins tardily, but with apparent heartiness. Yet it is but a beginning. As Mr. GLADSTONE and Mr. BRIGHT both agree, the chief concern of England for many a day must be Ireland.

THE ERIE RAILWAY MASSACRE.

THE Erie Railway Company is morally guilty of the late frightful massacre upon that road. We mean exactly what we say. The train was running at extraordinary speed upon what is naturally the most dangerous part of the road, a shelf upon the side of a precipice at a rail brook, and four cars were thrown down the cliff. One of them, a sleeping-car, took fire, and was consumed. More than twenty persons were killed upon the spot, instantly or shortly after, and as yet agony, and the list of wounded is appalling. Now in a late report the Superintendent of the Road says:

"We have passed through three months of unusually severe winter weather, and moved more than an average traffic over them, with the road-bed solid as a rock, the rails incased in snow and ice, so that it has been impossible to do much in the way of repairs; the iron rails have become brittle, and worn out beyond all precedent, until there is scarce a mile of your road, except that laid within the last seven Jersey City and Salamanca or Buffalo, where it is safe to run a train at the ordinary passenger rate of speed, and many portions of the road can only be traversed safely by reducing the speed of all trains to twelve or fifteen miles an hour, only in some cases the worn-out and rotten condition of the rails Between wheels, rails, sleepers, and bearings of the have been of daily, almost hourly, occurrence for the last two months, caused mostly by defective rails. Fully 1000 broken rails were taken from the track in the month of February, which the number removed on account of lamination, crushing, or wearing out was much greater. February will show a still worse record than January, as the condition of the iron at the present date is such as to give me much anxiety and apprehension for the safety of trains. We can not and do not attempt to make the schedule time with our trains nearly all lost from five to two hours in passing over the road, and it has been only by the exercise of extreme caution we have been able thus far to escape serious accident."

This was the report of the officer who was intrusted with the general care of the road subject to the control of the Directors. He is the most perilous part of this perilous road, upon which the speed of all trains should have been reduced, in the judgment of the Superintendent, to not more than nine miles an hour, the engineer testifies that the train was running at a rate of twenty-five to thirty miles an hour. The conductor says that he had lost much time which he has liberty at certain seasons of the year to make up at his discretion, and that he does not think is dangerous "to run twenty-five miles an hour over any road in place." But neither the conductor may think the Directors knew what their agent the Superintendent had reported, and they could not without the most guilty negligence have omitted to forbid the running of trains beyond a certain speed. That they had not done so: that they had permitted conductors to use their discretion in making time to make up time over a road upon which the condition of the iron gave the Superintendent much anxiety and apprehension for the safety of all trains, is a fact. The coroner's jury therefore properly found that "the occurrence in our opinion might have been avoided, had the train run at less speed, owing to the unsafe condition of the road."

The Directors of the Erie Railway deserve the moral reprobation of the community. Had they taken due degree as solicitous for the proper condition of their road and for the safety of the passengers whom they entrapped into their trains as they have shown themselves for the personal advantages that might arise from speculating in the stock, this horrible catastrophe would not have happened. Without the least knowledge of any of the persons who propose the direction of that road, we warn the public that no man can travel over it until that direction is changed without criminal disregard of the most common precautions for personal safety. The present direction, unless it can show that it had issued all orders for running trains in conformity with the startling revelations made by the Superintendent, and that it had been zealously relaying the whole track with the best material, and had established the most thorough supervision of every mile of the road, has proved itself shamefully and culpably incompetent for its duties. The catastrophe was no more unavoidable than the heating of the axle of a private carriage, which no competent coachman ever allows to happen.

The Legislature is in session, and we hope that it will do something to protect the public against the mingled rapacity and neglect of railway management. Instead of debating whether a issue of stock shall be legalized, let it decide that travelers shall not be recklessly massacred. Such events, which are constantly recurring, not only smite hundreds of families with unendurable sorrow, but they bring the principle of our society into contempt, by showing that individual enterprise is not conscientious enough to be trusted with the management of great public highways and the public safety. If the State Senate would appoint a committee to investigate with authority this latest accident, to extend its inquiries to the whole subject, and to report at the next session some system of securing a fair chance of safety for travelers by railroad, it would do the State as real a service as if it granted a million of dollars to build other roads to be managed like the Erie road.

WEST POINT.

The record published by General CULLUM of the military and educational institutions of the graduates of West Point constitutes the best defense of that institution which could have been made. It appears that over 2200 cadets have graduated from 1802 to and including the class of 1867. Among the names not distinguished in war we observe those of STEVENS the LEVERETTS, and the Stevens Institute of ROBERT P. PARROTT, who devised the Parrott gun; of GEORGE W. WHISTLER, the celebrated railroad engineer, lately employed in Russia; and of CHARLES DAVIES, the author of the oldest representatives of science which this country has produced.

WASHINGTON in his message of December, 1793, against the expressed opinion of JEFFERSON, recommended what JEFFERSON called a military academy. "I opposed it," says JEFFERSON in his diary, "as unconstitutional, and HAMILTON and KNOX approved it without discussion. RANDOLPH was for it, saying that the words of the Constitution authorized Congress to lay taxes, etc., for the common defense might comprehend it. The President said he would not choose to recommend any thing against the opinions of a majority of us, but if he was impressed with the necessity of the measure that he would report it to Congress, and let them decide for themselves whether the Constitution authorized it or not. It was therefore left in."

In May, 1794, Congress expressed itself favorably to the Constitution, and Mr. WASHINGTON again presented the subject to the attention of Congress. But it was not until March, 1802, that West Point was selected as the site of the school. The Secretary of War under ADAMS, had urged the matter so fully and forcibly in his annual report in 1800 that the organization was decided scale took place. JEFFERSON, in 1803, waiving his constitutional scruples proposed an augmentation of the institution and its removal to the best seat of the Government, a suggestion which fortunately was not adopted.

It is generally conceded that the great efficiency of West Point is due to the arrangements made during the administration of JAMES MONROE, which extended from March 4, 1817, to March 4, 1825. General STEPHEN THAYER, in July, 1817, was appointed Superintendent after having examined the military schools and establishments of Europe, which he visited on the termination of their great conflict, and was thus instructed to frame and to fill effect the intentions of the Government. In Major THAYER there was a fortunate union of those qualities which the circumstances therefore it some yielding on the part of their professors to pecuniary interests, such interests as between professors and cadets in no manner interfere with the efficiency of a West Point to provide a military education complete, and to impress upon it a character of nationality.

If Mr. CALHOUN'S doctrine of the right of nullification and secession, announced long after his connection with Mr. MONROE'S administration, contributed to produce the rebellion, which it unquestionably did, though he claimed that this was not his motive, he had also provided a remedy in elevating West Point into great efficiency. He as one of his early reports as Secretary of War he said:

"It ought never to be forgotten that the military science in the present condition of the world can not be neglected with impunity. It has become so complicated and extensive as to require for its acquisition laborious study and much time to be exclusively devoted to it. It can only flourish under the patronage of the Government, and without such patronage it must be almost wholly neglected. A comparatively small sum expended in time of peace to foster and extend the knowledge of military science, will, in the event of war, be highly beneficial to the country, and may be the means of its safety."

The Chief Engineer in 1822 reported "that the Military Academy may be considered as having been in its infancy until about the beginning of 1818, prior to which time there was but little system or regularity;" and he added, that a large portion of the students "have been under the necessity of leaving the Academy without completing their education." The support given to the institution by Mr. CALHOUN, and the powerful efforts of Major THAYER, enabled Mr. CALHOUN to speak of the institution in December, 1823, as "not inferior to any similar institution in any country."

The Southern tendencies of Mr. CALHOUN were indicated as early as the early day by a recommendation to establish another institution of like character in the Southern States; but it is fortunate that the recommendation was not adopted, as both would have been more or less sectional, whereas the important fact that a large number of those educated at West Point from the Southern States remained true to the Union—General GEORGE H. THOMAS is the most signal instance—proves that the influence of the institution was not as unfortunate as has often been alleged.

A curious examiner into the law of compensation will find in the far-seeing circumspection and sagacity of Mr. CALHOUN as Secretary of War, and in the policy of nullification and secession to which he was subsequently committed the good a partial remedy for the evil—much to interest than is weighing and comparing those different measures. Certain it is that it required the exercise of forethought and diligence at this early period to prepare for a war that happened only about thirty-six years after Mr. MONROE'S administration had ceased. The term of Mr. ADAMS, which succeeded, was not favorable for military improvements, parties were rigidly and hotly held and party-spirit ran high. Nor was the term of General JACKSON favorable for that purpose, as he was a distinguished soldier, and especially friendly to West Point, and there were other subjects to engage the attention of his Cabinet, arising from the violence of party action during his Presidency.

Reflection will perhaps show us that the organization of West Point, on a basis such as would enable it to continue to conduct war with the highest skill, could have taken place at no period with such advantage as during the administration of President MONROE, and it is to be regretted that General CULLUM's work so valuable and likely to be so enduring, should have omitted, in his able preface, to allude to those circumstances, so far as external management is concerned, the good results in skill and science, and, what is equally important, in honor and patriotism, which have developed, and will West Point have developed, and which have rendered that institution heretofore safe.

It needed a concurrence in both the excellence of the instruction imparted and the peculiar relation of the students to under the efficiency of the institution complete. The cadets instead of paying are paid, and are the subjects of military rules. While in our colleges there

MR. DICKENS'S FAREWELL.

After four months of constant travel and public reading, his first course has said farewell to America. "In this brief life of ours," he said to his last audience in Boston, "it is said to be almost time for one for the last time, and I can not conceal it from you that although my face will so soon be turned toward my native land and to all that makes it dear, it is a sad consideration for me that in a very few moments from this time this brilliant hall and all that it contains will fade from my view for ever and ever." The sadness of this parting is shared by all who have ever felt the exquisite spell of his rare genius, and who feel that he is to be classed among the true human benefactors.

There has unquestionably been a certain coolness of feeling in this country toward Mr. DICKENS upon the part of many who should be naturally his warmest friends. But we think no one who reads, certainly no one who heard, the frank and manly and generous speech which he made at the Press dinner in New York, will any longer allow the least cloud to chill the ardor of his admiration for one of the greatest humorists and most delightful authors in literature.

His last reading in New York and in the country was almost painfully interesting. His personal suffering which compelled him to keep one foot upon a chair during the evening, and the shadow of the one word which, as he said at parting, had been impending over the whole reading, made the occasion very touching and memorable. Returning slowly after all was over, and in obedience to the enthusiastic applause, to the quiet little table, which was covered with beautiful flowers, in wreaths and baskets and bouquets, he began to speak amidst the profound silence of the vast audience. His voice trembled, and neither he nor his hearers could smile at the little jests. The moment was too solemn. It was the final personal farewell to a great writer whose name is familiar and beloved; but whose future life, as he said, "lies over the sea." Mr. DICKENS'S visit has been in all wise and fortunate; and we believe that he will never regret the determination he made to come once more in his maturity to see the country which he had seen and judged as a younger man.

LITERARY.

One of the most graphic and valuable contributions to the history of the war is Mr. ABBOTT'S "Army and the Rebellion," by JOHN Y. FOSTER. The work was authorized and published by the State, and is a monument of laborious industry. The research which is essential to an accurate work of this kind is enormous; but it has not daunted Mr. FOSTER, nor crushed his hand. He has written a free, flowing, spirited story of the good cause in his State, and in the field, and every Jerseyman, as well as every student of the war, will consult his careful and correct narrative with the utmost satisfaction. The work, a large, handsome volume, is published by MARTIN R. DENNIS & Co., Newark.

"The Massacre of St. Bartholomew," by HENRY WHITE, just issued in a solid, handsome volume by HARPER & BROTHERS, is an admirable historical monograph of a most interesting period. It is a work which we shall refer to, and which we cordially commend to our readers.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

IMPEACHMENT.

The trial of the Impeachment of President Johnson was resumed by the Senate on April 18. Certain documentary evidence was admitted which had been introduced on that and the succeeding day. A couple of Washington letters were examined by the Court, but but little that was pertinent to the case was obtained. On the 17th the defense introduced evidence to disprove the reported language of the President in his Cleveland and St. Louis speeches; and Frederick W. Seward testified as to the practice in regard to the appointment of Provost-Marshals, showing that such nominations were frequently made as matters of necessity. Governor Wells testified to having urged the President to ask of General Emory the meaning of the movement of troops in the Department of Washington. On April 17 and 18 the defense offered to prove that the President's Cabinet concurred in the opinion that the Civil Tenure bill was unconstitutional, and that Mr. Stanton and Mr. Seward were the message vetoing it. The Senate ruled that the evidence was not admissible. On the 20th and April 21, the defense closed their testimony, and the arguments of counsel began on the 23d.

THE ILLICIT DISTILLERY RAID.

LITTLE STREET, Brooklyn, in the vicinity of the Navy-yard, has long been held by the Internal Revenue officers to be a very suspicious place; and on April 13 the suspicions concerning it were fully confirmed. On the afternoon of that day Collector E. T. WOOD, with the assistance of a squad of fifty marines from the Navy-yard, made an unexpected descent on the place, and succeeded in capturing a large number of illicit whisky stills. The news of the arrival of the marines, and their warlike demonstrations and movements through the neighborhood like wild-fire, and in a very short space of time two or three hundred people had collected from the houses into the square which was blocked by the marines. On top of the houses, from the windows and doors of the dwellings, scores of people looked down upon the crowd and the soldiers in the street. The mob outside soon swelled in numbers until about 3000 persons had collected, and the greatest excitement prevailed. The mob, however, confined its demonstrations chiefly to howls, only one or two persons being struck or injured. Seven illicit stills were broken up, and the materials destroyed.

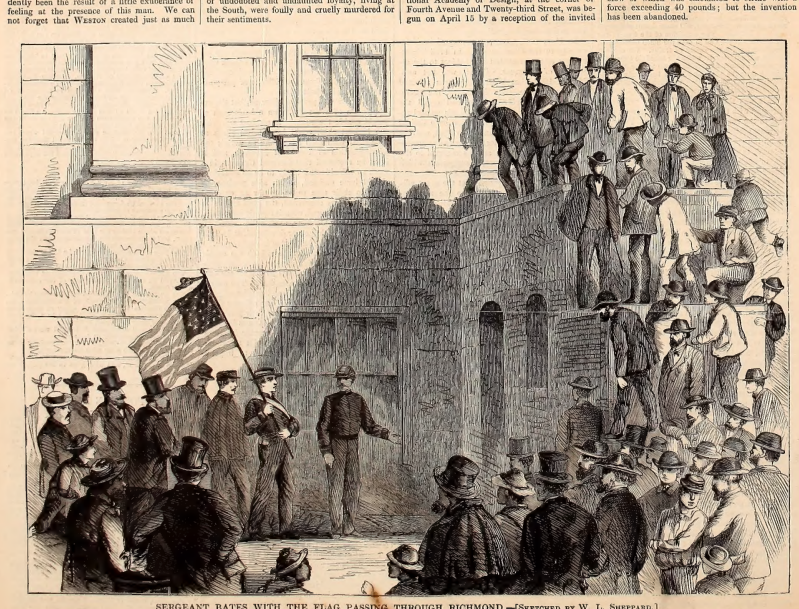
SERGEANT BATES'S PILGRIMAGE.

SERGEANT GILBERT H. BATES, who was formerly a soldier in a Wisconsin regiment, partly in emulation of WESTON, but principally because he seems to have had nothing better to do, lately made a wager that he would walk in 78 days from Vicksburg to Washington city, carrying the United States flag, and depending entirely on the hospitality of the people of the South for support. The wager has been won. Sergeant BATES triumphantly ended his pilgrimage on April 14. There was no reason why he should not have won the wager if he had any endurance as a pedestrian. The distance is not great; the flag is not heavy; and it has been carried as triumphantly through the same region against greater obstacles than Sergeant BATES appears to have encountered.

The people of the South have made use of the incident to display their enthusiasm and patriotism; but, if we are to credit the story of the Sergeant, the demonstrations seem to have been confined almost exclusively to praises of the course of President JOHNSON and to prayers for their rights.

Our illustration represents the Sergeant passing through Richmond, Virginia. He was received there with much enthusiasm—how genuine it is difficult to determine. The exhibition of loyalty on the part of the Southern people is desirable under any and all circumstances, but their demonstrations in this instance have evidently been the result of a little exuberance of feeling at the presence of this man. We can not forget that WESTON created just as much excitement on a trip of the same nature. And, moreover, it can not but be remembered that, while this stranger was not molested or interrupted on his way, peaceable and worthy men of undoubted and undaunted loyalty, living at the South, were foully and cruelly murdered for their sentiments.

OPENING OF THE ACADEMY OF DESIGN.



THE forty-third annual exhibition of the National Academy of Design, at the corner of Fourth Avenue and Twenty-third Street, was begun on April 15 by a reception of the invited guests. These private views generally take the form of a conversazione; and since the erection of the present art temple they have been deservedly popular. On this occasion the weather was very bad, but it did not deter the guests from attending. Until about nine o'clock the galleries were occupied by a few straggling groups only; and each new-comer predicted that the attendance would be slim, on account of the weather. Soon after nine, however, the assemblage began to increase gradually; nor was it long before the feat of winding one's way through the throng without damaging some wonderful arrangement of drapery or coiffure had become almost impossible. In point of numbers, beauty, and elegance, this reception was fully equal to any of its predecessors. Our illustration on page 280 represents the scene within the gallery at the most interesting hour of the reception.

FLYING MACHINES.

IT is obviously the wing of the bird that ought to be studied if ever we are to traverse the air at will; in a thousand feathered forms Nature gives us the hint, though it needs a patient following up before it will be of use to us. It is said that Archytas of Turento—in the fourth century before the Christian era—constructed a pigeon of wood, which could fly, though if it fell to the ground it could not raise itself again. Friar Bacon, in the thirteenth century, tells us that instruments of flying may be formed, in which a man sitting at his ease and meditating on any subject may beat the air with his artificial wings, after the manner of birds. In the tenth century an Italian adventurer had visited Scotland, and attempted, by the aid of a set of ample wings, composed of various plumages, to fly from Stirling Castle to France; but he soon came to the ground, breaking his thigh-bone in the fall. A later endeavor was that of the Marquis de Bacqueville, who, in 1742, rose by the help of wings from his residence on the Quai des Theatins, Paris, and directed his flight across the Seine toward the gardens of the Tuileries; but just as he had advanced half-way he appeared to lose all command of his movements, and, falling, had his leg broken by contact with a washer-woman's machine, besides sustaining other serious injuries.

The result thus fruitlessly aimed at on so many occasions may nevertheless, in principle, be one day achieved. The English Aeronautical Society are going to work in the right way; not lending encouragement to wild schemes, but studying patiently the mechanical principles concerned in the flight of birds.

Mr. Butler, a member of the council of the above Society, constructed a pair of wings to operate from the car of a balloon, the downward blow of which was calculated to strike with a force exceeding 40 pounds; but the invention has been abandoned.

THE MOONSTONE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," etc.

Printed from the Author's Manuscript.

RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.

CHAPTER VI.

(1.) "MISS CLACK presents her compliments to Mr. Franklin Blake: and, in sending him the fifth chapter of her humble narrative, begs to say that she feels quite unequal to enlarge as she could wish on an event so awful, under the circumstances, as Lady Verinder's death. She has, therefore, attached to her own manuscript copious Extracts from precious publications in her possession, all bearing on this terrible subject. And may those Extracts (Miss Clack fervently hopes) sound as the blast of a trumpet in the ears of her respected kinsman, Mr. Franklin Blake."

(2.) "Mr. Franklin Blake presents his compliments to Miss Clack, and begs to thank her for the fifth chapter of her narrative. In returning the extracts sent with it, he will refrain from mentioning any personal objection which he may entertain to this species of literature, and will merely say that the proposed additions to the manuscript are not necessary to the fulfillment of the purpose that he has in view."

(3.) "Miss Clack begs to acknowledge the return of her Extracts. She affectionately reminds Mr. Franklin Blake that she is a Christian, and that it is, therefore, quite impossible for him to offend her. Miss C. persists in feeling the deepest interest in Mr. Blake, and pledges herself, on the first occasion when sickness may lay him low, to offer him the use of her Extracts for the second time. In the mean while she would be glad to know, before beginning the next and last chapter of her narrative, whether she may be permitted to make her humble contribution complete by availing herself of the light which later discoveries have thrown on the mystery of the Moonstone."

(4.) "Mr. Franklin Blake is sorry to disappoint Miss Clack. He can only repeat the instructions which he had the honor of giving her when she began her narrative. She is requested to limit herself to her own individual experience of persons and events, as recorded in her Diary. Later discoveries she will be good enough to leave to the pens of those persons who can write in the capacity of actual witnesses."

(5.) "Miss Clack is extremely sorry to trouble Mr. Franklin Blake with another letter. The Extracts have been returned, and the expression of her matured views on the subject of the Moonstone has been forbidden. Miss Clack is mortfully conscious that she ought (in the worldly phrase) to feel herself put down. But, no—Miss C. has learned Perseverance in the School of Adversity. Her object in writing is to know whether Mr. Blake (who prohibits every thing else) prohibits the appearance of the present correspondence in Miss Clack's narrative? Some explanation of the position in which Mr. Blake's interference has placed her as an authoress, seems due on the ground of common justice. And Miss Clack, on her side, is most anxious that her letters should be produced to speak for themselves."

(6.) "Mr. Franklin Blake agrees to Miss Clack's proposal, on the understanding that she will kindly consider this intimation of his consent as closing the correspondence between them."

(7.) "Miss Clack feels it an act of Christian duty (before the correspondence closes) to inform Mr. Franklin Blake that his last letter—evidently intended to offend her—has not succeeded in accomplishing the object of the writer. She affectionately requests Mr. Blake to respect the privacy of his own room, and to consider with himself whether the training which can thus elevate a poor weak woman above the reach of insult, be not worthy of greater admiration than he is now disposed to feel for it. On being favored with an intimation to that effect, Miss C. solemnly pledges herself to send back the complete series of her Extracts to Mr. Franklin Blake."

(To this letter no answer was received. Comment is needless.

(Signed) DRUSILLA CLACK.]

CHAPTER VII.

THE foregoing correspondence will sufficiently explain why no choice is left me but to pass over Lady Verinder's death with the simple announcement of the fact which ends the fifth chapter.

Keeping myself for the future strictly within the limits of my own personal experience, I have next to relate that a month elapsed from the time of my aunt's decease before Rachel Verinder and I met again. That meeting was the occasion of my spending a few days under the same roof with her. In the course of my visit something happened, relating to her marriage engagement with Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite, which is important enough to require special notice in these pages. When this last of many painful family circumstances has been disclosed, my task will be completed; for I shall then have told all that I know, as an actual (and most unwilling) witness of events.

My aunt's remains were removed from London, and were buried in the little cemetery attached to the church in her own park. I was invited to the funeral with the rest of the family. But it was impossible (with my religious views) to cross myself in a few days only from the shock which this death had caused me. I was informed, moreover, that the rector of Frizinghall was to read the service. Having myself in past times seen this clerical castaway making one of the players at Lady Verinder's whist-table, I doubt, even if I had been fit to travel, whether I should have felt justified in attending the ceremony.

Lady Verinder's death left her daughter under the care of her brother-in-law, Mr. Ablewhite the elder. He was appointed guardian by the will, until his niece married, or came of age. Under these circumstances, Godfrey naturally saw his father, I suppose, of the new relation in which he stood toward Rachel. At any rate, in ten days from my aunt's death, the first visit of the marriage engagement was no secret at all within the circle of the family, and the grand question for Mr. Ablewhite senior was now confirmed. Who was to say?—was he to make himself and his authority most agreeable to the wealthy young lady who was going to marry his son.

Rachel gave him some trouble, at the outset, about the choice of a place in which the newly married pair were to reside. The house in Montagu Square was associated with the calamity of her mother's death. The house in Yorkshire was associated with the scandalous affair of the lost Moonstone. Her guardian's own residence at Frizinghall was objected to for these objections. But Rachel's presence in it, after her recent bereavement, operated as a check on the gayety of her cousins, Godfrey and Ablewhite—and she herself requested that her visit might be deferred to a more favorable opportunity. It ended in a proposal, emanating from Mr. Ablewhite, to try a furnished house at Brighton. His wife, an invalid daughter, and Rachel were to inhabit it together, and were to expect him to join them later in the season. They would see no society but a few old friends, and they would have his son Godfrey, traveling backward and forward by the London train, always at their disposal.

I describe this aimless fitting about from one place of residence to another—this inanimate restlessness of body and appalling stagnation of soul —merely with a view of arriving at results. The event which (under Providence) proved to be the means of bringing Rachel Verinder and myself together again, was no other than the hiring of the house at Brighton.

My Aunt Ablewhite is a large, silent, fair-complexioned woman, with one noteworthy point in her character. From the hour of her birth she has never been known to do any thing for herself. She has gone through life accepting every body's help, and adopting every body's opinions. A more hopeless person, in a spiritual point of view, I have never met with. There is absolutely, in this perplexing case, no obstructive material to work upon. Aunt Ablewhite would listen to the Grand Lama of Thibet exactly as she listens to Me, and would reflect his views quite as readily as she reflects mine. She found the furnished house at Brighton by stopping at an hotel in London, composing herself on a sofa, and sending for her son. She discovered the necessary servants by breakfasting in bed one morning (still at the hotel), and giving her maid a holiday on condition that the girl would begin preparing herself by fetching Miss Clack." I found her placidly fanning herself in her dressing-gown at eleven o'clock. "Drusilla, dear, I want some servants. You are so clever —please get them for me." I looked round the untidy room. "The church bells were going for a week-day service; they suggested a word of affectionate remonstrance on my part. "Oh, aunt!" I said, sadly, "is this worthy of a Christian Englishwoman? Is the passage from time to eternity to be made in this manner?" My aunt answered, "I'll put on my gown, Drusilla, if you will be kind enough to help me." What was to be said after that? I have done wonders with murderesses—I have never advanced an inch with Aunt Ablewhite. "Where is the list," I asked, "of the servants whom you require?" My aunt shook her head; she hadn't even energy enough to keep the list. "Rachel has got it, dear," she said, "in the next room." I went to the next room, and so saw Rachel again, for the first time since we had parted in Montagu Square.

She looked pitiably small and thin in her deep mourning. If I attached any serious importance to such a perishable trifle as personal appearance, I might be inclined to add that hers was one of those unfortunate complexions which always suffers when not relieved by a border of white next the skin. But what are our complexions and our looks? Hindrances and pitfalls, dear girls, which beset us on our way to higher things: Greatly to my surprise, Rachel rose when I entered the room, and came forward to meet me with outstretched hand.

"I am glad to see you," she said. "Drusilla, I have been in the habit of speaking very foolishly and very rudely to you, on former occasions. I beg your pardon. I hope you will forgive me."

My face, I suppose, betrayed the astonishment I felt at this. She colored up for a moment, and then proceeded to explain herself.

"In my poor mother's lifetime," she went on, "her friends always always my friends, too. Now I have lost her, my heart turns for comfort to the people she liked. She liked you. Try to be friends with me, Drusilla, if you can."

To my rightly-constituted mind the motive thus acknowledged was simply shocking. Here was Christian England was a young woman in a state of bereavement, with so little idea of where to look for true comfort, that she actually expected to find it among her mother's friends! Here was a relative of mine, awakened to a sense of her shortcomings toward others, under the influence, not of conviction and duty, but of sentiment and impulse! Most deplorable to think of—but, still, suggestive of something hopeful, to a person of my experience in plying the good work. There could be no harm, I thought, in ascertaining the extent of the change which the loss of her mother had wrought in Rachel's character. I decided, as a useful test, to probe her on the subject of her marriage engagement to Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite.

Having first met her advances with all possible cordiality. I sat by her on the sofa at her own request. We discussed family affairs and future plans—always excepting that one future plan which was to end in her marriage. Try as I might to turn the conversation that way, she resolutely declined to take the hint. Any open reference to my question, on my part, would have been premature at this early stage of our reconciliation. Besides, I had discovered all I wanted to know. She was no longer the reckless, defiant creature whom I had heard and seen, on the occasion of my martyrdom in Montagu Square. This was, of itself, more to encourage me than to take her conversion in hand—beginning with a few words of earnest warning directed against the hasty formation of the marriage tie, and so getting on to higher things. Looking at her now, with this new interest—and calling to mind the steadiness with which she had met Mr. Godfrey's matrimonial views—I felt the solemn duty of interfering, with a fervor which assured me that I should achieve no common results. Rapidity of proceeding was, as I believed, of importance in this case. I went back at once to the question of the servants wanted for the furnished house.

"Where is the list, dear?"

Rachel produced it.

"Cook, kitchen-maid, house-maid, and footman," I read. "My dear Rachel, these servants are only wanted for a term—the term during which your guardian has taken the house. We shall have great difficulty in finding persons of character and capacity to accept a temporary engagement of that sort, if we try in London. Has the house at Brighton been found yet?"

"Yes. Godfrey has taken it; and persons in the house wanted him to hire them as servants. He thought they would hardly do for us, and came back having settled nothing."

"And you have no experience yourself in these matters, Rachel?"

"None whatever."

"And Aunt Ablewhite won't exert herself?"

"No, poor dear. Don't blame her, Drusilla. I think she is the only really happy woman I have ever met with."

"There are degrees in happiness, darling. We must have a little talk some day on that subject. In the mean time I will undertake to meet the difficulty about the servants. Your aunt will write a letter to the people of the house."

"She will sign a letter if I write it for her, which comes to the same thing."

"Quite the same thing. I shall get the letter, and I will go to Brighton to-morrow."

"How extremely kind of you! We will join you as soon as you are ready for us. And you will stay, I hope, as my guest. Brighton is so lively; you are sure to enjoy it."

In those words the invitation was given, and the glorious prospect of interference was opened before me.

It was then the middle of the week. By Saturday afternoon the house was ready for them. In that short interval I had sifted, not the characters only, but the religious views as well, of all the disengaged servants who applied to me, and had succeeded in making a selection which my conscience approved. I also discovered, and called on, two serious friends of mine, residents in the town, to whom I knew I could confide the pious object which had brought me to Brighton. One of them—a clerical friend—kindly helped me to take rooms for our little party in the church in which he himself ministered. The other—a single lady, like myself—placed the resources of her library (composed throughout of precious publications) entirely at my disposal. I borrowed half a dozen works, all carefully chosen with a view to Rachel. When these had been judiciously distributed in the various rooms she would be likely to occupy, I considered that my preparations were complete. Sound doctrine in the servants who waited on her; sound doctrine in the minister who preached to her; sound doctrine in the books that lay on her table—such was the triple welcome which my zeal had prepared for the motherless girl! A heavenly compossus filled my mind, on that Saturday afternoon, as I sat at the window waiting the arrival of my relatives. The giddy throng passed and repassed before my eyes. Alas! how many of them felt my exquisite sense of duty done! An awful question. Let us not pursue it.

"I DON'T THINK HE PUT HIS ARM ROUND MY WAIST TO SUPPORT ME," ETC.

Between six and seven the travelers arrived. To my indescribable surprise, they were escorted, not by Mr. Godfrey (as I had anticipated), but by the lawyer, Mr. Bruff.

"How do you do, Miss Clack?" he said. "I mean to stay this time."

That reference to the occasion on which I had obliged him to postpone his business in order that when we were both visiting in Montagu Square, satisfied me that the old worldling had come to Brighton with some object of his own in view. I had prepared quite a little Paradise for my beloved Rachel—and here was the Serpent all ready!

"Godfrey was very much vexed, Drusilla, not to be able to come with us," said my Aunt Ablewhite. "There was something to do very near, he kept him in town. Mr. Bruff volunteered to take his place, and make a holiday of it till Monday morning. By-the-by, Mr. Bruff, I'm sorry to take exercise, and I don't like it. That," added Aunt Ablewhite, pointing out of window to an invalid gentleman in a chair on wheels, "that is a man, 'is my idea of exercise. If it's air you want, you get it in your chair. And if it's fatigue you want, I'm sure it's a fatiguing thing to look at the man."

Rachel stood silent, at a window by herself, with her eyes fixed on the sea.

"Tired, love?" I inquired.

"Yes—but a little out of spirits," she answered. "I have often seen the sea, on our Yorkshire coast, with that light on it. And I was thinking, Penelope, of the days that can never come again."

Mr. Bruff remained to dinner, and stood through the evening. The more I saw of him, the more certain I felt that he had some private end to serve in coming to Brighton. I watched him carefully. He maintained the same unobtrusive case and talked the same godless gossip, hour after hour, until it was time to take leave. As he shook hands with Rachel I noticed a hard and cunning eye resting on her for a moment with a very peculiar interest and attention. She was plainly suspected in the quarter in which I had in view. He said nothing out of the common to her or to any one, on leaving. He invited himself to dinner on the next day, and then he went away to his hotel.

It was impossible, the next morning, to get my Aunt Ablewhite out of her dressing-gown in time for church. Her invalid daughter (suffering from nothing in my opinion, but incurable laziness, inherited from her mother) announced that she meant to remain in bed for the day. Rachel and I went alone together to church. A magnificent sermon was preached by my gifted friend, on the heathen indifference of the world to the sinfulness of little sins. For more than an hour his eloquence (assisted by his glorious voice) thundered through the sacred edifice. I said to Rachel, when we came out, "Has it done you the way to your heart, dear?" And she answered, "No; it has only made my head ache." This bright hint I took accordingly to myself. But, once embarked on a career of manifest usefulness, nothing discourages Me.

We found Miss Ablewhite and Mr. Bruff at luncheon. When Rachel declined eating any thing, and gave as a reason for it that she was suffering from a headache, the lawyer's eyes rested instantly saw, and seized, the chance that she had given him.

"There is only one remedy for a headache," said this horrible old man. "A walk, Miss Rachel, is the cure you want. I am entirely at your service, if you will honor me by accepting my arm."

"With the greatest pleasure. A walk is the very thing I was longing for."

"It's past two," I gently suggested. "And the afternoon service, Rachel, begins at three."

"How can you expect me to go to church again," she asked, petulantly, "with such a headache as mine?"

Mr. Bruff officiously opened the door for her. In a minute more they were both out of the house. I don't know when I have felt the solemn duty of interfering so strongly as I felt it at that moment. But what was to be done? Nothing was to be done but to interfere, at the first opportunity, later in the day.

On my return from the afternoon service I found that Rachel had just got back. One look at them told me that the lawyer had said what he wanted to say. I had never before seen Rachel so silent and so thoughtful. I had never before seen Mr. Bruff pay her such devoted attention, and look at her with such marked respect. He had (or pretended that he had) an engagement to dinner that day—and he took an early leave of us all: starting to go back to London by the first train the next morning.

"Are you sure of your own resolution?" he said to Rachel at the door.

"Quite sure," she answered—and so they parted.

The moment his back was turned Rachel withdrew to her own room. She never appeared at dinner. Her maid (the person with the capillotomy) was in attendance when I returned from her bedchamber had returned. I ran up to her, and made all sorts of sisterly offers through the door. It was locked, and she kept it locked. Plenty of obstructive material to work on here! I felt greatly cheered and stimulated by her locking the door.

When her cup of tea went up to her the next morning I followed it in. I sat by her bedside and said a few earnest words. She listened with languid civility. I noticed my serious friend's precious publications huddled together on a table in a corner. Had she chanced to look into them?—I asked. Certainly not—she was interested in r. Would she allow me to read a few passages, f the deepest interest, which had probably escaped her notice? No; no one had other things to think of. She gave these answers, with her attention apparently absorbed in the arrangement of her hair. I read a few pages. It was plainly necessary to rouse her by some reference to those worldly interests which she still had at home.

"Do you know, love," I said, "I had an odd fancy, yesterday, about Mr. Bruff? I thought, when I saw us after your walk with him, that he had been telling you some bad news."

Her fingers dropped from the filling of her night-gown, and her eyes flashed at me.

"Quite the contrary!" she said. "It was news I was interested in hearing—and I am deeply indebted to Mr. Bruff for telling me of it."

"Yes?" I said, in a tone of gentle interest.

Her fingers went back to the frilling, and she turned her head sullenly away from me. I had been sent to the right room in the course of laying the good work, hundreds of times. She merely stimulated me to perform. I am my dandiest and for her welfare I am the great risk, and openly alluded to her marriage engagement.

"News you were interested in hearing?" I repeated.

"Yes—I suppose, my dear Rachel, that matters between Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite and you—"

She started up in the bed and turned deadly pale. It was evidently on the tip of her tongue to assert on me with the unblushing effrontery of former times. She checked herself—laid her head back on the pillow—considered a minute—and then answered in these remarkable words:

"I shall never marry Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite."

It was my turn to start at that.

"What can have happened?" I exclaimed. "The marriage is considered by the whole family as a settled thing!"

"Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite is expected here today," she said, doggedly. "Wait till he comes —and you will see."

"But, my dear Rachel—"

She rang the bell at the head of her bed. The person with the cap-ribbons appeared.

"Penelope, I am ill."

Let me give her her due. In the state of my mind, at that moment, I do sincerely believe that she was the last in the possible way of forcing me to leave the room.

By the mere worldly mind my position toward Rachel might have been viewed as presenting difficulties of no ordinary kind. I had reckoned on leading her to higher things, by means of a little innocent deception on the subject of her marriage. And now, if she was to be believed, no such event as her marriage was to take place at all. But my Mother's (a working Christian of my experience (with an evangelizing prospect before her) takes broader views than these. Supposing Rachel to be broke off the marriage on which the Ablewhites, father and son, counted as a settled thing, what would be the result? Rachel would be left a wild firm, in an exchanging of hard words and bitter accusations on both sides. And what would be the effect on Rachel herself? My inner conscience was over? A salutary moral depression would be her share. The mind would be exhausted, her stubbornness would be exhausted, by the resolute resistance which it was in her character to make. Her natural instincts of love would turn for sympathy to the nearest person who had sympathy to offer. And I was that person—prepared, as I have already said, to overflowing with seasonable and reviving words. Never had the evangelizing prospect looked more full of promise to me than at that moment.

She came down to breakfast, but she ate nothing, and hardly uttered a word.

After breakfast she walked listlessly from room to room—then suddenly roused herself and opened the piano. The music she selected to play was of the most fashionable order—the air associated with performances on the stage which it curdles one's blood to think of. It would have been preposterous to remonstrate with her at such a time as this. I privately ascertained the hour at which Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite was expected, and knew I escaped the music for some hours to come.

Being out alone I took the opportunity of calling upon our mutual friends. It was an indescribable luxury to find myself indulged to earnest conversation with serious persons. Intensely cheered and refreshed I returned at the steps back again to the house, in excellent time to await the arrival of our expected visitor. I entered the dining-room, which was empty at that hour of the day—and found myself face to face with Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite!

He made no attempt to fly the place. Quite the contrary. He advanced to meet me with the utmost eagerness.

"Dear Miss Clack, I have been only waiting to see you! Chance set me free of my London engagements to-day sooner than I expected—and I have got here, in consequence, earlier than my appointed time."

Not the slightest embarrassment encumbered his explanation, though this was his first meeting with me after the scene in Montagu Square. He was not aware, poor fellow, of my having been a witness of that scene. But he knew, on the other hand, that my attendance at the Mothers'-Small-Clothes, and my relations with friends attached to other charities, must have informed me of his shameless neglect of his Ladies and his Poor. And yet there he was before me in full possession of his charming voice and his irresistible smile!

"Have you seen Rachel yet?" I asked.

He sighed gently, and took me by the hand. I should certainly have snatched my hand away, if the manner in which he gave his answer had not plainly indicated a deep astonishment.

"I have seen Rachel," he said, with perfect tranquillity. "You are aware, dear friend, that she was engaged to me?" Well, she has taken a sudden resolution to break the engagement. Reflections have convinced her that she will best consult her welfare and mine by retracting a rash promise, and leaving me free to make some happier choice elsewhere. That is the only course she will give, and the only answer she will make to every question that I can ask of her."

"What have you to say on your side?" I inquired. "Have you submitted?"

"Yes," he said, with the most unruffled composure, "I submit to circumstances."

His conduct, under the circumstances, was so utterly inconceivable that I stood bewildered with my hand in his. It is a piece of rudeness to stare at any body, and it is an act of indelicacy to stare at a gentleman. I committed both those imprieties. And I said, as if in a dream, "What does it mean?"

"Permit me to tell you," he replied. "And spare me what it hit directly."

He led me to a chair. I have an indistinct remembrance that he was very affectionate. I don't think I should have found my voice to support me—but I am not sure. I was quite helpless, and his ways with ladies were very engaging. He was very, we sat down. I can answer for that, if I can answer for nothing more.

THE DOCTOR'S STORY.

The town of Panama, on the shores of the broad Pacific, has been the scene of many sanguinary brawls and riots. In one of these, which happened nearly twenty years ago, when such occurrences were more frequent than at present, a middle-aged man, apparently an American, received a stab in the chest from the bayonet of one of the soldiers called in to quell the disturbance. The wounded man was carried to the nearest hospital, where he shortly after breathed his last.

It was observed that during his dying moments he was constantly accosted by an old weather-beaten man, a species of "Ancient Mariner," of a tall, gaunt figure, and with a hard-looking, weather-beaten visage, which by its bold outline was the most jealous attention. The old man stated that the patient whose life was fast ebbing away was his son, but that he also refused to give any information whatever. Up to the last he remained at his post, and with the exception of a few unintelligible words of incoherence, addressed no one to communicate with the dying man. The old man shortly after disappeared from the city, and the little interest awakened by the incident soon subsided.

Two years elapsed from the happening of the above event, when a young, jolly, portly, rosy-cheek, Doctor M'Dougall, the Scotch surgeon before referred to, was summoned to attend a patient supposed to be in the last stage of pulmonary disease. Threading his way through the irregular pebbly streets, the doctor arrived at the entrance of a house of respectable appearance to the shore, overlooking the picturesque fortifications which surround the ancient city.

Exchanging a bow with a swarthy individual of the Spanish-American race, smoking under the verenda, he ascended to the first-floor, and found himself by the couch of the sick man. The little light which shone in through the open window sufficed to enable him the guest form and strongly-marked features of the old seaman whom he had met by the bedside of his dying son at the hospital. The doctor, nothing daunted, was now flushed with feverish excitement, and his bloodshot eyes rolled wildly around.

Recognizing the surgeon, the old sailor raised himself almost into a sitting posture, and in a low, husky voice asked his visitor if he remembered him. On receiving an answer in the affirmative, he continued:

"I have sent for you—not to save my life, that I know is impossible, based as it is on drink and this accursed climate—but because you were kind to that poor murdered lad some time ago; you recollect, no doubt, the time I gave me up as dead all, though I said he was, and I liked him as much as if he had been, and maybe more. Since he died every thing has gone wrong with me; and now, besides yourself I've not a friend left in the world. You see this?" said he, bending over the side of his couch, and pulling up some old a corner of the room where stood a sea-chest bound with iron bands and fastened by a padlock. "Hush! they will hear me," he excitedly exclaimed. "Look the door—bar it; not a living soul but yourself must hear this."

Though regarding this merely as a fresh outburst of delirium, the doctor did as desired. "Now," said the sailor, as he thrust forward his visitor's hand a revolver capped and apparently loaded, "if they try to come in, shoot them—shoot them dead on the spot. One, two, three, four, five lives," he added, counting the chambers of the weapon, while a gleam of savage satisfaction lighted up his countenance.

"Years ago I belonged to a band of queer characters who first got together in California—then the right place to look for all sorts of vagabonds. We picked up living in various ways, sometimes honestly, as the world calls it, and sometimes not so much so. Well, after a while even San Francisco got too hot to hold us, so we clubbed together and bought a small schooner, and, hearing of the revolutionary war in Mexico, we ran down the coast and supplied the insurgents with arms and ammunition. Sometimes our fellows took part in a skirmish on shore, either on one side or the other, and, in fact, we joined in any scheme that promised to be profitable. Most of our time was spent between Panama and the coast of Mexico in this sort of way; and after a couple of years or so we had got together a considerable sum of money.

"There were six of us at this time, roughish-looking fellows most of us, and many of us liable to different nations. There had been eight altogether, but one had had a bowie-knife put into him in a drunken row, and another was finished by Santa Anna's Mexican bullets.

"One fine morning, when we were lying off the town of St. Blas, two of our men who had been on shore came off with the news that a small trading vessel was expected down the coast with over a million of dollars, belonging to one of the large Mexican houses, to be shipped on board an English frigate at anchor near us for conveyance to Panama. We at once determined to intercept the coaster, and immediately got under way. There was not a moment to be lost—just instant might bring her under cover of the frigate's guns, and thus slip through our fingers. The breeze that morning was unfortunately light, and we had scarcely left the mouth of our hull down, when we perceived the trader coming along the coast under easy sail.

"Our plans were soon arranged. We knew that these vessels, not going more than a few miles off the shore, were rarely armed, and carried at the most but a few hands. We put the helm up, and bore away to our prey; and, to avoid suspicion, made sham tasks, so as to be able to run across her bows on the right tack for boarding. Our men were tolerably well provided with weapons, and we made up our minds that there would be no very desperate affair. Nearer and nearer the two vessels approached each other, our schooner trailing a large set astern, to throw the crew off the other, off their guard. At the right moment our helm was put down; we sprang on board, and in a minute or so were in possession of the vessel and every thing belonging to her.

"And the men in charge?" said the doctor, for the first time interrupting the old pirate, as it now seemed he was.

The latter turned ghastly pale before the steady look of his companion, and then, recovering himself, he clenched his fists, and with eyes starting from their sockets, glared around him like a wounded tiger.

"'Tis false—ay, false!" he shouted, throwing his arms about him in the wildest manner. "Who has told you that I murdered them—ah, murdered them? 'Tis false, I say—false!"

He sank back exhausted; the large drops of perspiration rolled in his brow, and his new-born calm seemed irrecoverable. At length the old seaman roused himself and proceeded, though with much less self-possession than before.

"How we took the coaster, and what we did with the crew is nothing to any body now; but very low, the end of it was that when we came to break open the boxes in the hold and count out the money, we found ourselves the owners of nearly a million and a half of dollars in gold and silver.

"This was the boldest of all our exploits, and we all felt the danger of staying any longer on this part of the coast, or even of remaining together after this. We immediately determined to stand out to sea, and to be satisfied with dividing the treasure, and then separate forever.

"When not many miles from Acapulco we ran short of water, and put into that port for a supply. Short as our stay was, we remained long enough for all our men to be shot dead with yellow-fever. In a few hours I was the last one, fearing after this no step in the place, hastily filled my body on a strip of beach outside the harbor, and at once put to sea.

"From the moment of our starting that infernal coaster nonfortune hung over us. Before we had lost sight of the coast of Mexico the trade-wind failed us, and for days we lay becalmed under the hot sun in a dead calm. To make matters worse, two more of our hands took the fever and died in a few hours. We were now in a state of the utmost consternation. What was to be done? To stay in the ship seemed certain death; our numbers were reduced to three, and there was no feebled as to be equally likely to fall a prey to the pestilence. To land with such an amount of money would be madness at once to confess. We had now all our booty to divide among three of us, but what on earth were we to do with it?

"While debating over our unlucky hoard, to dead-reckoning, that we were only a few days' sail from the Cocos Islands off the Bay of Panama. We knew the islands well, and we knew, too, that they were uninhabited and within easy distance of Panama itself. We agreed to break open the boxes at once, each taking one thousand dollars, divide them equally, and then bury the rest on the largest island of the group.

"On our arrival, having first satisfied ourselves by a careful search that there was no human being there, we ran the schooner as close in-shore as possible, and commenced landing the treasure—a task which, with our reduced numbers, took us several days to get through. During the whole of this time we were in perpetual terror lest our movements should be observed by some of the passing vessels. We worked away cheerfully, and at last succeeded in burying all the boxes of dollars in a corner of the largest island, carefully marking the position of the spot by compass bearings. This done, we removed from the schooner every thing worth saving, scuttled her, and taking to the boats, pulled out many miles from the town. Here we separated, after agreeing upon a day on which to return to the island and remove the rest of the treasure, each swearing to observe the strictest secrecy and good faith in the matter.

"The news of the seizure of the coaster had, as we expected, reached Panama, and large rewards were offered for the capture of those concerned in the deed. This showed me that it would be unsafe to remain longer than could be helped. Accordingly I lost no time in taking a passage in a merchant ship sailing for San Francisco. A few days after reaching that port I came across one of my companions, whom I had parted from on landing from the schooner. Well, from that time to the day you saw him die here in the hospital we were never separated.

"At San Francisco, what with drinking and gambling, we soon ran through our money, and had only just enough to take us down to Panama again by the time appointed.

"We had not long returned before we learned that a man answering the description we had given of the spoils, contrary to our sworn agreement. We had the satisfaction of knowing that we two were now the sole owners of the money, and set to work at once to arrange a plan for getting it all into our possession. Every thing was settled, and, we should have started with half a dozen picked men, when that poor fellow received the accursed stab which put an end to him."

Here the old man's voice faltered, and in a sudder tone he went on:

"For years we had been together, and when he died I lost the only being I cared for in the world. Since that day I have been a lonely, miserable man. Drink, drink alone, has been my refuge. In drink I see the glitter of the yellow gold, that I have not dared to go and look for. For drink would I sell my soul itself—ay, what is more, my buried treasure too. See there, see there!" he cried, in a tone of triumph, as with a last effort he sprung up and pointed to the still waters of the bay, now illumined by the last golden rays of the setting sun. "'Tis there it lies; I can watch the gold as it glistens and glitters over the sea, even now. 'Tis mine—mine, I say. Too late—too late!" he whispered, sinking back in a state of insensibility.

All was quiet for some minutes. At length the old man recovered his consciousness, and, in a voice hardly audible, said:

"Doctor, in a few moments I shall be a dead man—and the money, take it, every dollar. You will find it buried deep in the sand. See there—the plan is in that box. Hush, hush!" and pointed to a key hanging up, which his visitor at once put in his pocket as he heard footsteps ascending the stairs. It was the individual whom he had met on entering the house, and the doctor admitted him to the room.

The old sailor was now speechless; he feebly pointed first to the medical man and then to the box in the corner, and closed his eyes. It was soon clear that life was gone. The doctor, seeing that nothing more could be done, gave a handful of dollars to the owner of the house, and returned home, taking care to remove the old chest at the same time. When opened, he found that it contained, in addition to some articles of clothing and trinkets of little value, a crumpled and stained paper, on which had been hastily drawn a map of the Cocos Islands, and a description, in many parts illegible, of the place where the booty had been deposited.

The doctor, who was by no means a wealthy man, was overjoyed at the mere prospect of obtaining possession of so much wealth, and made up his mind at once to organize an expedition to the spot where it lay concealed. After spending nearly all his ready money in making preparations, he started from Panama with a party of natives. The object of the expedition was kept a profound secret.

On reaching the island, which, from the plan in his possession, the doctor had no difficulty in identifying, he at once commenced operations. The document, from age, discoloration, and the imperfect nature of so much of the description as was legible, afforded, unfortunately, but a very uncertain clew to the treasure.

The southwest corner of the island was described with the utmost precision, also the distance from the beach, and the depth at which the money was to be found, but beyond these particulars the paper contained no intelligible information.

For ten long days and nights, allowing barely sufficient time for rest and refreshment, did the men dig away, the doctor being all the while, as he himself described it, in a fever of excitement, wholly unable to sleep, and watching with breathless anxiety every spadeful of sand that his dusky companions dug from the soil. At the close of the period he listened eagerly for any sound that might indicate the discovery of what he sought, but in vain.

At the expiration of this time the supply of provisions ran short, and it became evident to the doctor that he must abandon the enterprise, at all events for a time. Worn out with fatigue and exhaustion, and crushed by the weight of his disappointment, he was compelled to put back to Panama. It was long before he recovered his health and strength sufficiently to be able to resume his ordinary practice. When returning health, however, came renewed hope, and when last heard of the indefatigable man, confident of success, was getting together the necessary funds for another expedition.

ONCE AND NOW.

I.

I HAVE a rose, a little rose,
It blossomed long ago
Beneath the guns that day and night
Keep watch at Fort Monroe.
And warm September glories shone.
With red and russet streak,
Along the wooded shores and points
That fringe the Chesapeake.

And drum and bugle answering called
Along the Union lines,
And proud our banner-loving eagles shone
Among the glimmering pines,
When this fair rose that blossomed on
The stormy front of war
A dear hand sent—a precious pledge
From the true heart afar.

I shut it 'twixt my Bible-leaves,
In quiet, solemn hours;
My little crimson half blown rose
That he had kissed and sent!
'Tis withered now—a pale, frail thing,
That one touch might destroy;
And with its bloom and beauty lies
My morning dream of joy.

Poor little bud! in whose red heart
Such wealth of promise lay,
Withered before its crimson core
Unfolded to the day.
And hidden in my Bible-leaves,
And deep where memories cling,
The little rose that never bloomed—
The hope that died in spring.

II.

'Tis years ago my weary feet
Went up those hills of pain,
And many a time by Fort Monroe
Roses have bloomed again.
'Tis long ago, and through the land
The sounds of war are dumb;
O'er battle-fields once dim with death
Birds sing and wild bees hum.

But the sure years, with lengthening days,
Like shadows drifting down,
Enfolded in their golden arms
Have brought my life's fair crown.
Starry with joys more dear-sweet
Than aught the Past can bring—
The fullness of a perfect love,
Girt by a marriage-ring.

I took my rose—my little rose,
Withered and pale and sere—
And laid it where the vivid coals
Shone hot and crimson-clear.
And as it dropped to tender ash,
And faded out at last,
The glorious Present rose between,
And dimmed the shadowy Past.

But sometimes, as I idly turn
My Bible-leaves apart,
A dim, faint perfume-scent steals out,
And misty memories start—
The proud and erring heart—the pain
Those bitter days could bring;
The little rose that never bloomed—
The hope that died in spring.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

THE love of a cross woman, it is said, is stronger than the love of any other female individual. Like vinegar, the affections of a high-strung woman never spoil.

Quoth Tom, 'Tis strange that in the world
So much injustice should abound:
Nay, answered John, the human heart
Is never on the right side found.

THE SEASONS.

BY AN INVALID.

I love the spring;
It seems to bring
Fresh breezes from the Adriatic—
(The wind at least
Is from the east,
And gives me agonies rheumatic.)

When summer's here,
I hold it dear—
Of flowery wealth a gracious giver—
(Although I've grown
Whene'er it's hot,
Some couches of a sluggish liver.)

When autumn hints,
With russet tints,
That summer's song has its cadenza,
I love it well—
(Though, truth to tell,
I know it brings me influenza.)

And winter's snow
I love also—
For snow a reasonable sight is—
(Although there are
Cough, cold, catarrh,
Diphtheria, phthisis, and bronchitis!)

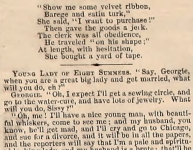
A LOVE-LETTER.

From a Tailor to his Sweetheart, a Mantua-Maker.

DEAR MISS HOPE,—May I be ripped from the border of your esteem, and never be buttoned to the lower of your kindness, but I am strongly drawn to them by your beauty. May I never lose a thimbleful of your favor, but you have entangled the thread of my understanding with that pretty outside of yours. Odds bodkin! I am surely possessed—every inch of me—and my needle follows you. Therefore blunt not the point of my endeavors, but let me have room to use your kindness that I may set the tighter to your affections. I love you beyond measure, but it is no hard to cabbage one sweet look from you that I almost despair of having enough to finish my suit. Pray put a favorable construction on this, and for the same I shall always sit cross-legged for your sake, being, my dearest little flouncer, your CABBAGE.

A Tanner minister who found his congregation going to sleep one Sunday before he had fairly commenced, suddenly stopped and exclaimed: "Brethren, this won't do. I haven't got a man half a chance! Wait till I get along a bit, and then if I ain't worth sweating to go along but don't begin to move before I get commenced. Give a man a chance!"

SHOPPING.



She stood behind the counter—
The day I'll never forget—
She thought the muslin dearer
Than any she'd seen yet;
I watched her playful fingers
The silk and satin toss;
The clerk looked quite uneasy,
And nodded as she bore.

"Show me some velvet ribbon,
Barege and satin tuck,
She said," I want to purchase!"
Then gave the goods a look.
The clerk was all obedience,
He traveled "on his shape;"
At length, with hesitation,
She bought a yard of tape.

YOUNG LADY OF EIGHT SUMMERS. "Say, Georgie, when you are a great big lady and get married, what will you do, eh?"

Georgie. "Oh, I expect I'll get a sewing circle, and go to the water-cure, and have lots of jewelry. What will you do, Sissy?"

"Oh, me! I'll have a nice young man, with beautiful whiskers, come to see me; and my husband, you know, he'll get mad, and I'll cry and go to Chicago, and sue for a divorce, and it will be in all the papers, and the reporters will say that I'm a pale and spiritual-looking lady, and my husband is a brute; that'll be so nice."

THE POOR MAN'S VIEW OF IT.—"True, Mike, it's a fine turn-out; but the Revenge Tax is mighty heavy."

THE "DEAD BEAT'S" VIEW.—"I carry a Gold Watch? I don't know. Bought it at Auction for $5

THE FEMININE VIEW.—"My license! My Watch! A have no vote! I'll not submit to Taxation without Representation! Get out!"

THE LOVER'S VIEW.—"Ah! the income returns, eh? Old Bullfinch down for $60,000. I'll propose to Susan at once."

THE SKEPTIC'S VIEW.—"Smythe down for $500,000. Must have cut him a nice plum to lie so. Not worth $30,000."

THE JUVENILE VIEW.—"Pa, is Taxes a spice?" "No, my dear; why do you ask?" "Because Mamma said we couldn't have Pudding 'cause Taxes is so dear."

SIOUX INDIANS IN AMBUSH PREPARING TO ATTACK SETTLERS.—DRAWN BY W. M. CARY.—[SEE PAGE 285.]

INDIANS IN AMBUSH.

Although a treaty of peace has been concluded with the Indians in Colorado, Kansas, and Nebraska, and active hostilities on the part of our troops have ceased, the depredations and outrages of the Indians are continued. It is stated on very good authority that the settlers on the border and the emigrants on the Plains are as much disturbed by the Indians as they were before and during the late Indian war, but the acts of hostility on the part of the redmen are concealed or overlooked by the Indian agents of the Government. How true this is we can not say; but undoubtedly several well-authenticated outrages have lately occurred. The Sioux Indians of Nebraska appear to be the most troublesome, and have lately made descents upon several settlements. Our illustration on page 281 shows the mode of warfare practiced by these predatory bands upon the unsuspecting and defenseless settlers.

A WISE WOMAN ON IMPULSE.

"'Women are wise on a sudden.'"

Ben Mack made his fling at women, sitting a little apart from the group that had Rebecca Dean for its centre under the grand old trees that shaded Squire Dean's lawn. There were a half dozen in the group, disposed on rustic seats and benches, with the shadows of night and elm-trees around them, shadows that the light from the wide hall of the Dean homestead only partially dispelled. Ben Mack was farthest in the shadow, and a moment before had seemed widely removed from the rest, smoking, by Rebecca Dean's leave, in an absorbed way, as if he found all the world he wanted in his cigar. He had turned at Rebecca Dean's last words, and by his remark it was evident nothing had escaped him.

"Pray finish the proverb," retorted Rebecca Dean, in clear, ringing tones. "Women are wise on a sudden and fools on premeditation."

Ben Mack threw his cigar away and laughed a low, amused, and sarcastic laugh.

"Killed with your own weapons, eh, Ben?" inquired Tom Gladstone. "You didn't know the proverb was double-barreled, and Miss Dean had a chance after your charge."

"Miss Dean is always armed to the teeth, I think," said Ben Mack, in an under-tone.

"Self-preservation is a law of our nature, and the legality of self-defense is undisputed," answered Rebecca Dean, in clear, gelid tones.

"Self-preservation!" echoed Ben Mack, rising. "Yes, you are right. I thank you for reminding me. I am going directly home. Besides, the clock struck ten a half hour since."

The gentlemen started to their feet.

"We take no note of time under certain circumstances," said Tom Gladstone, apologetically.

"If Mr. Dean's elm-trees and certain circumstances are synonyms in Tom's vocabulary, I beg to subscribe to his sentiments," said Paul Richardson, stooping down to pick up Rebecca Dean's handkerchief.

"Come! come!" exclaimed Ben Mack, stepping forward and speaking impatiently. "We shall tire Miss Dean with our adieux."

"We? Speak for yourself, man!" exclaimed Tom Gladstone, with mock earnestness.

"'Parting is such sweet sorrow
That I shall say good-night till it be morrow.'"

"Then I will leave you. Good-night, Miss Dean!"

Ben Mack bowed and moved toward the gate. The others shook hands with the ladies and joined him there.

The ladies under the elm-trees did not speak until the footsteps of the three men died in the distance.

It was not Rebecca Dean's voice; but one vastly more uncertain and infantile that asked: "Is it so every evening?"

"So? How?" asked Rebecca Dean. Her voice contained a volume of meaning. All the deprecation in the "So" was plainly revealed by her mocking echo, and a woman's suppressed anger was in the indignant "How?"

"Don't be vexed with me," replied the other woman, timidly. "You know, Rebecca, dear, I am not at all brilliant like you are; but it seems to me you would be happier with less admiration and more love. I have listened to-night and been amused by Mr. Gladstone, and pleased with Mr. Richardson, and hopelessly mystified by Mr. Mack, and I have admired you, dear, just as every body does; but I have wished so much you were settled in life."

Rebecca Dean made no reply. She only sat with her head averted, looking off into the darkness.

"How many years have you known Mr. Mack?" asked the woman with the childish voice.

"Forever!" answered Rebecca Dean, impatiently. Then she corrected herself and said in an humble, subdued way, as if herself had conquered her own mutinous self: "Five years, more or less."

"You ought to know him very well," commented the thin-voiced lady.

"I don't. I have tried to fathom him ever since I knew him, and am to-night as far from the result as when I first begun," said Rebecca Dean, bitterly.

"You always seem to be having a genteel quarrel," said the other woman; "and if any body could make you hard and wicked, dear, I think this Mr. Mack could. I always knew you didn't like him."

Rebecca Dean turned her eyes toward the light, and in them was a doubt self-put, and on her lips a smile so bitter, it was well-nigh a sneer.

"Come!" she said, suddenly starting up, "let us go into the house."

"Minnie Dean," she said, abruptly, pausing in the lighted hall and facing the slight, delicate woman who followed her quick, impatient tread, "I envy you from the bottom of my heart!"

A trifle taller than the woman addressed as Minnie Dean was she who had turned and laid her hand on Minnie Dean's head, looking down into her quiet blue eyes with a gaze that was full of regret and discontent. Looking at her, as she stroked the light hair that grew only a little above the mild blue eyes, you would have said she was much taller than the other woman, for the attitude was suggestive of stooping and condescension; and, looking at the discontent in the brown eyes and the wrinkles that reached up to the edge of the raven hair, you would have said she was much older. Truth to tell, there was a mark on a door-post where the women's heads had rested, and the fair-haired woman had stood only an inch below the other. There was a Bible in the house, too, where Rebecca Dean's birth was recorded twenty-six years ago, and another Bible was witness that Minnie Frazier, now wife of John Dean, was born a year previous.

Women like John Dean's wife are mute before the grief of those other women of whom Rebecca was a type. "I don't understand John's sister," she had said, when she first knew her. "I admire her. What is more, I love her; but she astonishes and confounds me. Sometimes I think I know her, but then she comes to me in a new phase of character and I am baffled. I think I shall never take her all in." Afterward the same woman wrote from Niagara, "I am delighted, but I shall go home dissatisfied. Immensity confounds me. I might stay here forever and still feel that my mind could not take in the greatness of these waters. The Falls affect me as some people, among them John's sister Rebecca in her heights and depths of emotion."

That night when Rebecca Dean's discontent burst into envy, Minnie Dean stood quite helpless, knowing the woman spoke the bitter truth from a grieved soul; spoke with a bitterness, too, she had never felt, from a depth of grief she could never penetrate. She knew, too, that this very inability was the thing Rebecca Dean most envied her. Powerless to bring mental force to her rescue with suiting speech, her heart dictated womanly deeds, and the pale, delicate hands drew down the dark, regretful face and kissed it tenderly.

Rebecca Dean understood, and smiled her thanks as she put away her mood with an effort of her strong will.

Rebecca Dean's claims for admiration were based on different grounds from those belonging to most women. She was not handsome or wealthy. Now she had not even youth to make her pleasing in eyes that always find beauty in freshness. And yet she was called very charming. I think the secret lay, as it lies in a few rare people you and I have met, in her intense sympathy and self-forgetfulness. Not only men liked her, as she met them on their own ground and comprehended what was best and holiest in their natures, but women felt the quick sympathy that included their little loves in a larger, and were proud to call her friend.

Minnie Dean felt the sympathy in the thankful smile, and a moment later John Dean felt the self-forgetfulness.

"John!" exclaimed the two women, as they entered the little library where a weary man bent his brow in close calculations over long columns of figures.

"These bank accounts needed investigation," answered the man, scarcely lifting his head. "Do not wait for me, Minnie. Good-night, Rebecca, and be thankful you are not a man."

Rebecca colored. Being such a woman, she had sometimes wished she was something different; either a woman like Minnie or a man like John; either something less or greater than she was. It was not often her rich life brought her discontent as on this night.

"Tell me what you are doing," she said to her brother.

"Go to bed," was his irrelevant answer.

"Not till I have helped you fathom that sea of figures," was the determined answer.

John Dean knew his sister and her moods. He knew, too, she could render efficient aid. A few words of explanation, and the woman's head was bending over the papers, and the woman's fingers deftly working with the figures in a way that indicated comprehension and ease of execution.

It was a late hour when John Dean closed his books and crossed over to the sofa where Minnie slept. He smiled to see the book she had been reading; then he turned to Rebecca with grave rebuke.

"Never envy a poorer nature than your own, Rebecca. The sun should glory in shining for all the world, and not envy the lesser work of stars."

Rebecca went away smiling through her tears. She had received her praise and her reproof—mingled honey and gall—and the signs of her emotions were appropriate.

The long, cool shadows of the elm-trees lay across Squire Dean's lawn, when, a week later, Ben Mack rode by, looking eagerly through the growth of foliage into the open windows of the old homestead. John Dean, hidden by low-growing shrubbery, saw the horseman, and shrugged his shoulders. He did not resume his reading when the sound of horses' hoofs had died, but sat in disturbed mood knocking the flowers off an azalea with his cane.

"Minnie!" he called to his wife, who appeared on the lawn, "where is Rebecca?"

"Gone down to the cottages with soup for Tom Mullens's wife, and clothes for Biddy Riley's baby."

John Dean laughed. "What a famous Sister of Charity, tract distributor, or hospital nurse Rebecca would make!" he said.

Minnie Dean sat down by her husband's side. "That is just what Mrs. Stevenson said the other day. She declared Rebecca ought to be a missionary's wife. It was a shame that so much energy, ability, and excess of vitality should be wasted in the frivolities of society."

"I shouldn't wonder," mused John Dean, more to himself than in response to his wife's remark.

"Shouldn't wonder what?" asked Minnie Dean. "Rebecca marry a missionary?"

"A missionary or the deil."

Minnie Dean started to her feet. "Why, John!" she exclaimed, "I never heard you talk so before. What do you mean?"

"That Rebecca, with her broad sympathies and genial nature, attracts the best and the worst of men. Her vitality puts her in harmony with the gayest of her kind, and her self-abnegation makes martyrdom possible. Rebecca would be a power in fashionable society, just as Ben Mack is, and for the same reason. At Newport and Saratoga she would attract just as she does here. If you doubt me, look at Ben Mack. The world holds not a worldlier man, and for him the world holds not such another woman as my sister. Then for the other side of Rebecca's dual character, look at the reverends among her list of friends. Rebecca is so much saint and sinner combined, it puzzles me to know which will get her—good or evil, the church or the world. At present bets are safest on the side of the world."

John Dean said this with his eye fixed on his sister and Ben Mack, who came slowly up the carriage-road.

"Where is Mr. Mack's horse?" asked Minnie.

"Following meekly behind," answered her husband. "Ben Mack has a strange power. I should think he might control beasts and charm serpents."

"You don't like him any better than Rebecca," remarked Minnie Dean.

John Dean looked at his wife searchingly, but seeing how grave her face was, he whistled and walked away.

Rebecca Dean sat down under the elms, and a little ungraciously asked her companion to sit. All that Ben Mack received from her was mere tolerance outwardly. He sat down, however, for it was an hour before his dinner-time, and the village offered no entertainment like Rebecca Dean.

Paul Richardson must have had the same thought, for he came strolling in, with his port-folio under his arm.

Rebecca rose instantly, and gave him the easiest rustic seat, with cordial words of welcome.

Ben Mack frowned. The woman was so meagre of her words with him—so lavish when she spoke to others.

Rebecca held out her hands for Paul's port-folio, with the pretty pleading of a child rather than the dignity of a woman; but when she scrutinized the sketches it was with an artist's critical appreciation.

Suddenly all her face lighted up, and, as if Ben Mack's caught the reflection, his glowed satisfied and triumphant as he watched her selecting sketches from the port-folio. Over the last she clapped her hands with a child's enthusiasm.

"Our own dear elms!" she exclaimed. "And here are the very spots I love the most. I have sat in this nook by the mountain-side for hours. I have dreamed by this brook through many a summer's day. I have listened to the murmur of the waterfall until I have lost the sounds of earth. And, Mr. Richardson, these are your best pictures. You have executed them with a bolder hand and a more masterly touch. There is genius in these strokes and power."

She paused suddenly. She had caught a strange look on Paul Richardson's face. It was chagrin, vexation, and deep disappointment. She glanced to Ben Mack, and saw the triumph in his eye.

"Mr. Mack!" she exclaimed. "They are yours!"

Ben Mack bowed, and all his face glowed with pleasure. He wondered what this proud woman would do next, who never gave him praise, and whose position had been antagonistic from the beginning.

Her next act, if she had been an artful woman, would have been the perfection of acting.

"Mr. Mack, won't you give me this picture?" She held up the sketch of the elms, all her face glowing, tender, and pleading.

Ben Mack bowed again. He knew if he spoke he should say too much, and Paul Richardson was there.

Rebecca Dean remembered his presence there too. He was looking away with a hurt face.

"I want one of your sketches too, Mr. Richardson," she said.

He smiled faintly and gave her his port-folio. He knew her request meant compensation, and he would have refused had he been less a gentleman. A moment after he saw John Dean at the foot of the lawn, and joined him with chat about the times and the weather.

"That's a fine horse of Mack's," commented John Dean in a momentary pause in the conversation.

"Yes," answered Paul, looking straight over the horse to the rustic seats where Ben Mack and Rebecca Dean sat.

"He follows Mack like a kitten," continued John Dean. "Horses seem to like him."

"Yes," answered Paul, savagely—"horses and women."

"Is it instinct?" asked John Dean.

"It isn't reason," answered Paul.

John Dean laughed; for he was of Paul's opinion. "Let us go look at Mack's horse," he said.

The change of position brought them near the elms and rustic seats where Ben Mack and Rebecca Dean sat.

There was no lull in the conversation or embarrassed change of topic.

Rebecca was saying, "Faith is manifest power."

"Faith in what, Miss Rebecca?"

Ben Mack put the question with the manner of one who was trying to draw out his companion—a manner that always aroused Rebecca Dean's resistance.

"In any thing," she answered, shortly.

"'Any thing' is ambiguous," objected Ben Mack. "Pray be explicit."

She held up the sketch. "You believe your strokes will correctly delineate nature. You have no fear. You dash right and left—you produce master-strokes. Another's lines are weak, and faint, and feeble. He has no faith—ergo, he has no power."

"You call genius faith?"

"No; and yet faith is genius just as perseverance is genius. Napoleon had genius, but he had also faith in his destiny. His faith was a manifest power in his life. Columbus believed in America. His faith was a power. Any man's faith is a power."

"A manifest power?"

"Yes; a man's faith is always manifested in the power of his life."

"If this be true, pray tell me, Miss Rebecca, what is my faith?"

"In yourself," she answered, laughing.

"You are right," he said. "I believe in myself—and you."

Save by a crimson tide that overspread Rebecca's cheeks, she did not heed the supplement to his answer.

"The life of greatest power is that with faith in itself, its neighbor, and its God," she said, in hurried, earnest tones. "Because ourselves are sinful, and our neighbors erring, the basis of our faith must be in God. Napoleon, with all his faith in himself and his destiny, found Waterloo. With faith in God the weak saint finds the New Jerusalem with pearly gates and golden streets."

Ben Mack looked in Rebecca Dean's earnest face half-comprehendingly. This woman's intellect, vitality, and gayety charmed him; but he had no sympathy with a spirituality that baffled him.

Lounging under the awning-cover of a little skiff that summer afternoon, Ben Mack turned wearily the pages of a memorandum-book. It was full of odds and ends, stray thoughts, and little sketches of brooks, and hills, and graceful elms, and here and there the outlines of pretty women's faces. Taking a pencil from his pocket, he wrote the following confession of faith:

"I believe in Rebecca Dean.

"Columbus believed in America; but before he could hope to reach that far-off land he must obtain the royal favor.

"I have sued long at the court of Rebecca Dean's heart for acknowledgment of my claims. Will refused to listen; but this morning Impulse, acting Queen Isabella's part, gave me the crown jewels.

"Yes; she is right. Faith is a manifest power. Had I possessed less faith in myself I had never gained this morning's victory, and sent the crimson currents of that woman's life to kiss the edges of her raven hair. She is a woman of crotchets and isms—a woman of conscience and spirituality; but I have untold faith in her.

"I believe in other things too. Money, luxury, and position are in my creed. I believe in them with all my soul.

"Are my articles of faith antagonistic? They are like my other tenets. I believe in fate. I believe also in free-will. Am I asked to reconcile my creed? I shrink back powerless. I can not do it."

In the softened light that came through windows of crimson, and gold, and blue, and purple, Rebecca Dean and Ben Mack sat, settling questions for a lifetime.

People called them lovers now. He was so deferential to her, and she so exceeding kind to him. Only the night before they had parted with hands that clasped unwillingly, and last words lingeringly said. Only the night before; and with the morning, Rebecca Dean brought one of her dissatisfied, self-searching moods to the little Gothic church with her.

Roger Hayden occupied the pulpit, a man with deep, brown eyes, a face bronzed with Indian suns, and tones that thrilled and electrified.

Rebecca Dean knew of the struggles of his life, and had christened him Napoleon. This morning, as she listened, she christened him anew, and the new name was Martin Luther. Here was a man whose faith must become manifest power in spite of earth and hell, for its source and end was God. Listening with her heart throbbing with last night's memory, her nerves quivering with the consciousness of a life somewhat out of tune, and her soul in cordial sympathy with the man whose life was faith. Rebecca Dean saw what her life would miss mated with Ben Mack. She did not look his way. She would not meet his eye. All the forces of attraction and repulsion that for five years had kept her life revolving around one point resolved themselves into a power that drove her from that centre forever.

And Ben Mack, with his eyes on Roger Hayden and his thoughts on Rebecca Dean, held in his pocket the memorandum-book with a new entry:

"I declare again my faith in Rebecca Dean.

"I have just drawn a note for ninety days. When the days of grace are over I shall believe in money even more than to-night I believe in Rebecca Dean. That settles my destiny. I shall take the first train that will bear me to a wife with fortune and away forever from Rebecca Dean."

It was hard work to keep that resolution looking at Rebecca. It would be harder yet to speak to her, and Ben Mack left the church before the service was concluded.

Straight through the village ran the road Rebecca Dean and Ben Mack had always taken from the church. Over the hill was another winding road, and, lest she should meet her lover, Rebecca took that way.

Suddenly, in a turn in the road, Rebecca Dean came face to face with Ben Mack. The intention of each to avoid the other was apparent; and, with a memory of the last night's parting, Rebecca Dean said, as if in excuse and justification:

"Women are wise on a sudden."

And Ben Mack, looking after the woman whom most of all he loved, and whom he had forever lost, finished the proverb:

"And fools on premeditation."

In that moment Ben Mack lost faith in himself and was a coward; for that faith had been his anchor hitherto.

Napoleon found Waterloo, and afterward St. Helena.

Ben Mack's life has in it both its Waterloo and St. Helena.

Columbus discovered the New World, but men call it America.

Ben Mack was the first invader into Rebecca Dean's heart; but the world calls her by the name of Hayden.

She has married a missionary.

WHAT BIRDS HAVE TAUGHT US.

OF all animals the bones of birds are largest in proportion to their weight, and are more hollow than those of animals which do not fly. Engineers, taking the hint, make hollow rods or tubes, and find them stronger than solid ones of the same length and quantity of matter; the strength is in proportion to the thickness, and if the figure is the same the hollow rod is thicker than the solid one.

Vessels of shallow draught are sometimes furnished with leeboards and sliding-keels, whose surfaces, installed to the bottom of the vessel's course, enable her to carry a heavy press of sail without giving way under the side pressure, or making lee-way, as that is the resistance against the rapidly passing body of water, which can not be deflected sideways at a high speed. These contrivances are copied from the human principle as the plane or wing-surface of a bird when moving in air.

The wings of birds, again, have the front or leading edge rendered rigid by bone, cartilage, or a thickening of membrane, and in most birds of perfect flight even the individual feathers are formed upon the same condition. In consequence of this, when the wing is waved in air, it gives a persistent force in one direction, caused by the elastic reaction of the following portion of the feather to that which is leading, in Archimedes's screw-propeller, the blade of which is made of thin steel, so as to be elastic. While the vessel is advancing, the blade is set in a high pitch to the keel, but during rotation they bend on one side, more or less, according to the speed and degree of propulsion required, and thus self-compensating; and could practical difficulties be overcome, would prove to be a form of propeller perfect in theory.

Various little implements and instruments have been or may have been suggested by other parts of a bird's body. Hilton Wilkins informs us that "Carden and Scoliger doo unanimously affirm that there is a bird amongst the Indians of so great a bigness, that his beak is often used to make a sheath or scabbard for a sword. The bill of the woodpecker is a very good chisel, straight, hard, and sharp, with edges ran upon the sides. The bird is called the carpenter of the woods, and when working at a tree he will provide you a ladder to climb by, or else he possesses also a very long tongue tipped with hairs, and uses the instrument as a sort of cane/ hair pencil. The hairs are half of its beak there as a receptacle containing a glutinous fluid; and dipping the brush into the, he shoots it into the hole he has bored into a dead or decaying tree, and brings it out covered with insects. The ovenbird is the most ancient of potters. The material of which its oven is made is principally mud or clay obtained from the river banks, but it is strengthened and softened by the admixture of grass, vegetable fibres, and stems of climbing plants. The heat of the sun is sufficient to harden it, and the oven has been thoroughly dried, it is so strong that it seems more like the handiwork of some novice at pottery than a veritable nest constructed by a bird, the fierce heat of the tropical sun baking the clay nearly as hard as a brick. The bird called the lancelate honeyeater may be regarded as the first maker of felt mocks, its nest being of hammock-like shape, and slung just as a seaman slings his oscillating couch.

Then, as to mere shapes, all sorts of flasks and bottles and retorts are anticipated in the nests of our feathered friends. The nest of the black weaver-bird of South Africa bears considerable resemblance to a Florence oil-flask, supposing the neck to be cut off short, while the body is longer, and the whole flask enlarged to three times its usual size. The nest of the penduline titmouse is of flask-like shape, the larger end hanging downward, so that at a little distance it looks like a huge pear with a rather long stem. The fury-mantis of Africa always builds a nest resembling a flask or retort, the neck being from seven to ten inches long, and the diameter of the bulb from four to seven inches. The bag-nest of the Cayenne wren is a nest of a variable shape; but often resembles a bottle woven of long grass and suspended from the extremity of a flexible branch.

Perhaps the best weaver is the Baltimore oriole. This bird chooses the ends of high bending branches for its nest, and begins in a forked twig by fastening strong strings of hemp or flax around both branches of the fork, just as far apart as the width of the nest is to be. He then, with the same kind of strings, mixed in with pieces of loose tow, weaves a strong firm kind of cloth, which is like the hatter's felt in appearance, only that you can see that the nest is woven, not felted. In this way he makes a pouch or purse, six or seven inches deep, and lines it on the inside with several soft things, which he weaves into the outside netting. The walls are then strengthened with horse-hair, as before of it.

In a beaver or felt hat the wool or hair is not woven, but mixed until the hooks and projections of the hairs so entangle with each over another. There are several birds very expert at making felt, their nests having the appearance of a piece of beaver's felt, or perhaps thicker woolen cloth, being carded together into one mass, though the fabric is less close and solid. The question as to the priority of invention is not contested between the hatters and the birds, might fairly be held to depend on the relative antiquity of the disputants, and then the birds would carry off the palm. The chaffinch and goldfinch make their nests with the downy fur from which the cows are pastured. But the most curious felt-makers reside in Africa. The Cape tit builds a nest in shape like a bottle of Indian rubber, and in texture as thick as a coarse worsted stocking. It is made of cotton and down and other things felted together.

Although the birds have no hand in making their own dresses, yet by their means nature has given us hints how to weave the most perfect cloth. In some parts of Arctic America the inhabitants make themselves coats of bird-skins, which are worn with the feathers inside. Such coats also are worn in plumes by the soldiers in France, as also by the American Indians; and are sometimes introduced into the hats of the fashionable ladies of this country. If our readers desire further information on the nests of birds, they will find in Mr. Wood a fascinating book of perfect store-house. But in this paper we can give nothing more than hints: our space is limited, and in these hints we must rest the note of retreat, devoting only one sentence to the notes of the cuckoo. This bird may be said to have done much for musical science, in the cuckoo scale, the origin of which has puzzled so many.

MATTERS OF FORM.

"THAT is all; you need not take the trouble to read it; you would not understand it if you did. All you have to do is to sign your name at the bottom, and leave the rest to others." "A mere matter of form!" You do not like to appear obstinate or pudding-headed; or to show ignorance of the law or secrecy on whose integrity you have every reason to rely. Perhaps you are indolent, and shrink from the trouble of investigation. Or you are afraid of the hatred of being singular, or of affecting to be wiser than your fellow-creatures. Or, perhaps, you prefer a little jump in the dark to a certainty that you can not see. Whatever your motive, the chances are that you say in a jocular tone, through which a suspicion of nervousness is audible, "Form!" "No responsibility or risk, I suppose?" And once more reasoned on that point, you sign. Well, in ninety-nine cases out of twenty, you lose no more of the matter; on the twentieth occasion you may find yourself in a very unpleasant predicament.

But that is a trifle: if idleness and careless ness only called the idle and careless individual the punishment would be rather a light one. But unfortunately a large proportion of our national, social, and commercial evils emanates from that habit of satisfying conscience with a ceremony. Why are work-houses sometimes changed into lunatic-houses, hospitals into horrors, moral and physical? How is it that private tunatic asylums are occasionally used as prisons for the unfortunate sane? How is it that the real cause of the state of bankruptcy to which our best paying railways have been wantonly brought? Is it not that directors, inspectors, directors, have assumed responsibility for the acts of their subordinates over which they have had no control, and have contented themselves with signing papers, listening to reports, making periodical and conventional inspections, boarding-house dinners, and public luncheons? Amateur work is very often but enough, but half-paid work is almost always entirely bad.

What does one pledge one's self to on taking a degree? If we remember rightly, a lot of neat gun barrels, and one rough sentence in Latin, while the others make responses in the same language, and not ten per cent. have an inkling of what it is about. Is not a tooth, but previous to one pledges himself not to set fire to the public library—perhaps the prohibition is extended to the river.

It is a necessary drawback to a high state of civilization that we should be the slaves of a superficial white lying? Or have conventional fashions of speaking any deteriorating effect upon us? Are we become accustomed to say, "I assure you," like the Quaker spacesmidnes to request to hearing a letter to a man you dislike "My dear So-and-so;" or to finish up a letter to you detest, "I have to do what a correspondent wishes with "Yours obediently;" and yet another form would surely be preferable.

Surely it is hardly credulate to a Christian nation that the act of standing sponsor should have degenerated into a mere form, tempered by silver mugs. And yet one might really almost parody an old saw/saw, and say that it is a wise godfather who knows his own godchildren.

No doubt, we have reformed ourselves considerably of late years. We have reduced the number of forms, and simplified the system of conveyance, and that you can see that the nest is woven, but even those are not free from abuse. To be sure, we must not be surprised—such an unprecedented year as it is/was—that on one morning and see the ground white, and snow-flakes flying before the air. Some, who fancy they have kept the reckoning, of that there have been forty-two enormous this reason; while others have considered it the easiest and most economical way of getting rid of "leaves" under the head of "things too numerous to mention." Some have seen it in the shape of a snow-storm on the Fourth of July; while others of the colder sections of the country aver that their snow-balls and snowdrops disappear before the end of August. However this may be, we must also be prepared to hear that the Fenians have taken to the spelling-grass and opening buds, as well as the sultry atmosphere and sudden showers of British fruit.

And there are other indications of warm weather which a great and populous city like New York should blush to find itself unprepared, and to the myriad of strangers who throng her streets. When the alarm of fire is given, and the engines are in readiness, we are trying toward these shores, our city bestirred itself, and to a large degree extirpated some of those nuisances from our midst. Regulations were stringent, and even in the pestilential season the air was comparatively free from impurities. But with fever, or any other pestilence threatens us in the uncertain future, we have a similar kind. In that is many parts of the city the air of spring, which thousands of lungs inhale pure and sweet, is more fearfully defiled by bone-boiling and fat-melting establishments than during a similar kind. Instead of fresh breezes from the Hudson, the south and south-westerly winds send sickening odors all through the upper and western portions of the city; and these will fail to receive a disgraceful portion may be thankful that their sense distinct location concrete the door. The people have a right to complain when God's pure, fine air is tainted and defiled by human villainies, and to an extent that they are compelled to breathe nauseating vapors. Nor do we believe any one, individual or corporation, has a right to pollute the atmosphere of any city such disgusting odors as come, in spite of all that is said about offensive trades and similar contrivances, from bone-boiling and fat-melting factories in New York city.

According to one of the Troy papers a terrific gas explosion recently occurred in a private house in that city. The occupant, a widow lady, called the attention of consolers gas in some of the rooms, went into the library to ascertain if the difficulty was from that quarter. A room was filled with gas. No son who was with him jumped up on the table and ignited a match for the purpose of examining for a leak in or about the chandelier. Instantly who the match was lighted there was a terrific explosion, the force of which was so loud as to be heard three or four blocks off, and so powerful that the building was shaken. The chandelier was driven down into the table violently. There was only a slight shock in the library where the explosion took place, but in the rooms the concussion was so great as to break out four lights of heavy plate glass from the front window. A gentleman observant girl standing on the front stoop was precipitated into the street, with brown in a heap, by the force of the explosion! The library escaped material damage, while the wall and ceiling of the adjoining room were considerably scorched. The room was speedily in a blaze, and the flame was not finally subdued until the entire house had been recalled in by the alarmed girl, shut off the gas at the meter. The lady escaped injury from the fire.

Chloroform can not always be safely administered. Indeed, it is quite a prevalent opinion that those who have any weakness of the lungs should never take it. Considerable excitement has been created in Portland by a recent death from its use. A young woman, a man about forty-five years of age, said to be affected with consumption, went to the rooms of a dentist, and requested to have a tooth, but previously to administer chloroform to deaden the sense of pain. This was done and the tooth taken out, when the man seemed to revive, but soon thereafter relapsed and appeared dying. Restoratives were applied and eye erected to prevent a fatal result, but he died in a short time. An inquest was held on the body, and a thorough examination of the case has been ordered to be made.

Numerous are the methods devised for obtaining money by worthless knaves in this city, who are too lazy to engage in any honest occupation. A lady recently had a very narrow escape from one of the most ancient in an omnibus. There was great but unavailing search; and, as she had not paid her fare, a gentleman kindly paid it with a ten-cent piece for the purpose. The same gentleman presently left the omnibus, and in a few minutes ascertained that he was the pickpocket. Another lady, being suddenly overtaken by a shower, took shelter of an omnibus while on her way to a car. But she presently found that her pocket had been robbed by her gentlemanly looking protector. A short time ago a young man, while paying a game of cards with some casual acquaintances, lost a roll of soda-water. Having drank a part, he put the glass down for a moment and continued his game. Shortly afterward he remember he complained of feeling ill, and said he must return to his lodgings. A friend accompanied him—but next morning he was found half insensible in his room, from which every thing of value had been removed. The soda-water had been dragged. A young Irishman, looking for a situation, saw an advertisement in the morning paper, stating that a young man could obtain a good situation by calling at a specified place. On going to the place designated he was blandly invited to be seated, by a bejeweled and bewhiskered individual. "Is the situation filled?" inquired the applicant. "Not yet," was the reply. "I have two situations, either of which would be desirable to you, I have no doubt," proceeded the man of the gold chain. "One of them is to be the Merchants' Union Express Company, and the other on the police." Now, young man, my way of doing business in this: I require $5 in hand, and when that is paid the right to both I assured to you. Can you came down with the stamps? If you know either of the situations will suit to you," the youth, though poor, at length agreed to give the required $5, on the condition that it should be refunded in case no employment was procured. But no employment was forthcoming; nor could he get the money back without taking the matter into court. A couple of gentlemanly appearing individuals engaged a suit of rooms of a lady in New York, paying one hundred dollars in advance. On the next morning after their arrival the maid-servant, on going to put the rooms in order, found that bedstead, sofas, chairs, curtains, ornaments, every thing, including the new lodgers, had vanished in parts unknown. And the landlady, on examining—with the help of a more experienced friend—the hundred dollar note taken as prepayment, found it to be a counterfeit.

What a delightful place Pittsburg must be to live in! It seems to be a special boon to the inhabitants to live on coal smoke and flouting clinders. They breathe smoke, eat smoke, clean smoke, and have it in their pockets! "Little boys and girls"—we quote from our authority—"who sell matches with wet fingers and sponges to wash people's faces for five cents. Every body is of a color in Pittsburg. At the post-office window the most distinguished citizen, for certain signs, it being impossible to see their faces for the layers of coal dust and smoke. Every one wears mourning in Pittsburg. People feel their way by their knuckles, and walk bent double. Nothing is unknown in Pittsburg—leave the window open and the smoke of a chimney as you like a newspaper from a machine press. Some few years ago a fine woman fell into the city through the cloud of smoke—the police rise and got her out, but the sense was lost. Was carry lantern to see to shake hands. When looking for a watch types the hour it is the fashion to light a match."

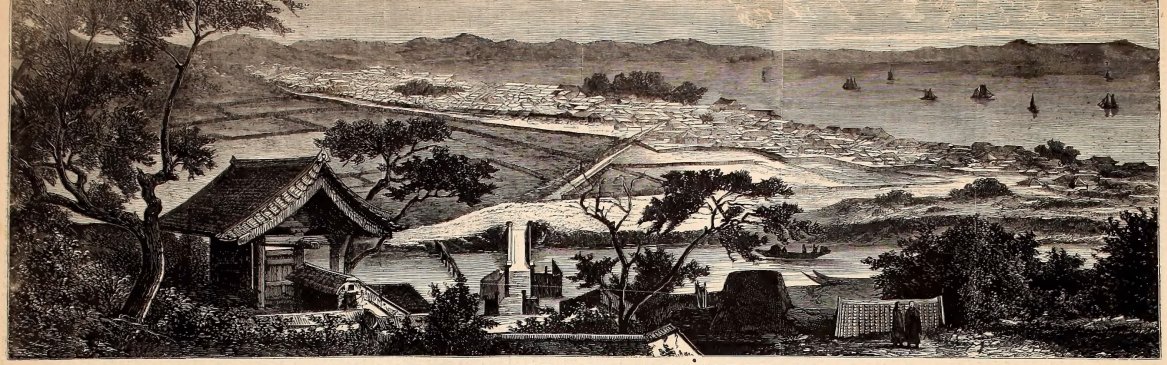
A shocking accident—a repetition of the Angelo tragedy—has occurred during the Belt Railway excursions of which have been universally reported and well-written and learned. Wholeseale mayhem on the coming everyday occurrences. On the New Haven road, on an accident of a different character took place, which we learned, in the main, to be a prove a warning to boys, or any others who carelessly or recklessly expose their lives. A boy named Hall, residing Tremont station a boy named Richard Gallagher attempted to jump on the track just in front of a locomotive. His foot slipping, in consequence of the snow, he was caught by the cow-catcher and thrown a distance of twenty feet into the air. He fell on the track and instantly breaking his neck, causing death without hardly a struggle. He was about fifteen years of age. It is said that he was a boy to the habit of coming on the cars out of bravado, just in front of the approaching trains, and was now thrown to his fate in security.

Nicknames abound at the South, though it is difficult to see any points of beauty in them, even if they were wanting. The Secession Convention of Florida was called "The Black-and-Tan Convention;" that of Texas, "The Unconstitutional Convention" that in Mississippi, "The Reconstruction Convention," or "The Reconstruction Menagerie;" that in Alabama, "The Circus," that in Georgia, "The Big-stream and Striped Negro Convention;" that in North Carolina, "The Loyal Union Disloyal Convention;" that in Virginia, "The Bones and Banjo Convention."

"Nonpulsatrigucinfinfusticomicindepirotenecelimilocalsanguinemanducabimurbibemusdentibus. Armadillo" is the name of a play performed on the Grand Square Theatre, in Paris, on Thursday thousand and Saturday. And "Mephilipentoracocomonete" is the name of a new or new musical instrument on the other side of the Atlantic.

People do better in the long-run to stick to their own business. Where can not be expected to know every thing, though general information on common matters is a very good thing, even for mistresses. Take the case of which is the case of a good minister in Western Massachusetts, who thought to improve his time while his own wages. After the first sun from his sugar place, he called on a parishioner and told him that he would not be averse to a good and nice sugar. Providence frowned on his trees: they gave him only a few pounds of sugar. The parishioner visited the minister's orchard, and found apples in the bucks, birch, and all suitable large trees included in his operations.

A desperate attempt was made, a week or two ago, in the city of Chicago, to commit wholesale suicide. In the first place she hung herself, and was cut down alive; then she threw her head into a sink full of water and drowned herself, and was rescued; and finally set her clothes on fire at the gas-light, and a policeman was much burned in trying to save her.



In Detroit the well-known spiritualistic medium died, after a short illness. Her body was prepared for the grave and put into the coffin. During the entire process the spirit of the deceased declared would try the experiment of placing a mirror on the face of the corpse. To her surprise the breathed moisture on the glass. After repeating the experiment with the same result, she called the attention of the doctor to it, and he, full of life, and of hope it was determined to defer the funeral. The body remained in the coffin for two days and on the third day from the day of her supposed death the signs of life seemed to return. A mirror was placed in here, after some days, she recovered life and warmth, and finally opened her eyes and spoke; and is now in a fair way to recover.

The "Brooklyn Eye and Ear Hospital," at the corner of Washington and Johnson streets, is a new charity which has just begun its good work of relieving sufferers. The diseases which are to be treated gratuitously at this institution, and it will be open daily for outside patients and for the reception of those who need attention within its walls. Dr. Agnew is the senior medical officer of the hospital, and the Board of Directors is composed of many well-known and reliable gentlemen.

The proprietor of the extensive India-rubber works in College Point, Mr. Conrad Poppenhusen, has lately given that town $100,000 in cash and a vast endowment of lands, for educational and charitable purposes, and has refrained from giving any direction about the disposal of the property of his superintending this to a board of trustees, to be elected by the citizens of College Point.

"MY HEART SIGHS FOR SPRING."—(SEE POEM, PAGE 286.)

SPRING—"AND THE LOVER SEES ARISE WARMER PASSION TO THE EYES."

When the coronal of Spring,
Comes the cuckoo on the wing,
From a shore with fairer wavelets and a sunnier, sweeter land,
And the earth smiles out again,
All her fair face wet with rain,
And the flow'rets in her bosom with the Spring's fresh breezes fann'd.

And the hazel tassels high
Hang between us and the sky,
While the blackbird and the throstle have a newer, louder song,
As they sing beside the stream,
Where its tiny waters gleam,
That were lately held ice-fetter'd when the winter nights were long.

CHILDREN OF TRINITY CHURCH, BROOKLYN, MAKING THEIR EASTER OFFERINGS.—SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.—[SEE PAGE 286.]

For the winter time has gone,
And the bees trees stood alone,
Mid the sadness in the forest, when the leaves had died away.

The time of winds and snows,
When a strangest silence grows
On the woodland and the city through the dreary winter day.

'Tis a time of hope for all,
And the breezes whisper fall
With a sweeter music, presage of the golden days of June;
And the lover sees arise
Warmer passion to the eyes,
That he watches 'neath the silver of full many a waking moon.

And one herald cometh forth,
On a mission from the North,
A fair virgin that is ever, and we welcome back the flow'rs;
'Tis the snow-drop, with the white
Maiden-bells, that greets our sight,
When the leaden skies grow lighter, with the Winter's waning hours.

There are haply graves, too near,
Those who left us, ere the year
That forever has departed, had grown old in autumn days;
Can we wish them back once more,
Who have gain'd the farther shore,
And are swelling with the angels the eternal strains of praise?

Though the past may call us back
On the old well-beaten track,
There are high hopes for the future that the Spring-time days have brought.
There are proud knights to be won,
And the fame has just begun
With the music from its belfries by a thousand echoes caught.

And 'tis fitting that we sing
Songs of triumph to the Spring,
For he cometh as a conqueror from the far-off wilds of snow;
And ere long, in Summer time,
We shall hear the blue-bell chime,
With the fulness of the Summer when the queenly rose blows.

MY HEART LONGS FOR SPRING.

See Illustration on page 285.

O CRAY skies of Winter!
O how my heart longs
For the warm airs of April,
Its green and gold songs!
O come, O blithe swallow!
Sing, brown thrush, O sing,
Our woodland is the wind-flowers!
My heart longs for Spring.
For Spring my heart's tonging;
O come, Spring, see!
My heart pines for sunshine,
Bring life's May to me!

With streams white and frozen
To stillness and death,
With boughs brown and lifeless,
I long for Spring's breath.
O May, whose low whispers,
Bright laughs and leaves bring,
With them, my heart's longing,
And joining is Spring.
My frozen thoughts weary;
My numbed fancies long
To dance through the sunshine,
And laugh into song.

O happy South! lingers
Our dear one with thee!
Swift, swift let her hither,
Our gladdener to be!
O send her the silver
Of dulcet bells bring!
With cuckoos' soft name-calls,
Haste hither, O Spring!
Our orchards in blossoms,
Our woodlands are dumb,
Till, sister of Summer,
Thou, joy-bringer, come.

CURIOUS DERIVATION OF A STRANGE PHRASE.

AMONG the strange phrases in use among sailors, which at first sight appear utterly senseless and silly, is one which is the destroyer of a sea-sickness, who is said to be "shooting the cat." What possible connection can there be between the overt act of killing and still the destruction of a "harmless, necessary animal?" The first thing a man in search of what school-boys call a "dark" has to do, is to settle what language he must look for it. We have not far to go for the cat. Our sea-terms, especially those of the mercantile marine, are almost all of Dutch or Low-Dutch Saxon origin, these two nations having been our precursors in over-sea commerce. That which for many centuries has been decided upon calling the ships cargo (from the latine language) was in earlier days sometimes designated by the Dutch name of katt, the tradition of which still remains in our naturalized tea-caddy and katty-packages, employed to this day; and also in the English word cat, which is used for a consting-vessel, the name of the thing carried being given to the vessel carrying, just as packet is short for packet-boat. To "shoot" the cargo" is a common expression for disburdening a ship of its load; and shows the source of the metaphor to the misery of the sea. But an amusing corollary to this theorem has been suggested. Was not this the true katt which laid the first foundation of the fortunes of Lord Mayor Whittington? Nothing could be simpler or more probable than the story with this gloss. The merchant, freighting a ship to open commercial relations with a new and unexplored place, offers to his clerks a share in the venture. The poorest of them, bringing something of so little value as to make him the laughing-stock of his fellows, is encouraged by his good-natured master. Who knows but Whittington's cat may bring him some good return?" In fact the katt—whatever it may have been—bends, or some other trifle, made a hit, pleased the savage tribe, and set Whittington going for life. As to the detail about the king, the mice, etc., all students of philology know how the etc. will students of glo grows under the hand of the poets and tale-tellers. Having once misunderstood the date, every succeeding one departs more and more from the truth; so that the commentator has to try back to find the point of departure amidst the maze of fiction that surrounds it.

THE JAPANESE REVOLUTION.

We have given in former Numbers of the Weekly details of the great revolution in Japan, which was produced by the opening of the new treaty ports of Hiogo and Osaca on January 1, 1868, though the revolution was not brought down to the latest date. The struggle has since been brought to an end, and though the full details have not come to hand, we know that the late Tycoon, STOTS BASHI, has been defeated and overthrown, but the revolutionists have failed to obtain the new treaty ports which the Tycoon had thrown open. Doubtless the pressure of the men-of-war of the United States and England has put an end to the piracies on the Damios and the Mikado as far as the observance of the Tycoon's treaty was concerned.

The engraving which we give on page 284 are of the Tycoon's Palace at Yeddo, with a distant view of that city, and a general view of Yokohama. These places are among the most important of the kingdom of Japan. Yeddo is its second capital and largest city, being situated in latitude very nearly twice as great as that of New York, but with comparative insignificant commercial and manufacturing interests. Yokohama is also a large city, but its exact population is not known at this time.

EASTER OFFERINGS.

THROUGHOUT the country it is the custom of the Sunday-school children of the Episcopal Church to make an offering for the presentation of offerings or donations of money, which, as a general thing, is used for missionary purposes. The different classes assume appropriate names, such as "The Cheerful Givers," the "Young Missionaries," "Children of Hope," and other titles which are, as a general thing, selected by the children composing the classes. A motto, generally a verse of Scripture, is selected, and some emblem is arranged that will illustrate the text. Flowers are often selected to represent the subject; Easter songs are sung, and Sunday is celebrate each year the Rising of Christ in a manner that enables them to remember the season as a joyful one.

The Rev. MR. LITTLEJOHN, Pastor of Trinity Church, Brooklyn, told the Sunday-school children that their offerings for Easter had paid more than half the expense of erecting a church in the far West. Five hundred children attend the Sunday-school of the Church of the Holy Trinity; their offering on Easter Sunday was nearly eleven hundred dollars, which sum will be devoted to the erection of a mission church in one of the suburbs of Brooklyn. Our illustration on page 285 is of a scene which took place in this church on last Easter Sunday.

MRS. PAIGE'S NEW METHOD

FOR THE

Piano-Forte, Organ, and Voice,

Owing to the great popularity of Mrs. Paige's system of instruction, applications for teachers are constantly being received from different parts of the country.

To meet this demand, a large number of ladies and gentlemen are now studying immediately at my Studio to qualify themselves for this work, and positions will be secured for all those desiring the use of instruments can be accommodated at our rooms.

The method is so simple and comprehensive that after one month of close application parties can commence teaching and continue their course by correspondence.

It is the superfluous first year, it teaches a thorough knowledge of the science of music, mathematically arranged. Music can be acquired in one month from any other method in years. Pupils have more practise in this system in this time in the presence of the old system. Hence it brings a musical education within the reach of all, and it applies to the study precisely as it is written, without any change whatever. These statements can be substantiated by facts. References will be given on application.

Having secured the assistance of one of the most eminent teachers, we are prepared to give our patrons private instruction. Pupils attending the classes receive some at our time. Adult and juvenile classes will be formed at once for the study of the Piano, Organ, and Vocal Music, by the quarter or by the year.

The terms are the most reasonable ever offered. No one is authorized to teach this method except those who can present diploma bearing Mrs. A. P. PAIGE'S signature. Circular is the inventor and sole proprietress.

Terms made easy.

For circulars, address, with enclosed stamp, Mrs. P. PAIGE, Room 3 and 4, Chickering's Block, 246 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

Superior Imitation Gold Hunting Watches.

THE ORIOIDE WATCH FACTORY.

ORIODE CASES, a newly discovered composition, known only to ourselves, precisely like gold in appearance, keeping its color as long as worn, and as well finished as the best gold ones. These watches are in hunting cases made at our own Factory, from the best materials, of the fairest and most approved styles, are jeweled and well finished, with a view to the best results in regard to wear and time. For appearance, durability, and time they have never been equaled by watches costing five times as much. Each one warranted by special certificate to keep accurate time. Price $18. Gentlemen's and Ladies' size. For this small sum any one can have a reliable watch, and one, too, as good for time, as a gold one costing $150. Also Oroide Chains, as well made as those of gold, from $2 to $6. Goods sent to any part of the United States by express. Money need not be sent with the order, as the bills can be paid when the goods are delivered by the express. Customers must pay all the express charges.

C. D. COLLINS & CO., 37 and 39 Nassau St. N. Y. Opposite P. O. Building.

☞ CAUTION. Since our Oroide Watches have attained so high a reputation, and the demand for them has greatly increased, many persons are offering common and worthless watches for sale, representing them to be Oroide Watches, in some instances asserting that they are our Agents. We will state most positively that we employ no Agents, and that no one else does or can make Oroide: consequently these representations are false. The genuine Oroide Watches can only be obtained by ordering directly from us.

TESTIMONIALS.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: VICKSBURG, MISS., February 20, 1868.

GENTS,—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the Oroide Watches I ordered. They are very beautiful, keep correct time, and hold their color exceedingly well. I am glad to find in fact, they are all you represent them to be. I am well pleased. You will please forward to my address, in care of Southern Express, Vicksburg, Miss., another Oroide Watch, gent's size, with Seven Jewels, Five dollar (No. 3). You will hear from me frequently. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

P.S.—I enclose you a letter to show you how well you have succeeded in gold: C. S. CATTENDEN.

C. S. Cattenden, Vicksburg, Miss.: February 16, 1868.

I received the beautiful watch you sent me. It is a nice present, for which accept the thanks and regards of your old comrade. You will not think hard of me when I tell you that I sold the watch for $100, and with this money I will buy a better watch for myself and one for my brother, who is now at Vicksburg sick, and, I believe, if you will assist me, I will speculate a little in watches. Don't you think my old left hand is improved? I wonder where my poor right arm is. Send for a watch for me. Well don't cost much. Yours, LUKE STARLOG, S. S. R. & D. R. R.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: SHELBY COUNTY, TENN., December 14, 1867.

GENTS,—The watch you expressed to me on the 30th of January came to hand all right (except crystal broken). I regulated it. I am well pleased with it. I am also in want of P. S. Bartlett's best patent levers. I have shown it to a good many, and they pronounce it a good watch and no humbug. Yours, CYRUS A. PETERSON, Fredericktown, Mo.

P.S.—You may expect a larger order from myself and friends soon. C. M. DAUPHIN.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION OF NORTH CAROLINA,

GENTS,—Please send me one Oroide Watch of the same kind you sent me before. I want a gentleman's size. I think I can sell a half dozen every month. I will order more in a few weeks. Send by express as before. Yours, A. F. BOWEN.

RALEIGH, N. C., February 22, 1868.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: HUMBOLDT, GIBSON COUNTY, TENNESSEE.

GENTS,—Send me a gent's size watch, same style and number as the one you sent me before. I want a gentleman's size. I think I can sell a half dozen every month. I will order more in a few weeks. Send by express as before.

A. F. BOWEN.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: BROOKLYN, POWESHIEK COUNTY, IOWA, December 1, 1867.

GENTS,—Please send me a gold watch, same as you sent me before, and three ladies' watches. Send to Brooklyn, Poweshiek County, Iowa. The watch you sent me three months ago proves as good a time-keeper as I have ever seen. I have exhibited my watch to my neighbors, so that I am able to send a club at six for watches. Yours, &c., MERIDIAN, January 13, 1868.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.: NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, December 2, 1868.

GENTS,—The watch ordered by express came to hand to-day. I am well pleased with its appearance, and if it keeps equal time I am perfectly satisfied. In the mean time I wish to order two for my friends, of the same quality as the one sent me. Respectfully, A. W. BELL.

DEAR SIRS,—I received the watch which I ordered all safe, some days ago, and I must say it fully exceeded my expectation. It is all and more than I could desire for the money. So far it keeps very good time. Yours truly, C. STEWART.

Messrs. C. E. Collins & Co.:

SIRS,—Please send to the undersigned one of your Fifteen-Dollar Oroide Cased Watches, gent's size, and chain. The one I got from you before gave universal satisfaction, and one of my friends desires me to obtain one for him. A two-dollar chain, and watch, gent's size. Yours, &c., FARNTOWN (VIA ADAMS EXPRESS), Allegheny Co., Pa.

Watches Superseded. The Magnetic Pocket Time-Keeper and Compass, in handsome case, with gilt dial, shade, steel and metal works, white enameled dial, ordinary watch size, sound and serviceable. Ground Coffee, 20c., 25c., 30c., best 40c. per pound. Hotels, Saloons, Boarding-House Keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our French Breakfast and Dinner Coffee, which is the best for the money ever offered, and warranted to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50c. to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St. (Post-Office Box, No. 5643), New York City.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

Those in want of large quantities of Teas, Coffees, &c., consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them in the immediate vicinity of New York.

Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a club say how much he or she will take, select the kind and price from our Price List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. Write the names, kinds, and amounts plainly on a list, and when the club is complete send it to us by mail or express, and we will put up in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost, so there need be no confusion in their distribution —each party getting exactly what he ordered, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the club can divide equitably among themselves.

The terms to pay for the goods ordered can be sent by drafts on New York, by post-office money orders, or by express, as may suit the convenience of the club. Or, if the amount ordered exceed $50, we will, if desired, send the goods by Express to collect on delivery.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be as liberal as we can afford. We want no complaints, and we will give perfect satisfaction.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffees about one-third by sending directly to "The Great American Tea Company."

BEWARE of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our Establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are bogus or imitations. We have no branches, and do not, in any case, authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office orders and drafts make payable to the order of the Great American Tea Company. Direct letters and orders to the Great American Tea Company,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street, Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

A Miserable Shaker

Is the victim to Fever and Ague. This tedious and enervating disease is, unfortunately, too well known to need a description. It is strictly a malarious disease, caused by exhalations from the soil, especially from marshes, swamps, and newly-opened and re-cumbered with decomposing vegetable matter. The chills is one of the most troublesome of maladies, as the patient, though he may not suffer pain, is rendered helpless, incapable of action. The experience of years has demonstrated the fact that

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters

Is a sure means of fortifying the system against all atmospheric poisons, breaking up the paroxysms and rapidly restoring the strength. Quinine, which has so long been the great remedy for chills, has been superseded by this powerful and harmless agent; while as a preventive it is unequaled, as the use will certainly exempt all who may live in unhealthy localities from the ravages of the disease.

Hostetter's Stomach Bitters

Is now among the most popular, and, at the same time, valuable specifics in the medical world. In recommending it to the public, we are fully conscious of doing them a great service, knowing, as we do, their many excellent properties, their mild and speedy action in all cases where the disease is caused by irregularity of the digestive organs.

As a tonic it is both mild and effective, agreeable to the taste, and stimulating in its action upon the system.

"ECONOMY is Wealth;" Franklin. Why not practise it by the use of $100 for a Sewing Machine when $50 will do the same? Are not all practical purposes? Notwithstanding reports to the contrary, the sole interest lies in the Grover & Baker Machine, that is "FRANKLIN" and "DIAMOND" Machines can be had in any quantity. This Machine is a double thread, complete with Table, constructed upon entirely new principles, and DOES EVERY KIND of work upon any of the world. It is emphatically the poor man's Sewing Machine, and is warranted to excel all others, to thousands of patrons well testify. 12th AGENTS WANTED.—Machines sent to Agents on trial, and delivered to families who are needy and deserving. "IMPROVED BRONZE ALUMINUM HUNTING-CASED WATCHES"
(The qualities and resemblance of this new metal are such, compared to gold, that even Judges are deceived) and "ROSKOFF'S PATENT PEOPLE'S WATCH."
The Improved Bronze Aluminium of which my watches are made is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. It has seriously occupied the attention of scientific men, and has not only called forth the eulogiums of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition, and even been favorably noticed by a receipt of His Holiness Pius IX., authorizing its use in the manufacturing of Church goods.
The qualities of this metal are such that it is surprised by none, if we except gold itself, and that only on account of the intrinsic value of the latter. Further details will be found in my circular, which will be sent postpaid on demand.
My watches are made of three sizes, all hunting-cased—one small for ladies or lads, and two for gents. The movements are well finished, carefully put together by skilful workmen, and perfectly regulated. I can therefore warrant them excellent time-keepers. These goods being manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to sell any of the above sizes at the extremely low price of $40 00. A full assortment of all kinds of chains always on hand.
Goods sent by express, C.O.D., with charges.

THE END OF THE TRIAL.

THE result of the great trial will probably be known when this paper is issued. Nothing new is evidence, except the extraordinary dispatch to Governor PARSONS, of Alabama, and nothing new in argument has been developed during all the long proceedings. That the President thought the law unconstitutional; that the Cabinet and the Senate the same; that he would assert that Mr. STANTON does not stand within the law; that he would profess an edifying purity of purpose, and argue that to abuse could bring the law to the judicial test, were all familiar propositions. They have been amplified, intensified, elaborated, combined, and reiterated by the skilful counsel of the President, excepting Mr. NELSON, whose speech, however well meant, must be regarded as a burlesque. But no dextrous decoration can make vulgarity seem to be refinement, and no ability of the advocate can conceal the significance of familiar facts, or bewilder the plain public judgment upon them.

For not the Senate only, but the whole country has been sitting as a Court of Impeachment. The country will also render its verdict, whatever that of the Senate may be. It is not likely to be confused by the loud cry of Congressional absorption of power, because it sees that in the very case in issue the power is however skilfully checks and balances may be devised, no checkmate can be supposed to be intended, and therefore the final, supreme power must reside somewhere. It is vested last in our system in Presidents with the people, under certain prescribed forms. Under those forms it remains with them always, and at every moment; and therefore, when the Executive in the judgment of the Representatives is accused of high misdemeanors, and in the judgment of the Senate is guilty and removed from office, it is still the people exercising under those forms the supreme sovereign power. If the action of the President strikes the limit of those of his powers which are vague and doubtful betrays a disposition to thwart the will of the country as decidedly expressed in Congress, it is the duty of Congress to check and control his action so far as it lawfully may, and to prevent the mischief which he may contemplate. And when his dullness or his malice has transcend the plain bounds of his official discretion it is the duty of the House instantly to arraign him, and in the name of the people whom it represents to state why it should not be removed.

Mr. BOUTWELL's argument for the Managers was the clear, ample, admirable statement of the people against the President. He showed conclusively that the assumption of the Executive was fatal to national peace; and his reasoning upon the constitutional point of the senatorial advice as necessary to removal as to appointment was peculiarly good and strictly harmonious with the seventy-sixth Number of the Federalist, in which the question is fully discussed contemporaneously with the formation of the Constitution.

With great force and sobriety Mr. BOUTWELL also urged the fact that we have constantly advocated, that it is no excuse for the violation of a law by the Executive that he wished to test its validity. He is sworn to see that the laws are faithfully executed. If he may, after exhausting his veto, still continue to impose it, under the plea of seeking a judicial approval of the constitutionality of the law, the Congress of the United States is reduced to a mere committee of suggestion, and if Congress should fail to overcome its judicial authority to withstand such usurpation, its assent would be the own abolition as the chief department of the Government, and the consummation of a revolution which would probably lead to no overthrow of our whole symmetrical political system. For such an act no good motive can be pleaded, because none can be supposed. When an officer has taken an oath faithfully to execute a law, and then deliberately violates it upon a plea which would make him the judge in every instance whether he would observe his oath or not, and upon a plea which necessarily clothes him with enormous and dangerous power, the fact that he says it is all done for the public welfare is of no importance. If he sincerely thinks it to be so, it is still of no importance. The will of the most virtuous and sagacious man in the country can not be suffered to become the Government. If he try to make it so the presumption is wholly against him; and it is not necessary to show that his motive is bad for an act which is subversive of the fundamental law.

Nor upon the ground that Mr. STANTON does not stand within the law, and that, consequently, his removal was no violation of the law, have we ever had any doubt. The intention of the law was plainly expressed during the debate upon its passage. It was introduced after the determination of the President to thwart Congress was apparent, and when Congress felt it to be, as it undoubtedly was, its duty to limit his action as stringently as it Constitutionally could. It was felt that, if the President could remove his Cabinet at his pleasure and surround himself with men willing to be his tools, the national peril was palpably increased. The passage of the law was resisted upon the very ground that it perplexed the President in the selection of judicious and patriotic counsellors. We heard this argument urged in the Senate. It was repeated in the newspapers. The law was opposed as special legislation. It was defended upon the ground that when peculiar peril revealed the necessity of a law, that fact could be no argument against it, provided there were sufficient votes in favor of its passage. We know that certain leading men felt the law to be imperatively necessary in order to retain Mr. STANTON in the War Department, which they considered in the existing crisis vital. And we think that events have justified their view.

If this were the intention, there is certainly no fair doubt of the words of the law. If we follow Mr. GROESBECK into what he must call quibbling, the law says that the Secretary of War, with the other Secretaries, shall hold office "for and during the term of the President by whom they may have been appointed, and for one month after, subject to removal" with the consent of the Senate. Now, President JOHNSON appointed Mr. STANTON; and when the Tenure-of-Office Act was passed Mr. STANTON held by President LINCOLN's appointment, and for President JOHNSON's term. Mr. LINCOLN, President succeeding Mr. LINCOLN, whether in the first or in the last week of his term, serves only for the remainder of that term. Mr. JOHNSON's term will not have expired for some time. Does Mr. JOHNSON, then, serve as President until the 15th of April, 1869, which, according to Mr. GROESBECK's theory, is the end of LINCOLN's term of four years? If Mr. JOHNSON lived until now would Mr. JOHNSON have served for four years from now? Certainly he would, unless he is falling the Presidency which Mr. LINCOLN was elected. Mr. GROESBECK's question of "which term" of Mr. LINCOLN's is not so ingenious as he seemed to think it. A Secretary appointed by a President, and continued by him upon his re-election is, in commonsense, reappointed. And if Mr. STANTON's office were vacated by the Democratic Convention, then he has been holding the office by the President's permission, who has thus contravened the second section of the Act. But if Mr. JOHNSON has not held Mr. STANTON in office, and with in the law why did he suspend him in accordance with the law, and thus acknowledge by his official action that he was subject to it as valid? Indeed, the President has no defense but a quibble—and even the quibble is not sound. Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS's speech, which it was supposed might be very inflammatory in tone, was admirable both in substance and manner. Two sentences we quote, and commend to the Democratic Convention: "Good deeds will never be done, wise laws will never be executed, except by the virtuous and the conscientious. Moy the people of this republic remember that the only safeguard when they next meet to select their rulers, and may they select only the brave and the virtuous."

If the judgment of the Senate shall be what we have no doubt it will be, the moral opinion of the country expects, ANDREW JOHNSON will be removed from the office whose sworn duty he has violated, and will be disgraced beyond precedent. He is not a man to respect silent. He will doubtless do all that he can do by speeches upon the stump to secure the ascendancy of the party that has defended him in rebellion, and hates the results which the war secured—results which will surely be gradually established in spite of every opposition and policy. If removed, he passes from public official life without a serious regret upon the part of any human being. He can not claim for himself, nor will any one claim for him, the dignity and consideration of a martyr to great principles. If, indeed, his character and career had been approved by the Constitution; had he committed the same offense with a clear and lawful upright purpose, although it might have been necessary to show by the last resort that no man, with whatever high purpose, can assume to substitute his will for the law, yet then the homage that the world always gladly pays to heroic and unselfish virtue would have followed his retirement.

If the judgment of the Senate shall be other than we believe it must be, that of the intelligence and the honor of the country will still remain. The usurpation indeed will continue and increase. The national agitation will be deepened. The spirit that rebelled, and is still defiant, will be quickened to more high activity. The country will move one step nearer to breaking its pecuniary faith with its creditors, and its moral faith with its freedmen. The heart of every lover of liberty and of free institutions in the world will ache as he watches the results of the great victory of civilization delayed. But the conscience, and intelligence, and devotion that successfully surmounted every trial of the war would not decline the embittered political contest that the acquittal of the President would provoke; and the same sagacious, silent, resistless leader who triumphantly ended the war, would bring the old foe under a new face to unconditional surrender.

THE SOUTHERN ELECTIONS.

WE recently described the general character of the new constitutions for the Southern States, showing that they were, with the exception of Louisiana, and perhaps of Virginia, not seriously different in their provisions from those of the other States. The elections upon the question of their ratification have now occurred in Louisiana, Georgia, Alabama, North Carolina, and Arkansas. In all these States they have undoubtedly been adopted, and Republican officers elected. The wise action of Congress in requiring merely a majority of the actual voters instead of the registered voters has produced a most desirable result. There has been in all the States a political contest. This of itself tends to restore a wholesome normal condition. It disturbs the apathy in which "Conservatism" was resolved to intrench itself, and by compelling the ballot to move in the accustomed way helps to restore the healthful circulation of the whole system.

There has been also, so far as appears, and thanks to judicious military supervision, very little open terrorism. The white and colored population have voted together and not always against each other. Apparently the colored voters have had a fair chance, and especially in South Carolina they have been even propitiated by the Democratic leaders. Nothing, indeed, is more striking than that while the Democratic party in the North, in all the old stupid ways, is carefully fostering hostility of race, and is loudly shouting that the black population, the party chiefs in South Carolina are warily weaving its support. Superior sagacity explains the old ascendency of the Southern leaders. They always understand their Northern allies, to whom they gave a polley and places. The Northern wing was the rank and file. It obeyed, and carried and bewed and drew water. And so with the Union sub-servicey that now, when the whole political situation is changed and the necessities are wholly new, the Democratic party continues the same complary effort to prove that the Lord evidently meant FREDERICK DOUGLASS to be the dumb WOFZALL or WIRE; that day before yesterday is to-morrow, and that the war must be immediately unfought.

The wiser of the old adherents of the party in the Southern States have learned something. If their wisdom had been general in that region the elections might have resulted differently, and the political situation of the South would be changed. Unable to "tie natural governors of the country." It is, however, probable that the Democratic party as a party will never again absolutely control the Southern States. As the education—education, the great restorer and civilizer—and the general principles, purpose, and history of the Republican party become known both to the white and colored population in those States, the party, whatever its name, which embodies those principles will receive the support of the truly faithful, intelligent, and humane citizens. The Democratic party, like the technically Conservative party in all free countries, will even more plainly appear to be what it has long been, a combination of the extremes of society, its great bulk composed of the most ignorant of the population; the kind of alliance that DISRAELI has described the hope for in England, that the King and the Lazaroni made in Naples. But the mass of the intelligent, moral, industrious population of the country could never unite with the Democratic party under any leaders which it now presents, or with any principles which it now advocates. And when it changes its principles and principles it ceases to be the Democratic party as we know it.

Upon a Presidential platform of hostility to the colored race, which the Northern Democratic majority will demand, the South Carolina leaders of the party can not support the candidate without hopelessly alienating all colored support. The policy of the party upon that subject can not safely vary with the States because it is a point of paramount importance, and necessarily involved in the election. The voice of the Democratic party at Chicago will be clear and unequivocal for equal rights. To shirk the subject, as the Democratic Convention may try to do, will leave it aside as a matter for State decision, is of course, to unite the whole vote of those who are affected by the decision upon the party which has a principle favorable to them and is not afraid to express it.

Meanwhile reactions have their term. The cry of "White man's Government!" will not elect a President of the United States; and the colored voters of the Southern States will never again be, as a class, disfranchised.

TAXATION AND PRODUCTION.

LABOR, or the product of labor, is the source of all wealth. This is the first principle in political economy. Excess of production over consumption enriches; a deficiency causes debt and creates taxation. Any measure, therefore, that tends to stimulate production should meet with hearty approval. For this reason the public has regarded with favor the Act of Congress removing the tax on manufactures. Intrinsically, it was a judicious measure, and accorded with the judgment of those best conversant with the business and financial interests of the country. It was part of the feasible plan of relief suggested by our able Special Commissioner of Revenue, Mr. WELLS.

It is true, as cautious men urge, that the curtailment of the revenue by the amount of $24,000,000 which the tax on sections yielded, and of $68,000,000 raised from taxes on manufactures, including iron and its products, must only work ultimate mischief unless there be a corresponding reduction in the Government expenditure. But it is not our purpose to discuss this point. Obviously there are other impediments to production than indebtedness and a depreciated currency. They are easily designated, and their names—are idleness and Speculation. Practically, one-tenth of all the available labor in the country which should be the only active service as a beneficent agent in the work of production, is continually seeking to run where it has not even been. It seeks to obtain wealth while it contributes nothing to that which creates wealth. Also, there is an abundance of capital in the country, which is idle or non-producing. Such labor and such capital may both be termed active, in a certain sense; but the activity is that represented at the gambling-table, where ruinous chance hands and enrich no one. They might better be locked up within strong vaults and prison-doors.

The effect of the war was to disorganize labor, especially in the fruitful agricultural districts of the South. Hundreds of thousands of negro laborers who once increased the productive resources of the nation have since necessarily become a charge upon the country. Hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of property have been wiped out in that section. All this available labor must be employed and this wasted property reproduced. No effort should be spared to secure the return of the former prosperity of the South and its invaluable contributions to the wealth of the country. When it can materially assist the North in the great work of recuperation, we shall find the national debt more speedily lightened. We shall then have less need for appeals to legislative action for relief.

But it is not in the South only that we witness a deplorable disorganization of labor and a decrease of productive industry. The North has suffered in degree, if not in kind. A considerable period of fictitious prosperity, forced in the train of the war, of an inflated currency, has accustomed our people to improvidence, luxury, and extravagance. Fortunes came at the bidding, and great prizes were drawn from the fortuitous changes of the market and the vicissitudes of struggle. But this condition of things no longer exists. The opportunity is past, and yet the inclination to these reckless ventures retains its hold upon the public. The people are reluctant to return to the old-fashioned, methodical, honest way of doing business, and refuse to be content with certain but moderate profits. It is the old story once more repeated. To every paper-money era legitimate business suffers. Labor for what the silver gains of trade, and an inordinate impatience of all that characterize the period. The great aim is to secure the largest reward for the smallest amount of labor—to find out the little path to wealth and divide the earnings of those who work. Agrarian doctrines are insidiously presented. Labor Unions are formed to compel the payment of large wages at the very time when business is most depressed. Strike follows strike in every department of industry, and always at times most inopportune. Men forget that by applying themselves energetically to increase production, they would thereby secure cheaper living, which amounts to the same as higher wages. The coarse fallacy chosen by some only destroys the fountain from which they would drink.

But the laborer, the operative, and the miner are merely following the path that others found. Advertisers in the newspapers offer large bonuses for paying salaries. Bankers lend money for large rates and doubtful collaterals. Thousands of idlers daily tempt fortune at the Stock Exchange, and permit neither night-time nor Sunday to interrupt their greed. Fifteen hundred brokers live upon the unfortunate folly in the city of New York alone. Railroad jobs and jobbery, gift enterprises, and swindles of all kinds fill the measure of speculative enterprise. It is said that in the appointment-room of the Treasury Department alone, at Washington, there are between fifteen and twenty thousand applications on file. Every bureau swarms with eager place-seekers—more non-producers who suck vitality from the nation and swell the taxes which it has to pay. So it is every where. The cities and large towns are filled with adventurers of this kind who seek to live by their wits instead of their labor. Policy offices and fare books are counted by the thousands. Every day we read of enticedevements, forgery, counterfeiting, and blackmailing. What swarms of leeches feed and fatten upon our life-blood! What hosts are shunning the legitimate fields of labor, where well-directed energy and application would lay the foundation of a solid competence, and yield such reward as would fill the national ex-cheaper to overflowing, and wipe out taxation and debt!

Is it beyond the truth to say that the country has become corrupted and demoralized by the folly and recklessness with which national and state affairs have often been managed? Fraud is reduced to a system. Legislation is employed to the advantage of speculators. Official information is made use of to dabble in the funds. Large class interests, partisan schemes, and political projects depend upon a profuse expenditure for their success. Place-holders and place-seekers must be provided for. It is difficult to prosecute the work of economy and retrenchment under the order of things. Until circumstances change we can look to no better plan for preserving the nation from bankruptcy than by the inauguration of measures that shall stimulate production and industry, and by the army of idlers, plunderers, and beggars to turn their attention to the farm, the work-bench, and the counting-room. Then only could be made to apply the annual income of the country would at least remain equal to the expenditure.

ASSASSINATION.

A CAUSE must be very strong to retain public sympathy through all the cruel crimes of its supporters. Our own Revolution was, upon one side at least, as honorable a war as was ever waged, and the fame of the brilliant BURGOYNE is forever tarnished by his employment of savage allies. That in the midst of the battle and bloodshed of seven years the murder of one young woman like JANE M'CREA should be separately and sadly remembered, is an illustration of the general observance of what must be called a rules of civilized warfare that distinguished the long struggle.

But the Irish movement for reform seems sure to lose sympathy and respect by the cowardly crimes of its leaders. Some men are now being tried in London for attempting to blow down a prison wall by powder; an attempt that necessarily frightfully imperiled the lives of hundreds of innocent persons. Just as this begins MR. THOMAS DARCY M'GEE is stealthily shot at his own door, in Canada, at the dead of night; and just before, FENCE ARCHER is shot in the back at Sydney, in Australia. All these crimes were committed by people calling themselves Fenians; and at one time it seemed as if a system of petty terror was to begin throughout England.

The manner of these crimes is observable. Two of them are assassinations. This is the very kind of offence which most deeply stirs the indignation of every man who, whatever the provocation, demands fair play, and they are the great majority of mankind. The dagger of the assassin usually stabs his own cause to the heart; and no assassin in history ever truly helped his friends. The blackest spot in the story of PERCIVAL HALL is that he had a name measured by the mischief he did—as ever lived, was his employment of assassins to remove his most illustrious enemies. The worst charge against Jefferson DAVIS is that he had knowledge of plots of assassination without denouncing them, and that he tolerated the Andersonville pen and the murder of DAHLGREN. The murder of Rossi in Rome has always darkened the cause of the Italian Liberals. It is not indeed just to hold a cause accountable for the offenses of all who profess to espouse it; but where there is a uniformity in the character of the offense the result is inevitable. The Irish method has always been the worst method. It is a secret conspiracy—a Whiteboyism. The Irish oppression by England has indeed been horrible, but so has the revenge.

In this country we have hitherto been remarkably free from any serious attempt even at this abominable crime of assassination. One great tragedy of the kind will forever sadden our history; but it is not a crime of the pondering race. Some Southern paper remarks that the epoch of assassination which usually follows a civil war has not yet begun. No, nor will it begin. The Southern paper, which probably did not deeply lament the murder of President LINCOLN, may be very sure that that event cannot fail to recur to mind in the form of a gush of generous feeling to the reflection that the consequences of the demonstration wrought by Shoddy will probably be painfully evident; and it may also assure itself that every Ku-Klux Klan Society is the most effective GRANT Club that can be established in the Southern States.

The best service that any Southern editor or political leader can do his friends is to exhort them to attempt openly whatever they attempt, and to warn them that secret assassination or open massacre is the policy which will longest delay their restoration to the sympathy of the Union, and most surely protract their own suffering. The massacre at New Orleans, the recent murder of ASHBUN, reveal a spirit and state of society which it is of the utmost importance that every honest citizen of the country should understand. In the same way it would be very judicious for the American leaders of Fenianism to teach their followers that every assassin's shot fired in their cause wounds Ireland, and nothing else.

THE ERIE RAILWAY TRAGEDY.

WE should feel very guilty if we suffered so fearful a tragedy as the late accident upon the Erie Railway to be merely a nine-days' wonder. It is because such massacres are permitted to be so soon forgotten that they so constantly occur. Last week we referred to the report of the Superintendent of the Road, which stated in the strongest terms, long before the accident, the perilously unsafe condition of the road. We now understand that this startling exposition was published by a portion of the Board of Jurors, a proceeding which amounted to an invitation from the Directors to the public to use their road rather than that of its chief competitor, the New York Central. Although these measures have been subjected to the criticism that they were promulgated with a view to affect the pending controversy between the managers of these rival lines; yet it appears from the evidence of the coroner's jury that the accident which occurred near Port Jervis was occasioned by a broken rail, and, if this is to be believed, it will be accepted as some confirmation of what the Engineer of the Road alleged, and as showing that the reduction of fare was imprudent, as likely to result in overloading a train of an unsafe road. Those passengers who have gone to their last home no doubt felt as those who now linger in the agonies of death probably feel, that their misfortune was due to the great imprudence of the management in attempting to increase the amount of travel when the opposite policy should have been pursued. This circumstance will doubtless be taken into view by juries in estimating damages, who will thus express the condemnation which the community can only feel.

It is much to be deplored that this great artery of travel has reached this condition. The public not only need the advantage of a competing line with that of the New York Central in high order, but also that it shall be managed and maintained at all times as a competing line. The two roads are not necessarily by one interest, the city of New York, which requires to have the rates of transportation established on a reasonable basis, and that the connection with the interior—which constitutes the foundation of its prosperity—would be controlled by a single board of railroad managers, if not by competition, is a condition of affairs sure to become intolerable.

The report of the coroner's jury presents the naked statement of an offence of the company that the public are accustomed by a broken rail; but there appears to have been no cross-examination of the witnesses, and the official presents but one side of a very embarrassing transaction. If there were a Legislature, governed by proper motives, the character of this report would animate them to give to these investigations the scope necessary for presenting to the public a perfectly clear understanding of the causes of accident, so as to guard against them in future. But until the last year of the Angola disaster nor in this can any certain judgment be formed as to the particular means by which a terrible disaster was occasioned. The Company is the only one with a powerful motive to shield itself from censure and from heavy verdicts; while, on the other side, the motive is far weaker that will induce a jury to represent the public. The power of a great corporation overshadows every other interest throughout the thinly-populated region traversed by its line, and enables it to control public details who practice on the example which our corrupt legislation presents. It is not at all improbable that the damaging influence of this road will secure all that it can affect all the local institutions of the State. It is fast becoming true that the assemblage of ROMAN HOOD and his followers in their new and shoddy coats will have been regarded with more solicitude by the objects of their violence than is the summer meeting of our Legislature by the honest people of the State.

From the statements of a passenger we learn one fact of importance, which confirms views on the subject of which the importance of ours which need to be carefully considered. It is stated that the car, in its descent to the river, became an utter wreck, and that its sides fell open and lay adjoining the track, while the bottom and roof thrown across the three pieces. This car was ventilated on the new plan, with windows in the roof, intended to secure a free passage of egress, which for its appearance is so much admired. We lately stated that cars of this fashion could not stand a severe shock, inasmuch as the roof timbers do not reach from one side to the other, and thus form a strong frame; but these timbers and at such side of the large lodge opening, where the passengers, which is left for purposes of light and ventilation. It is not difficult to build a car solidly, the roof timbers carried across, and framed and bolted so as to offer no chance to their upward roll over without instantly separating. But the car as now generally built is a shell, and can afford no means of safety in case of a severe shock. This method of building cars will undoubtedly be dispensed with, but not until many more lives have been sacrificed.

The Erie Railway road has lately carried this folly to an unusual extreme by adding about ten feet to the length of their cars, and by making a corresponding increase of the length of that portion of the roof which is devoted to ventilation and light. We stated some time ago that, in case of a severe accident, the upper part of the roof, fastened only by weak stanchions to that below, would fall in and complicate the disaster. This was the case at Port Jervis. How many passengers were injured by this means does not appear; but such a structure is no manifestly imperfect that Juries, in the absence of legislation to prevent the building of weak and dangerous cars, must award damages with a view to force Companies into their construction on a plan calculated to furnish all practicable safety in case of a serious accident. A well framed and bolted car, the bottom, sides, and top securely fastened together, may be strong as well as properly ventilated, whereas ventilation is provided for by the present method. As cars are now built, when an accident occurs, sides, roof, seats, stoves, and passengers are blindly thrown together in one common destruction.

If, however, Juries will perform their duties firmly, some amends for defective legislation may be made, and it will be afforded some degree of protection. But Juries will fail also, if the Press does not steadily expose to public condemnation those who accept the immense responsibility of thousands of human lives without the least thought or care of any thing beyond a successful financial speculation.

ABYSSINIA AND PARAGUAY.

OF the two wars which have recently engaged public attention, that in Abyssinia is apparently ended by the overwhelming victory of the British army and the death of KING THEODORUS; while that in Paraguay is brought near its end by the fall of the Paraguayan fortress of Humaita. As Abyssinian war was undertaken for the release of some captives held by the King of the country, and it has been entirely successful, the captives have been released by a single blow, and the army has only to march triumphantly homeward. The result is, of course, an occasion of pride to every Englishman, but will feel even more concerned than before that there is no corner of the earth so remote that the protection of his Government is not sure; and it will shed a glory upon the beginning of the administration of DISRAELI, which, we think, will require all the glory it can secure from external circumstances.

If in Paraguay the fall of Humaita leads to the freedom of the River Plate, and to the overthrow of LOPEZ, the war will have been worth while, and civilization will be the gainer. Lopez is a bandit-chief in point, who rushes out upon the river by which his territory is situated, and seizes, plunders, and imprisons honest travelers. As many years ago the American steamer Water Witch was fired upon by his predecessor, and we believe father, of the same name, and several of the ship's company were killed and wounded. The people of Paraguay are the slaves of LOPEZ, who is the only great trader in the country, and who might be left to himself, like any other barbarian, if he did not molest innocent people. Paraguay is sometimes called a republic, and attempts have been made to excite sympathy for it against the empire of BRAZIL. But the same kind of republic that NAPOLEON'S camp was. We hope sincerely that the Allies will prevail; that LOPEZ will be banished, like ROSAS, or effectually suffered to end their days where they be securely and finally opened to civilization.

RIGHTS OF AMERICAN CITIZENS ABROAD.

MR. BANCROFT has written to Mr. SEWARD to prove the correctness of his own interpretation of the law given by the assent of MR. KÖNIG, the plenipotentiary who signed the treaty upon the part of Germany. EX-Consul MORAN, of Bremen, well known to European mercantile circles, and long a resident of the United States, reported the treaty to the DIET with his full approval. MR. SCHLEINITZ, Minister resident for the United States, also supported it. Other eminent members of the DIET approved it, and finally Count BISMARCK upon good reasons, and that there might be no misunderstanding, said:

"The literal observation of the treaty includes in itself that those whom we are bound to acknowledge as American citizens can not be held to military duty in North Germany. That is the main purpose of the treaty. Whosoever, however, bona fide, with the purpose of residing permanently in America, shall meet no obstacle on our part to his becoming an American citizen, and he bona fides will be assumed when he shall have passed over ten years' absence in America, when connected with naturalization, as a fulfillment of the duties due by the North German Confederacy. . . . The German-American citizen, on returning his relations as a citizen of North Germany, would, under the treaty, stand in the light of a foreigner emigrating into North Germany; that he could not be held to the discharge of any old military duty, but only to such 'new military duty as would attach to every foreigner entering into North Germany and becoming naturalized there.'"

When the question was put upon the adoption of the treaty the whole DIET, with the exception of a few Poles, who—as it seemed to MR. BANCROFT, merely declined voting—rose to their feet with alacrity. There can be no further question of the true meaning of the treaty.

TRUE NEWSPAPER COURTESY.

THE New York World recently undertook to read the New York Tribune a lecture upon civility in Journalism. As an illustration of what the World's idea of civility is we quote the following from its Washington correspondence:

"So execrable a shape as that of BUTLER during this delivery surely never contorted itself before a respectable assemblage, cushioned in the dreadful hollow of his bulkhead, and making a foot-stool of his protruding eye-ball, the imp of insolence could fairly be seen to sit. Ugly elves appeared to perch astride his nose and dangle from the flabby ears. His hair was populous with phantoms of hideous creeping things. A bad odor must have exhaled from him—the odor of loathsome hates, meannesses, and spites."

Three years ago, when ANDREW JOHNSON succeeded MR. LINCOLN, the same New York World, with the same spirit engaged in the civility in Journalism, spoke of him as "the person who defiled our chief council chamber with the spewings of a drunken boor;" "this insolent drunken brute in conjunction with whom even CALIGULA'S horse was respectable;" "this insolent, clownish drunkard." "Betrayed by his own beastly appetites and his feverish mind," "Nothing better is to be expected of him. These are the habits of his lifetime." "It is ridiculous to suppose that he ever had any political principles." "The last drunken fool."

It is pleasant to know that the World is as devoted as ever to the grave cause of newspaper courtesy.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

IMPEACHMENT.

THE proceedings in the trial of the Impeachment have been confused since our last to the delivery of the opinion of the Court by the Hon. Chief Justice. MR. BUTLER, on the part of the Managers, began his argument on April 16, occupying it until the middle of the session on April 24. MR. NELSON, of the President's counsel, followed, and on April 28 MR. Groesbeck for the same side delivered a brief but able argument. On April 29 the President's counsel, MR. Stevens attempted to read his speech on April 30 but his voice failing him, MR. CURTIS concluded it for him. He was followed by MR. WILLIAMS.

MR. WILLIAM B. ASTOR,

OF NEW YORK.

JOHN JACOB ASTOR, commencing commercial life in New York in 1784 as porter to ROBERT BROWNE, furrier, at the weekly wages of $2 and his board, died in 1848 worth more than $20,000,000. About $2,000,000 of this he bequeathed to various grandchildren and others, to the Astor Library, the German Society of New York, and to the "Astor House" established in his native town in Germany; the remainder fell to his eldest son, the present head of the family, and the one of whom we herewith present an accurate portrait. He had previously received a large bequest from his uncle HENRY, the butcher; and this added to the $18,000,000 left him by his father gave him a fair start in life. He has since increased his wealth, or rather it has increased itself, to at least double what it was in 1848, and it is even said that he is worth at this time $80,000,000. He has never engaged in any trade or speculation; but has confined his operations to the purchase of real estate and the collection of his rent-roll.

There is probably less known of WILLIAM B. ASTOR than of any other prominent or wealthy man in this or any other country. His wealth and his age are alike indefinite; he keeps the amount of his rent-rolls and the number of his years to himself; and no record is to be found of either. He may be seventy-four, as his father married SARAH TODD in 1790; but in appearance he is not more than sixty-five. The events of his life have been few. What little there is known of his actions is to his great credit. The first acts of his life, after coming into possession of his property, was to increase the Astor Library fund, the HALLECK annuity, and other bequests of his father; and he has aided many other commendable charities in an unostentatious way. His habits are quiet and secluded. He has an office in Prince Street, near Broadway—one of the smallest houses in New York, and which looks more like the fire-proof vault of a great bank than the business office of the richest man in America. He is to be seen occasionally at this office, and on his way to and from it walking in Broadway. He seldom rides. He prefers to walk less from economical motives than a desire to preserve his health by exercise; and it is notable that in all his business transactions he is controlled by a wise and yet liberal economy, as in his social habits he is guided by a sensible regard to the laws of hygiene. As his economy has resulted in preserving and increasing his wealth, his quiet habits and constant exercise have combined to make him one of the healthiest and strongest men of his age in the country. His economical turn of mind, inherited from his father, has not, however, prevented him from being a very liberal man; but the world hears but little of his charities, though, with his thousand and one tenants, Mr. ASTOR bears the reputation of being "a good landlord," which is not a bad recommendation in this crowded city of hard-hearted landlords and complaining tenants. And his love of seclusion has not prevented him from being a pleasant but quiet companion to his troops of friends and admirers.

PRAIRIE PLOWING.

WE remember years ago, when Illinois was a new State and its prairie lands were being sold at a bargain to induce emigration, hearing a practical farmer, who had been reading a description of the country, remark, "Why, that aren't no stumps to plow around!" The generally prevailing impression in regard to prairie country is not unlike that of the old farmer; and it is believed by many emigrants to the West that farming on the prairies of the West is easy labor. The soil is undoubtedly rich, but it is no light labor to turn it. Such has been the experience at least of the multitudes of farmers who have followed the Pacific Railroad, and who are engaged in breaking land along that route. Our artist has given us a sketch of a farmer breaking soil for the first time on a Kansas prairie. The heavy sub-soil plows require three and four yoke of oxen to drag them through the tough, solid soil; and our illustration fully represents the difficulties of prairie plowing.

PLOWING ON THE PRAIRIES BEYOND THE MISSISSIPPI.—[SKETCHED BY THEODORE R. DAVIS.]

STORM ON THE SEA.

SADLY the winds are moaning, wailing,
Calling over the sea:
Asketh my spirit, weak and failing,
Are they making their moans for me?

The children are digging graves in the sand,
Along the edge of the sea:
Little heed they or understand—
Are they digging a grave for me?

Twixt heaven and earth an angel flieth,
Wide-winged, over the sea;
And my trembling heart within me crieth,
Brings he a message for me?

Homeward the laden ships are hasting,
Hasting over the sea,
Afar the gleam of their white sails casting:
Is there a haven for me?

Heavily gathers the black storm-cloud,
Lowering over the sea,
And winds are shrieking in mast and shroud:
It is night, dark night, with me.

Here is life after death, and peace out of pain,
Calm after storm on the sea,
Clear is the shining after the rain:
The morning breaks for me.

THE MOONSTONE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

Author of "The Woman in White," "No Name," etc.

Printed from the Author's Manuscript.

RICHLY ILLUSTRATED.

CHAPTER VII.—(Continued.)

"I HAVE lost a beautiful girl, an excellent social position, and a handsome income," Mr. Godfrey began; "and I have submitted to it without a struggle. What can be the motive for such extraordinary conduct as that? My precious friend, there is no motive."

"No motive?" I repeated.

"Let me appeal, dear Miss Clack, to your experience of children," he went on. "A child pursues a certain course of conduct. You are greatly struck by it, and you attempt to get at the motive. The dear little thing is incapable of telling you its motive. You might as well ask the grass why it grows, or the birds why they sing. Well! in this matter I am like the dear little thing—like the grass—like the birds. I don't know why I made a proposal of marriage to Miss Verinder. I don't know why I have shamefully neglected my dear Ladies. I don't know why I have apostatized from the Mothers'-Small-Clothes. You say to the child, Why have you been naughty? And the little angel puts its finger into its mouth, and doesn't know. My case exactly, Miss Clack! I couldn't confess it to any body else. I feel impelled to confess it to you!"

I began to recover myself. A mental problem was involved here. I am deeply interested in mental problems—and I am not, it is thought, without some skill in solving them.

"Best of friends, exert your intellect and help me," he continued. "Tell me—why does a time come when these matrimonial proceedings of mine begin to look like something done in a dream? Why does it suddenly occur to me that my true happiness is in helping my dear Ladies, in going my modest round of useful work, in saying my few earnest words when called on to my Chairman? What do I want with a position? I have got a position. What do I want with an income? I can pay for my bread and cheese, and my nice little lodging, and my two coats a year. What do I want with Miss Verinder? She has told me with her own lips (this dear lady, is between ourselves) that she loves another man, and that her only idea in marrying me is to try and put that other man out of her head. What a horrid union is this! Oh, dear me, what a horrid union is this! Such are my reflections, Miss Clack, on my way to Brighton! I approach Rachel with the feeling of a criminal who is going to receive his sentence. And I find her all that is changed her mind too—when I hear her propose to break the engagement—I experience (there is no sort of doubt about it) a most overpowering sense of relief. A month ago I was pressing her rapturously to my bosom. An hour ago the happiness of releasing that I shall never press her again intoxicates me like strong liquor. The thing seems impossible—the thing can't be. And yet there are the facts, as I had the honor of stating them when we first sat down together in these two chairs. I have lost a beautiful girl, an excellent social position, and a handsome income; and I have submitted to it without a struggle. Can you account for it, dear friend? It is quite beyond me."

His magnificent head sank on his breast, and he gave up his own mental problem in despair.

I was shocked—touched. The case (if I may speak as a spiritual physician) was now quite plain to me. It is no uncommon event, in the experience of us all, to see the possessors of exalted ability occasionally humbled to the level of the most poorly-gifted people about them. The object, no doubt, in the wise economy of Providence, is to remind greatness that it is mortal, and that the power which has conferred it can also take it away. It was now—to my mind—easy to discern one of these salutary humiliations in the deplorable proceedings on dear Mr. Godfrey's part, of which I had been the unseen witness. And it was equally easy to recognize the welcome reappearance of his own finer nature in the horror with which he recoiled from the idea of a marriage with Rachel, and in the charming eagerness which he showed to return to his Ladies and his Poor.

I put this view before him in a few simple and sisterly words. His joy was beautiful to see. He conquered himself, as I went on, to a lost man emerging from the darkness into the light. When I answered for a loving reception of him at the Mothers'-Small-Clothes, the grateful heart of our Christian Hero overflowed. He pressed my hands alternately to his lips. Overwhelmed by the exquisite triumph of having got him back among us, I let him do what he liked with my hands. I closed my eyes. I felt my head, in an ecstasy of spiritual self-forgetfulness, sinking on his shoulder. In a moment more I should certainly have swooned away in his arms, but for an interruption from the outer world, which brought me to myself again. A horrid rattling of knives and forks sounded outside the door, and the footman came in to lay the table for luncheon.

Mr. Godfrey started up, and looked at the clock on the mantle-piece.

"How time flies with you!" he exclaimed. "I shall barely catch the train."

"AND THAT WRETCH STANDS THERE AND TRIES TO MAKE ME DOUBT THAT MY MOTHER, WHO WAS AN ANGEL ON EARTH, IS AN ANGEL IN HEAVEN NOW!"

I ventured on asking why he was in such a hurry to get back to town. His answer reminded me of family difficulties that were still to be reconciled, and of family disagreements that were yet to come.

"I have heard from my father," he said. "Business obliges him to leave Framfield for London to-day, and he proposes coming on here either this evening or to-morrow. I must tell him what has happened between Rachel and me. His heart is set on our marriage—there will be great difficulty, I fear, in reconciling him to the breaking-off of the engagement. I must stop him, for all our sakes, from coming here till he is reconciled. Best and dearest of friends, we shall meet again!"

With those words he hurried out. In equal haste on my side, I ran up stairs to compose myself in my own room before meeting Aunt Ablewhite and Rachel at the luncheon-table.

I am well aware—to dwell for a moment yet on the subject of Mr. Godfrey—that the all-pervading opinion of the outer world has charged him with having his own private reasons for releasing Rachel from her engagement, at the first opportunity she gave him. It has also reached my ears that his anxiety to recover his place in my estimation has been attributed, in certain quarters, to a mercenary eagerness to make his peace (through me) with a venerable committee-woman at the Mothers'-Small-Clothes, abundantly blessed with the goods of this world, and a beloved and intimate friend of my own. I only notice these odious slanders for the sake of declaring that they never had a moment's influence on my mind. In obedience to my instructions, I have exhibited the fluctuations in my opinion of our Christian Hero exactly as I find them recorded in my diary. In justice to myself let me here add, that, once established in his place in my estimation, my gifted friend never lost that place again. I write with the tears in my eyes, burning to say more. But no—I am cruelly limited to my actual experience of persons and things. In less than a month from the time of which I am now writing events in the money-market (which diminished even my miserable little income) forced me into foreign exile, and left me with nothing but a loving remembrance of Mr. Godfrey which the slander of the world had assailed, and assailed in vain.

Let me dry my eyes, and return to my narrative.

I went down stairs to luncheon, naturally anxious to see how Rachel was affected by her release from her marriage engagement.

It appeared to me—but I on all a poor authority in such matters—that the recovery of her freedom had set her thinking again of that other man whom she loved, and that she was furious with herself for not being able to control a revulsion of feeling of which she was secretly ashamed. Who was the man? I had my suspicions—but it was needless to waste time in idle speculation. When I had converted her, she would, as a matter of course, have no secrets from me. I should hear all about the man: I should hear all about the Moonstone. If I had had no higher object in stirring her up to a sense of spiritual things, the motive of relieving her mind of its guilty secrets would have been enough of itself to encourage me to go on.

Aunt Ablewhite took her exercise in the afternoon in an invalid chair. Rachel accompanied me. "I will not drag the chair," she broke out, recklessly. "I wish I could fatigue myself till I was ready to drop!"

She was in the same humor in the evening. I discovered in one of my friend's precious publications—The Life, Letters, and Labors of Miss Jane Ann Stamper, forty-fifth edition—passages which bore with a marvelous appropriateness on Rachel's present position. Upon my proposing to read them she went to the piano. Conceive how little she must have known of serious people, if she supposed that my patience was to be exhausted in that way! I kept Miss Jane Ann Stamper by me, and waited for events with the most unflattering trust in the future.

Old Mr. Ablewhite never made his appearance that night. But I knew the importance which his worldly greed attached to his son's marriage with Miss Verinder—and I felt a positive conviction (do what Mr. Godfrey might to prevent it) that we should see him the next day. With his interference in the matter, the storm on which I had counted would certainly come, and the salutary exhaustion of Rachel's resisting powers would as certainly follow. I am not ignorant that old Mr. Ablewhite has the reputation generally (especially among his inferiors) of being a remarkably good-natured man. According to my observation of him, he deserves his reputation as long as he has his own way, and not a moment longer.

The next day, exactly as I had foreseen, Aunt Ablewhite was so near to being astonished as her nature would permit, at the unbidden appearance of her husband. He had barely been a minute in the house before he was followed, to my astonishment this time, by an unexpected complication in the shape of Mr. Bruff.

I never remember feeling the presence of the lawyer to be more unwelcome than I felt it at that moment. He looked ready for any thing in the way of an obstructive proceeding—capable even of keeping the peace, with Rachel for one of the combatants!

"This is a pleasant surprise, Sir," said Mr. Ablewhite, addressing himself with his deceptive cordiality to Mr. Bruff. "When I left your office yesterday I didn't expect to have the honor of seeing you at Brighton to-day."

"I turned over our conversation in my mind, after you had gone," replied Mr. Bruff. "And it occurred to me that I might perhaps be of some use on this occasion. I was just in time to catch the train, and I had no opportunity of discovering the carriage in which you were traveling."

Having given that explanation he seated himself by Rachel. I retired modestly to a corner —with Miss Jane Ann Stamper on my lap in case of emergency. My aunt sat at the window, placidly fanning herself as usual. Mr. Ablewhite stood up in the middle of the room, with his bald head much pinker than I had ever seen it yet, and addressed himself in the most affectionate manner to his niece.

"Rachel, my dear," he said, "I have heard some very extraordinary news from Godfrey. And I am here to inquire about it. You have a strong room of your own in this house. Will you honor me by showing me the way to it?"

Rachel never moved. Whether she was determined to bring matters to a crisis, or whether she was prompted by some private sign from Mr. Bruff, is more than I can tell. She declined doing old Mr. Ablewhite the honor of conducting him to her sitting-room.

"Whatever you wish to say to me," she answered, "can be said here—in the presence of my relatives, and in the presence" (she looked at Mr. Bruff) "of my mother's trusted old friend."

"Just as you please, my dear," said the amiable Mr. Ablewhite. He took a chair. The rest of them looked at his face—as if they expected it, after seventy years of worldly training, to speak the truth. I looked at the top of his bald head; having noticed, on other occasions, that the temper which was really in him had a habit of registering itself there.

"Some weeks ago," pursued the old gentleman, "my son informed me that Miss Verinder had done him the honor to engage herself to marry him. Is it possible, Rachel, that he can have misinterpreted—or presumed upon—what you really said to him?"

"Certainly not," she replied. "I did engage myself to marry him."

"Very frankly answered!" said Mr. Ablewhite. "And most satisfactory, my dear, so far. In respect to what happened some weeks since, Godfrey has made no mistake. The error is evidently in what he told me yesterday. I begin to see it now. You and he have had a lovers' quarrel—and my foolish son has interpreted it seriously. Ah! I should have known better than that, at his age."

The fallen nature in Rachel—the mother Eve, so to speak—began to chafe at this.

"Pray let us understand each other, Mr. Ablewhite," she said. "Nothing in the least like a quarrel took place yesterday between your son and me. If he told you that I proposed breaking off our marriage engagement, and that he agreed on his side—he told you the truth."

The self-registering thermometer at the top of Mr. Ablewhite's bald head began to indicate a rise of temper. His face was more amiable than ever—but there was the pink at the top of his face, a shade deeper already.

"Come, come, my dear," he said, in his most soothing manner, "now don't be angry, and don't be hard on poor Godfrey! He has evidently said something offensive to you. He was always wrong from a child—but he means well, Rachel, he means well!"

Mr. Ablewhite, I have either expressed myself very badly, or you are purposely mistaking me. Once for all, it is a settled thing between you and myself that we shall remain, for the rest of our lives, cousins and nothing more. Is that plain enough?"

The tone in which she said those words made it impossible, even for old Mr. Ablewhite, to mistake her any longer. His thermometer went up perceptibly—and his voice, when he next spoke, ceased to be the voice which is appropriate to a notoriously good-natured man.

"I am to understand, then," he said, "that your marriage engagement is broken off?"

"You are to understand that, Mr. Ablewhite, if you please."

"I am also to take it as a matter of fact that the proposal to withdraw from the engagement came, in the first instance, from you?"

"It came, in the first instance, from me. And it met, as I have told you, with your son's consent and approval."

The thermometer went up to the top of the register. I mean, the pink changed suddenly to scarlet.

"My son is a mean-spirited hound!" cried this furious old worldling. "In justice to myself as his father—not in justice to him—I beg to ask you, Miss Verinder, what complaint you have to make of Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite?"

Here Mr. Bruff interfered for the first time.

"You are not bound to answer that question," he said to Rachel.

Old Mr. Ablewhite fastened on him instantly.

"Don't forget, Sir," he said, "that you are a self-invited guest here. Your interference would have come with a better grace if you had waited until it was asked for."

Mr. Bruff took no notice. The smooth varnish on his wicked old face never cracked. Rachel thanked him for the advice he had given to her, and then turned to old Mr. Ablewhite—preserving her composure in a manner which (having regard to her age and her sex) was simply awful to see.

"Your son put the same question to me which you have just asked," she said. "I had only one answer for him, and I have only one answer for you. I proposed that we should release each other, because reflection had convinced me that I should best consult his welfare and mine by retracting a rash promise, and leaving him free to make his choice elsewhere."

"What has my son done?" persisted Mr. Ablewhite. "I have a right to know that. What has my son done?"

She persisted just as obstinately on her side.

"You have had the only explanation which I think it necessary to give to you, or to him," she answered.

"In plain English, it's your sovereign will and pleasure, Miss Verinder, to jilt my son?"

Rachel was silent for a moment. Sitting close behind her, I heard her sigh. Mr. Bruff took her hand, and gave it a little squeeze. She recovered herself, and answered Mr. Ablewhite as boldly as ever.

"I have exposed myself to worse misconstruction than that," she said. "And I have borne it patiently. The time has gone by when you could mortify me by calling me a jilt."

She spoke with a bitterness of tone which satisfied me that the scandal of the Moonstone had been in some way recalled to her mind. "I have no more to say," she added, wearily, not addressing the words to any one in particular, and looking away from us all, out of the window that was nearest to her.

Mr. Ablewhite got upon his feet, and pushed away his chair so violently that it toppled over and fell on the floor.

"I have something more to say on my side," he announced, bringing down the flat of his hand on the table with a bang. "I have to say that if my son doesn't feel this insult I do!"

Rachel started, and looked at him in sudden surprise.

"Insult?" she repeated. "What do you mean?"

"Insult!" reiterated Mr. Ablewhite. "I know your motive, Miss Verinder, for breaking your promise to my son! I know it as certainly as if you had confessed it in so many words. Your cursed family pride is insulting Godfrey, as it insulted me when I married your aunt. Her family—her beggarly family—turned their backs on her for marrying an honest man, who had made his own place and won his own fortune. I had no ancestors. I wasn't descended from a set of cut-throat scoundrels who lived by robbery and murder. I couldn't point to the time when the Ablewhites hadn't a shirt to their backs, and couldn't sign their own names. Ha! ha! I wasn't good enough for the Herncastles, when I married. And, now it comes to the pinch, my son isn't good enough for you. I suspected it all along. You have got the Herncastle blood in you, my young lady! I suspected it all along."

"A very unworthy suspicion," remarked Mr. Bruff. "I am astonished that you have the courage to acknowledge it."

Before Mr. Ablewhite could find words to answer, Rachel spoke in the tone of the most exasperating contempt.

"Surely," she said to the lawyer, "this is beneath notice. If he can think in that way, let us leave him to think as he pleases."

From scarlet Mr. Ablewhite was now becoming purple. He gasped for breath; he looked backward and forward from Rachel to Mr. Bruff in such a frenzy of rage with both of them that he didn't know which to attack first. His wife, who had sat impenetrably fanning herself up to this time, began to be alarmed, and attempted, quite uselessly, to quiet him. I had, throughout this distressing interview, felt more than one inward call to interfere with a few earnest words, and had controlled myself under a dread of the possible results, very unworthy of a Christian Englishwoman who looks, not to what is meanly prudent, but to what is morally right. At the point at which matters had now arrived I rose superior to all considerations of mere expediency. If I had contemplated interposing any remonstrance of my own humble devising, I might possibly still have hesitated. But the distressing domestic emergency which now confronted me was most marvelously and beautifully provided for in the Correspondence of Miss Jane Ann Stamper—Letter one thousand and one, on "Peace in Families." I rose in my modest corner, and I opened my precious book.

"Dear Mr. Ablewhite," I said, "one word!"

When I first attracted the attention of the company by rising, I could see that he was on the point of saying something rude to me. My sisterly form of address checked him. He stared in heathen astonishment.

"As an affectionate well-wisher and friend," I proceeded, "and as one long accustomed to arouse, convince, prepare, enlighten, and fortify others, permit me to take the most pardonable of all liberties—the liberty of composing your mind."

He began to recover himself; he was on the point of breaking out—he would have broken out, with any body else. But my voice (habitually gentle) possesses a high note or so, in emergencies. In this emergency I felt imperatively called upon to have the highest voice of the two.

I held up my precious book before him; I rapped the open page impressively with my forefinger. "Not my words!" I exclaimed, in a burst of fervent interruption. "Oh, don't suppose that I claim attention for My humble words! Manna in the wilderness, Mr. Ablewhite! Dew on the parched earth! Words of comfort, words of wisdom, words of love—the blessed, blessed, blessed words of Miss Jane Ann Stamper!"

I was stopped there by a momentary impediment of the breath. Before I could recover myself, this monster in human form shouted out furiously:

"Miss Jane Ann Stamper be ——!"

It is impossible for me to write the awful word which is here represented by a blank. I shrieked as it passed his lips; I flew to my little bag on the side-table; I shook out all my tracts; I seized the one particular tract on profane swearing, entitled, "Hush for Heaven's Sake!" I handed it to him with an expression of agonized entreaty. He tore it in two, and threw it back at me across the table. The rest of them rose in alarm, not knowing what might happen next. I instantly sat down again in my corner. There had once been an occasion, under somewhat similar circumstances, when Miss Jane Ann Stamper had been taken by the two shoulders and turned out of a room. I waited, inspired by her spirit, for a repetition of her martyrdom.

But no—it was not to be. His wife was the next person whom he addressed. "Who—who—who," he said, stammering with rage, "asked this impudent fanatic into the house? Did you?"

Before Aunt Ablewhite could say a word, Rachel answered for her:

"Miss Clack is here," she said, "as my guest."

Those words had a singular effect on Mr. Ablewhite. They suddenly changed him from a man in a state of red-hot anger to a man in a state of icy-cold contempt. It was plain to every body that Rachel had said something—short and plain as her answer had been—which gave him the upper hand of her at last.

"Oh!" he said. "Miss Clack is here as your guest—in my house?"

It was Rachel's turn to lose her temper at that. Her color rose, and her eyes brightened fiercely. She turned to the lawyer, and, pointing at Mr. Ablewhite, asked, haughtily, "What does he mean?"

Mr. Bruff interfered for the third time.

"You appear to forget," he said, addressing Mr. Ablewhite, "that you took this house as Miss Verinder's guardian, for Miss Verinder's use."

"Not quite so fast," interposed Mr. Ablewhite. "I have a last word to say, which I should have said some time since, if this—" He looked my way, pondering what abominable name he should call me—"if this Rampant Spinster had not interrupted us. I beg to inform you, Sir, that, if my son is not good enough to be Miss Verinder's husband, I can not presume to consider his father good enough to be Miss Verinder's guardian. Understand, if you please, that I refuse to accept the position which is offered to me by Lady Verinder's will. In your legal phrase, I decline to act. This house has necessarily been hired in my name. I take the entire responsibility of it on my shoulders. It is my house. I can keep it, or let it, just as I please. I have no wish to hurry Miss Verinder. On the contrary, I beg her to remove her guest and her luggage, at her own entire convenience." He made a low bow, and walked out of the room.

That was Mr. Ablewhite's revenge on Rachel for refusing to marry his son!

The instant the door closed Aunt Ablewhite exhibited a phenomenon which silenced us all. She became endowed with energy enough to cross the room!

"My dear," she said, taking Rachel by the hand, "I should be ashamed of my husband, if I didn't know that it is his temper which has spoken to you, and not himself. You," continued Aunt Ablewhite, turning on me in my corner with another endowment of energy, in her looks this time instead of her limbs—"you are the mischievous person who irritated him. I hope I shall never see you or your tracts again." She went back to Rachel, and kissed her. "I beg your pardon, my dear," she said, "in my husband's name. What can I do for you?"

Consistently perverse in every thing—capricious and unreasonable in all the actions of her life—Rachel melted into tears at those commonplace words, and returned her aunt's kiss in silence.

"If I may be permitted to answer for Miss Verinder," said Mr. Bruff, "might I ask you, Mrs. Ablewhite, to send Penelope down with her mistress's bonnet and shawl. Leave us ten minutes together," he added, in a lower tone, "and you may rely on my setting matters right, to your satisfaction as well as to Rachel's."

The trust of the family in this man was something wonderful to see. Without a word more, on her side, Aunt Ablewhite left the room.

"Ah!" said Mr. Bruff, looking after her. "The Herncastle blood has its drawbacks, I admit. But there is something in good-breeding, after all!"

Having made that purely worldly remark, he looked hard at my corner, as if he expected me to go. My interest in Rachel—an infinitely higher interest than his—riveted me to my chair.

Mr. Bruff gave it up, exactly as he had given it up at Aunt Verinder's, in Montagu Square. He led Rachel to a chair by the window, and spoke to her there.

"My dear young lady," he said, "Mr. Ablewhite's conduct has naturally shocked you, and taken you by surprise. If it was worth while to contest the question with such a man, we might soon show him that he is not to have things all his own way. But it isn't worth while. You were quite right in what you said just now; he is beneath our notice."

He stopped, and looked round at my corner. I sat there quite immovable, with my tracts at my elbow, and with Miss Jane Ann Stamper on my lap.

"You know," he resumed, turning back again to Rachel, "that it was part of your poor mother's fine nature always to see the best of the people about her, and never the worst. She named her brother-in-law your guardian because she believed in him, and because she thought it would please her sister. I had never liked Mr. Ablewhite myself, and I induced your mother to let me insert a clause in the will, empowering her executors, in certain events, to consult with me about the appointment of a new guardian. One of those events has happened to-day; and I find myself in a position to end all these dry business details, I hope agreeably, with a message from my wife. Will you honor Mrs. Bruff by becoming her guest? And will you remain under my roof, and be one of my family, until we wise people have laid our heads together, and have settled what is to be done next?"

At those words I rose to interfere. Mr. Bruff had done exactly what I had dreaded he would do, when he asked Mrs. Ablewhite for Rachel's bonnet and shawl.

Before I could interpose a word Rachel had accepted his invitation in the warmest terms. If I suffered the arrangement thus made between them to be carried out—if she once passed the threshold of Mr. Bruff's door—farewell to the fondest hope of my life, the hope of bringing my lost sheep back to the fold! The bare idea of such a calamity as this quite overwhelmed me. I cast the miserable trammels of worldly discretion to the winds, and spoke with the fervor that filled me, in the words that came first.

"Stop!" I said—"stop! I must be heard. Mr. Bruff! you are not related to her, and I am. I invite her—I summon the executors to appoint me guardian. Rachel, dearest Rachel, I offer you my modest home; come to London by the next train, love, and share it with me!"

Mr. Bruff said nothing. Rachel looked at me with a cruel astonishment which she made no effort to conceal.

"You are very kind, Drusilla," she said. "I shall hope to visit you whenever I happen to be in London. But I have accepted Mr. Bruff's invitation, and I think it will be best, for the present, if I remain under Mr. Bruff's care."

"Oh, don't say so!" I pleaded. "I can't part with you, Rachel—I can't part with you!"

I tried to fold her in my arms. But she drew back. My fervor did not communicate itself; it only alarmed her.

"Surely," she said, "this is a very unnecessary display of agitation? I don't understand it."

"No more do I," said Mr. Bruff.

Their hardness—their hideous, worldly hardness—revolted me.

"Oh, Rachel! Rachel!" I burst out. "Haven't you seen yet, that my heart yearns to make a Christian of you? Has no inner voice told you that I am trying to do for you, what I was trying to do for your dear mother when death snatched her out of my hands?"

Rachel advanced a step nearer, and looked at me very strangely.

"I don't understand your reference to my mother," she said. "Miss Clack, will you have the goodness to explain yourself?"

Before I could answer Mr. Bruff came forward, and, offering his arm to Rachel, tried to lead her out of the room.

"You had better not pursue the subject, my dear," he said. "And Miss Clack had better not explain herself."

If I had been a stock or a stone, such an interference as this must have roused me into testifying to the truth. I put Mr. Bruff aside indignantly with my own hand, and, in solemn and suitable language, I stated the view with which sound doctrine does not scruple to regard the awful calamity of dying unprepared.

Rachel started back from me—I blush to write it—with a scream of horror.

"Come away!" she said to Mr. Bruff. "Come away, for God's sake, before that woman can say any more! Oh, think of my poor mother's harmless, useful, beautiful life! You were at the funeral, Mr. Bruff; you saw how every body loved her; you saw the poor helpless people crying at her grave over the loss of their best friend. And that wretch stands there and tries to make me doubt that my mother, who was an angel on earth, is an angel in heaven now! Don't stop to talk about it! Come away! It stifles me to breathe the same air with her! It frightens me to feel that we are in the same room together!"

Deaf to all remonstrance, she ran to the door.

At the same moment her maid entered with her bonnet and shawl. She huddled them on any how. "Pack my things," she said, "and bring them to Mr. Bruff's." I attempted to approach her—I was shocked and grieved, but, it is needless to say, not offended. I only wished to say to her, "May your hard heart be softened! I freely forgive you!" She pulled down her veil, and tore her shawl away from my hand, and, hurrying out, shut the door in my face. I bore the insult with my customary fortitude. I remember it now with my customary superiority to all feeling of offense.

Mr. Bruff had his parting word of mockery for me, before he too hurried out, in his turn.

"You had better not have explained yourself, Miss Clack," he said, and bowed, and left the room.

The person with the cap-ribbons followed.

"It's easy to see who has set them all by the ears together," she said. "I'm only a poor servant—but I declare I'm ashamed of you!" She too went out, and banged the door after her.

I was left alone in the room. Reviled by them all, deserted by them all, I was left alone in the room.

Is there more to be added to this plain statement of facts—to this touching picture of a Christian persecuted by the world? No! my diary reminds me that one more of the many checkered chapters in my life ends here. From that day forth I never saw Rachel Verinder again. She had my forgiveness at the time when she insulted me. She has had my prayerful good wishes ever since. And when I die—to complete the return on my part of good for evil—she will have the Life, Letters, and Labor of Miss Jane Ann Stamper left her as a legacy by my will.

THE DEVIL OUTWITTED.

AN HUNGARIAN POPULAR TALE.

In those dreadful days when devils had full power to assume various mortal forms, and in pursuit of their avocation to wander over the wide earth, a very old malignant devil left his subterranean abode. Having heard of the wonderful bliss which was enjoyed by human beings in their marriage life, he determined himself to make an attempt to enter into that happy state.

But he was so old and so ugly that by no device and no disguise could he conceal the deformity of his person, and every approach he made toward a pretty maiden was repelled with contumely and scorn. This grieved and exasperated him beyond all bounds, and he sunk into the depths of despair, having exhausted every art of fascination and eloquence. In this miserable state of things he determined to address himself to a hideous ancient hag who had already sent six husbands to their graves; but finding nothing preferable to her, he offered her his hand, swearing fidelity for life and death.

We will not describe the bride, with all her charms, except to say that the venerable chronicler, who has recorded the story for our delight and instruction, declares that, wicked as was the devil, the devil's wife was tenfold worse; and he adds that the outward deformity of the witch was charming when contrasted with the vileness of her inner nature.

On the wedding-day, immediately after the ceremony, she began to torment her husband, scolding and quarreling without rhyme or reason, which he could not stop for even a minute. This was the devil's introduction to domestic felicity; and he soon found that his late infernal residence itself was paradise when compared with earth, and such a witch of a woman for a wedded wife.

He could not bear it long. Full of shame and sorrow, he cursed the whole race of womankind, and his own choice above every other. He wandered away into the deepest woods and the wildest wildernesses, blessing the fortune that had given sufficient strength to his weary legs to carry him so far off from his beautiful bride.

And so he strayed in melancholy mood into a thicket, where he saw a little meagre man busied in digging up and gathering together various roots and herbs. The man looked upon him with a friendly but gloomy and embarrassed countenance, and the devil soon discovered that he had no picture of human happiness before him; but he tenderly inquired into the man's history and employment. The poor botanist answered with sighs that he was indeed an unfortunate creature whom a bad wife had brought to misery, having squandered his belongings, and so plagued his existence that he felt it a relief to occupy himself by collecting simples in the desert in order to escape from that female house-devil.

The story produced on the devil's mind a fellow-feeling of sympathy, and he narrated to the little man the experience of his own mortal felicity. They were soon bound together in the strongest bonds of friendship; they discussed their mutual grievances, and determined to work together for their common relief, and to help one another in partnership. The little man collected a great supply of roots and herbs, and the devil, whose hatred against the whole race of mortal man had been greatly sharpened by his more intimate acquaintance with the better half, used every art of witchery and deceit to induce people to trade with his associate. He possessed first one and then another, and did not come out of them until the little man had come to cure them with his mysterious medicines; and such was the success of these devices that they collected heaps of money, and so long had their traffic been carried on that the woods and wastes failed to present them with a sufficient supply of simples for the demand. Meanwhile with the accumulation of wealth the passion of avarice entered into the soul of the meagre little man, and he determined for the future to disregard the agreement he had made with the devil. He deceived his comrade as often as he could, and, instead of giving half their earnings, he often handed to him less than a third. The devil's sharp-sightedness soon discovered the roguery, and he only waited a favorable opportunity for taking becoming revenge.

He entered into a peasant girl, and maddened her with such a fearful frenzy that half the affrighted villagers fled. The meagre man came with his healing herbs; but though the girl was exorcised by every charm and by every influence that had hitherto in every case succeeded, the devil that possessed her declared that he would never quit her, hurled scorn and defiance at the exorciser, and loudly shouted out that he desired his power. This sudden and unexpected obstinacy of the devil placed the little man in the greatest perplexity; but in his wild despair he dreamed of a plan by which he could not only drive the devil out of the maiden, but out of the universal world.

The people had abandoned all hope of the recovery of the maiden, when the little man came forward and said to the devil, "Thou canst not secure the girl; I will call thy wife to help thee!"

Hardly were the words uttered when the devil began to tremble, for the magician made all the bones of the maiden crack. She fell in convulsions to the ground, but her misery soon came to an end. The devil thought it better to hurry back to his own proper regions than to wait the coming of his wife. He disappeared in smoke, but left a disagreeable smell behind him.

FORK-TONGUED.

"HARRY!" she gasped, in a strange, harsh, cracked voice; and, as I started and looked up from my work, there was my wife coming toward me, with her arms stretched out, her eyes fixed, and a horrible, ghastly look upon her white face that made me drop my spade and run to meet her. I caught her just as she was falling, when her eyes closed, and she gave a shiver that seemed to shake her whole body.

This was soon after we had settled out in the my country, and there was only another hut here and there in those days; but, after years of knocking about at home, trying hard to get an honest living, and never succeeding, we had made up our minds to try Australia; and here we were, living in the log-hut I had knocked up for myself, helping me, and doing what little I could in the shape of gardening; for, that being my right trade, with all the beautiful rich soil lying fallow, it did seem a pity to me not to have a turn at it; so, getting what seeds I could from Sydney, and adding to the few I had brought in my chest, I managed to make quite a little Eden of the bit of land I broke up round our hut. We were not saving money, not to any extent, but there was a good deal over beside, and no rent to pay, plenty of vegetables of my own growing, and them coating nothing, plenty of work to do, and, one sort or another, I was getting on at a rate that after what we had gone through in England, you may be sure we were willing enough to try and put up with such inconveniences as fell to our share, and, as a matter of course, there were things to encounter out there in what some people would call the wilderness, though it was a wilderness that blossomed like the rose. There were times, for instance, when we were in dread of the blacks, who had done some very nasty things here and there about; then the place was terribly lonely, and out of the way if you wanted a doctor, or ever used to take you because I could never get half a pint of beer, but I found I could get on just as well without it, and my work, which was the joy of ten, was always to have out there.

Well, Mary came out to me that day looking that horribly ghastly that, being naturally rather too fast at fancying troubles in advance, I saw directly half a score of blacks coming to murder us, and some of them knocking out the children's brains with their clubs—and not the first time neither, but in a few moments the whole grid opened her eyes, and began to stare about her. There were no blacks to be seen. Little Joe was sitting in the shade playing, and though I looked along the edge of the wood behind the house I could see no sign of danger: so I began to think that my fears had been taken off, and turned over in my own mind how I could get any help for her.

Just then her face grew contracted again as her thoughts seemed to come back, and gasping out once more, "Harry, Harry," she gave a shudder, and said, "Let me see—suake!"

I couldn't see myself, but I know I turned white, all the blood seeming to rush to my heart, for I knew very little of what I was afraid it is a snake, even going so far as to dislike eels, of which there was abundance in the river close at hand.

I don't know how we got there, but the next thing I remember is standing at the hut window with Mary holding Joe tight in her arms, and me looking through at the cradle, where our little thing of nine months old was lying: and my heart seemed to be turning to ice as I saw nestled in the foot of the cradle, partly hidden in the blanket, but with some of its length out of it, a snake that was not resting upon them, the largest snake I had seen since I had been in the country. The feeling was something awful, and I stood there for a few moments leaning upon the rough handle of the hoe I had caught up, not able to move, for my eyes were fixed upon the head of that hideous beast, and I expected every moment that the baby would wake and make some movement sufficient to irritate the snake, and then, whether poisonous or not, I felt that the little thing must die.

What should I do? I asked myself, as the horrible feeling of helplessness wore off. If I crept in and reached the cradle-side unheard, I dared not drag out the beast for fear of injuring the child, for I could see that some of the folds lay right across it. I dared not make a noise, lest the vexed beast or the child should awake as well as the reptile, for I knew the rapidity with which the horrible creatures could wreathe fold after fold round the object they attacked; while, if of a poisonous nature, they struck in an instant. Thoughts came swiftly enough, but they were unavailing, for to wait till the baby woke, or to go in and attack the snake, seemed equally dangerous. Even if I made a slight noise the danger seemed as great, since, though the snake might wake first and glide off, the probability were just as great that the child would wake at the same time.

And so I turned over the chances again and again, my eyes all the while fixed upon the two sleeping occupants of the cradle, whose pleasant warmth had evidently attracted the reptile.

"I was a coward, I know," I muttered; my wife, and then, without taking my eyes for an instant from the snake, I whispered the one word "Gun," and she glided from my side.

I did not know then, but she told me afterward, how she had carried the little boy to a distance and given him a few cakes to play with, while she crept back to the hut, and, reaching in at the kitchen window, brought me my gun, for I had not stirred. And now I grasped the piece in my hand, knowing though I did that it was loaded, it seemed of no use, for I dared not fire; but, with trembling fingers, I felt in my pockets to see if there was a bullet in them, and then softly pulling out the ramrod I unscrewed the end of the barrel and drew the wadding, reversed the piece, and let the shot fall pattering out, when I softly forced down the bullet upon the powder, examined the cap, and stood ready waiting for a chance; for I thought that the shot might have scattered it. In fact, if ever so little, I might have injured the child in place of its enemy.

And there we stood for quite half an hour, watching intently that horrible beast comfortably nestled in the blanket, expecting momentarily that the baby would wake, while my hand trembled so that I could not hold the gun steady. One minute I was thinking that I had done wrong in changing the charge, the next minute that I was right, and I fancied that the gun might miss fire, or that I might not have time to fire. A hundred terrible thoughts entered my mind before little Joe began to creep out to his mother, and she glided away while I muttered to myself "Coward!" for she was spared from seeing what followed.

As if at one and the same moment the child and the snake woke, the latter with a quick head move, and its little arms thrown out, while from the motion beneath the blanket I knew that it must have disturbed the reptile. There was a rapid movement in the cradle, and as I glanced along the gun-barrel taking aim there was the whole of the horrible reptile exposed to view coil gliding over coil as it seemed to fill the foot of the cradle; and now had my gun been charged with shot I should have fired at once, so as to have disabled some part of its body; but with only a single bullet I felt that the head must be the part attacked if I were to succeed.

Glide, glide, glide, one coil over the other quickly and easily, as if it were unwise to hasten its movements, and then slowly rose from where it had lain, and crept nearer and nearer to the child's face, the forked tongue darting in and out, and the head with its evil eye on a level with the sleeping mouth. I could see the glance of the snake's eyes, and expected every moment as the child breathed that the reptile would be lowered head now rested over its breast. But no, the child lay perfectly still for a few moments, and then, with a little laughing cry, it put as I saw the snake's head drawn back, and then began to sway to and fro, afid from side to side, the glistening back of the reptile moving, according, while the tongue still darted in and out of the tight, dreadful-looking mouth.

Now was the time, I should have fired; but I was too unnerved; and laying down my gun I seized the hoe, meaning to attack the beast with the sharp edge, but my hand fell paralyzed to my side as I saw the little innocent in the cradle smile and then laugh at the gently undulating head of the snake, as it swayed to and fro, my grief was to greater than I could bear, in seeing the little white hands try to catch at it as it swayed to and fro, my presence of mind came back. I snatched up the gun, and as the snake's head was driven back preparatory to striking, I pulled the trigger, and the sharp crack of the percussion cap alone followed—perhaps providentially, for in my trembling state I might have injured the child. Then I saw a rapid writhing of the coils in the cradle, and as the tail of the snake glided over the side, every muscle in my body seemed to swim, and I tried to catch at the wall of the hut to save myself from falling.

But that soon passed away, and there, gazing in at the window, I tried to make out the where-abouts of my enemy, as I recapped and tapped the gun, so that I might reload and put up the nipple. The snake was nowhere to be seen, and darting in I seized the child, and carried it out to its mother, who was standing at the door, and then, with a strength I did not exhibit again for years, I obtained my shot-pouch from the kitchen, rammed down a charge upon the bullet, and cautiously went in search of the reptile.

I knew that he must still be in the part of the hut we had not yet sleeping in, and after cautiously peering about, I came upon the hole where it had taken refuge—an opening between the roughly-sawn planks that formed the floor and floor; while, unless there was an outlet beneath the wood-stack, I felt that the beast must be there, and to make it more certain, there was my cat, that we had bought a kitten in Sydney, gazing with staring eyes down at the hole.

Just then I heard the resting beneath my feet, and as I looked down, I could see between two boards the scaly body gliding by. Taking a rapid aim down between the board, I fired, and as I looked down, I could see between the boards where the charge had forced a passage through, there was no sign of the snake.

"I Harry, Harry!" shrieked my wife past then; and on rushing out, there was the beast writhing about in the path, evidently badly wounded, while some crushed-down flowers by the hut wall showed plainly the hole of communication. I never saw snake writhe and twist as that creature did, but I was too excited then to feel afraid, and a few blows from the but-end of the gun laid it so that there was only a little movement left in its body, which did not stop for an hour or two after I had cut off his head with the axe.

I should have liked to skin the beast, but I could not manage the horror. I measured it though: fourteen feet three inches long it was, and as thick as my arm; while, as to its weight, I saw the cradle rock to and fro heavily as it glided over the side.

Snakes are scarce now in this part; for there isn't a man to kill them, and does not wage war against them, and where there was one settler then there are scores now.

VIOLETS AT HOME.

O HAPPY buds of violet!
Give them to my sweet, and she Puts them where her dainty sweeter yet
Must always be.

White violets find whiter rest;
For fairest flower how fair a fate!
For remnants, O fragrant breast!
Immortalate.

HOME AND FOREIGN GOSSIP.

THE medals and diplomas awarded to American exhibitors at the Paris Exposition are now on exhibition at the Academy of Design. They are arranged in the Hall formerly occupied by the House of Representatives, and make quite an imposing display. The cases containing the medals are beautiful specimens of workmanship, being made of French glass, surmounted by a frame-work of burnished steel. These cases contain four crosses of the Legion of Honor, three grand gold medals, one gold medal, one artist's medal, seventy-four silver and ninety-five bronze medals. The two grand gold medals were granted to the number of medals—a result of the rule of awards adopted by the Imperial Commission, that when two or more awards of the same denomination are made to one exhibitor for different products, the number of dispensed with will correspond with the number of awards; but only one medal will be issued, which covers all. Under the most favorable circumstances a superior medal covers those of less value. It is stated that the per centage of awards to exhibitors from four countries is as follows: France, 80.37; United States, 82.19; Germany, 47.80; Great Britain, 38.16. A gold medal was awarded to the "Societe Anonidine des Etats Unis d'Amerique," which, consequently, does not belong to any individual. A silver medal was decreed to the United States Government for specimens of sutlers' houses. This award was the spontaneous act of the Imperial Commission. A bronze medal was also struck for the Agricultural Bureau. These medals are now being struck at the Imperial Mint, and will then present a specimen of each kind of medal awarded.

It is now confidently stated that Dr. Livingstone, the great African traveler, is not only alive, but that his journey of exploration has been eminently successful, and his appearance in England may soon be expected. Many of the reports of his assassination by the obliteries have been written, his character and worth lovingly commented upon; and he will be welcomed like one risen from the dead.

Since the opening of the House of Refuge, on Randall's Island, in 1858, more than twelve thousand children, boys and girls, have been taken in the commission of crime, or in destitute places, cared for kindly, trained into habits of industry, taught useful trades, and sent out into the world again; a majority of whom have become worthy members of society. During the past year alone nearly eighteen hundred have been received at the institution; and of these, seven hundred and seventy-nine have been indentured to farmers and others in various parts of the country. In this institution the steady performance of the routine of daily duties is in itself a corrective of careless habits, and the discipline is an excellent training for a useful life.

A curious discovery has been made near Knoxville, Tennessee, which antiquarians are requested to explain. For many years past a gentleman owning a plantation there has been interested in the fact that his cattle seem to be attracted to a particular locality on his farm, and would for hours stand constantly rooting to the place. He determined to investigate upon the subject, and accordingly commenced to excavate upon the premises. After digging down about seven feet he struck a vein of saltpetre, from which he took about eight inches in diameter: from this well he procured salt-water of a quantity sufficient to enable him to obtain salt for his own use for a few gallons. The gentleman prosecuted his investigations, and found a large variety of stone axes made of material similar to that used by the Indians for their home ware. The kettles were about three feet in diameter, and were of the very same pattern as those now in use among the negroes, so that there can be no doubt but they were about four feet in diameter, and were about forty in number. A most striking fact connected with the discovery is that these kettles were found at a depth of 70 feet below the surface of the ground, covered with layers of different trees—poplar and cedar, which were evidently two centuries old. The question is, how did they get there?

An exchange comments upon those people who complain that ministers cost a great deal, by citing a few facts: namely, that it costs $26,000 to keep the five of American lawyers; that $12,000,000 are paid annually for our criminal courts; that $10,000,000 to keep dogs in the midst of us alive, while only $6,000,000 are spent annually to keep 600 preachers in the United States.

It is said that, by adapting somebody's "system of electricity" to organs, a performer in Scotland can play on an instrument in America, and vice versa. It is furthermore suggested that wires be laid down from the organ-lofts to the residences of organists, so that a person desirous of hearing a sermon, or a concert, may may perform at home. One organist might serve for several churches, by the same management.

A new edition of the Scriptures—the "Chicago Bible"—is announced for publication. The advertisement says that a new feature of the edition will be family record suited to the wants of the day. In addition to the ordinarily received births, marriages, and deaths, several leaves will be added for deaths.

A Michigan paper states that a few weeks ago at a meeting of the citizens of Sturgis, in that State, an appeal was made to the ladies to aid the cause of prohibition by their influence in the coming election. They replied that they would if they were allowed to vote. So the gentlemen could do no less than to invite them to cast an election-day and make a demonstration in favor of prohibition. A Committee of twelve was appointed to carry out this object. They canvassed the village, and invited all the ladies to come out on that day and join in the demonstration. At ten o'clock, on election-day, they assembled at a large hall, and marched to the room where the election was held, and one hundred and fourteen deposited their votes in favor of prohibition and six against. While they were marching through the room where the election was held the utmost order prevailed, and, when they were retiring, three hearty cheers were given for the ladies of Sturgis.

Among the inventions of the world may be mentioned a family living in Michigan, bearing the surname of Thurteen. There are twelve children, who answer to the following euphonious names: The eldest is Hyrum Thurteen; the second, Leadra Ephraim; the third, a girl, Chrystenea Andromeda; fourth, Epaminondas Epaphrodite; fifth, Achilles Lycurgus; sixth, Mitchell Alexander; seventh, Cassius Pyrrhus; eighth, Solon Kossuth; ninth, Agamemnon Hiland; tenth, a girl, Delora Alexandra; eleventh, Petrocles Anticus; and twelfth, Wendell Phillips.

A newspaper is reported to have appeared in Alaska. It is called the Alaska Herald, and is printed in Russian and English.

There is a plan of establishing an insect menagerie at a place called Montcouri, in France. The insects are to be put in cages and kept alive, just like other specimens of natural history. The gentleman who proposes this monstrous twenty thousand members of the insect family who could be decently fed and naturalized to the public gaze.

Ordinary bed sheets are made by being draped through perforated iron "cullenders" from the top of a lofty tower. The particles of semi-fluid lead assume in their descent a globular form, and by the time they reach the bottom they are in general sufficiently hardened to be received in the middle of the surface of a vessel of water placed to receive them. Somehow, however, the measure is so great that many of the pellets flatten from the force with which they strike the receiver. This difficulty has been obviated. In the new Patent Shot Works, Le Roy & Co.'s, recently situated on Water Street, the shot are dropped into a receiving vessel of water from a height sufficient by a current of cold air which retards their fall to an exact sufficiency to prevent their flattening, and renders them almost perfectly spherical. Large-sized shot require, by the ordinary method of manufacturing them, a greater fall than small-sized ones; but a hundred feet is sufficient for the latter, the former require perhaps a fall of two hundred feet. The new tower of Messrs. Le Roy, near Fifty-fourth Street, on the East River, is a hundred and fifty feet high. The Philadelphia shot-tower is a hundred and eighty feet high. But the highest elevation of this kind is said to be at Villach in Carinthia, and is two hundred and forty nine feet in height.

A gentleman, having apparently fallen asleep immediately after reading Edgar Poe's "Raven," proposed the following parable:

"The other night, while we lay tossing and our weary brain confusing over the topics of the day, we suddenly were aroused a rattling as a verified hurl, a battling, as they wrangled in their fury. What is it, we said, And with these words we sprang to the door. Oh, ye nothing, Morgins grunted, as with a thistle eye he looked at us, mumbled, 'tis a hog and nothing more. Then said we, our anger rising for we thought it an ungrateful thing to be so rudely awakened, you shall take a small insect, Sir, thus the whole room will be filled. Then he who had spoken before he knew coming surely frightened, round our waist we grasped the vest of Morgins, as he sat upon the floor, when a resolution taking and a rapid movement making, he left the room without a word! Now dear out, we bravely shouted, as o'er head our boot we floated, take your departure, Sir, and then with straight arm and angle majestic, this dear creature called Somebody made his exit through the door. Much his exit without growling, neither was his voice heard howling, but he did not wait for the door, but he would to escape a doom so fated, we went slowly back to bed."

A Boston paper says that "any hotel regarded in Newburyport by a happy couple who have entered on their married career would be one where were supplied with enough dry-goods—of one kind—to last a lifetime. Another paper suggests a "Variety Wedding," which is said to be the proper thing to celebrate forty-five years of wedded bliss. A dictionary of weddings would be a useful work for a bridal tour.

A good story is told of a reverend gentleman to whom a farmer presented a load of potatoes, and many much easier than he did. "Now," said the farmer, "when you are called upon to marry a couple you can always have a low sum three times and you sometimes get ten dollars—this for a few potatoes!"

"Pooh!" replied the Doctor, "I would agree to marry half my next marriage-fee for a bushel of potatoes."

"Very well," said the farmer, "I'll take your offer, and send you the potatoes."

A few days afterward the clergyman was called on to perform the marriage ceremony for a couple for miles from where he lived. When the ceremony was over he telling the groom that his fee was ten dollars.

"Well, parson, I'e'pose I must fork over something for your trouble. What say you to a bushel of my very purtiest?" The best breed, I tell you, in the country. Shocking nice to have in the barn. Worth full that money. I'll suppose a figure—how will that do for the spuice, eh?"

The Doctor took the pun with joy. The joke was too good; he hastened to the farmer, saying:

"Spuice, friend, here is my fee in full for the potatoes!"

The farmer relished the joke so well that he insisted on potatoes to half a dozen bushels.

Leipsic is not only the greatest book market in Germany, but in the world. With a population of 120,000 inhabitants, it has more than 200 publishers and booksellers.

In the census of the Northwestern Provinces of India for 1868, the business of two hundred and twenty-five trades is enumerated as "flattering for gain." These are the descendants of a class who, in the times of the ancient Mogul court, preceded the dignitaries of the palace, or their palaces visiting the country, and sang loud praise of their titles and warlike acts. There are also enumerated four classes of eight hundred and fifty-one posters, two hundred and fifty-nine mimics, one hundred and eighty-three dancing-girls, twenty-nine professed mourners, nearly four hundred and eighty thousand beggars, and ninety-five "strolling players." Hindoo girls, according to matrimonial statistics, are married off at the age of ten, and often younger. The rule of age on the husband's side seems to be "that he shall exceed his wife's years by half as much, even twice as much, and be not less than one-fourth older than she is at the period of marriage."

An accommodating editor in Decatur City, having received from a distressed lady a letter asking for culinary matters, thus replies: "MRS. ——, we have no time to attend to cooking, and can only refer you to the following receipt:

SPRING-TIME IN THE COUNTRY.—GARDENING.—[SEE PAGE 297.]

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL SIR ROBERT NAPIER AND STAFF.—[FROM PHOTOGRAPHS FORWARDED BY THE "NEW YORK HERALD" CORRESPONDENT IN ABYSSINIA.]

SPRING IN THE COUNTRY.

We had scarcely a touch of real spring weather during the first two months of that usually delightful season. We are in its last month now; the warmer May days are upon us, and the work of gardening has already fairly begun in the country. There is no more delightful labor of the farmer's life. The heavier crops are put in the ground in earlier and colder weather, and by rougher hands; the work of gardening belongs to milder days and gentler hands. The men may be employed to trail the vines upon high arbors beyond reach or turn the hard sod; but the garden belongs to the girls and boys and women, and it is they who most delight in its labors, and it is more especially for them that we give the engraving on the opposite page.

THE ABYSSINIAN WAR.

THE special correspondent of the New York Herald, attached to the British Army expedition in Abyssinia—the same whose dispatches have been furnished to the British War Office and

SIR ROBERT NAPIER AND STAFF ENTERTAINED BY THE PRINCE OF TIGRÉ.

London papers in advance of their own official reports—has lately sent to that enterprising journal a series of photographs of Major-General Sir ROBERT NAPIER and the officers of his Staff. We are indebted to the editor of the Herald for affording us facilities for reproducing the likenesses of these distinguished officers in this issue of the Weekly.

GENERAL NAPIER.

Lieutenant-General Sir ROBERT NAPIER, Commander of the Anglo-Indian Army, was born in Ceylon about 1810. He entered the British Army in India in the year 1827. For the next succeeding eighteen years he was employed in the Public Work Department of the Army. As a captain he served with great gallantry and efficiency in the Sikh war of 1846, having obtained leave of absence from his civil duties the year previous. He had a horse killed under him in the battle of Moodkee, and another in the battle of Ferozeshah. At Sobraon he was attached to the Staff of the Commanding General, and was subsequently much noticed by Lord HARDINGE. He was Chief Engineer of the force operating against the insurgents in Mooltan in 1848, and afterward second in command. He was severely wounded at Lahore. On the annexation of the Punjab territory NAPIER was commissioned as Chief Civil Engineer of the new Province. In 1857 he served under General OUTRAM during the mutiny in the district, and was present with the First Division at the relief of Lucknow. He served afterward under Lord CLYDE, and in Central India under Sir HUGH ROSE, now Lord STRATHNAIRN, and in command of the forces in Ireland.

General NAPIER went to China under Sir HOPE GRANT, where he was present at the capture of the Takoo fort in 1860. Returning to India, he was appointed on the Council of the Governor-General. In 1865 he was commissioned Commander-in-Chief of the Bombay Army, and from Bombay he has been sent to Abyssinia.

GENERAL NAPIER AND THE PRINCE OF TIGRÉ.

Our second illustration, on page 297, is of an interview between General NAPIER and the Prince of Tigré, which took place near the camp of the former at Ad-Abaga. General NAPIER was the guest, Prince KASSA played the part of host; but preliminary to the interview there was enacted a scene well worth recording. The respective camps of the two commanders were on either side of the small river Diab. The British General, mounted on an elephant, and followed by his Staff, rode down to the banks of the river. His appearance on the elephant was to impress KASSA with the power and scientific skill of the white man; for the Abyssinians fear the elephant much, and have never ventured to tame him. At this time the Abyssinian line suddenly opened out in the centre, and KASSA, surrounded by his immediate counselors and guard, rode forward on a white mule with a crimson umbrella borne above his head, and was received by Sir ROBERT NAPIER. The conversation was conducted through an interpreter. Prince KASSA was ceremoniously conducted into the General's tent, where a long conference was held with the most satisfactory results. Having received some presents—a horse, a double-barreled rifle, and glass vases—he promised his aid to the expedition in the matter of food and forage. An inspection of the British troops then took place, after which Sir ROBERT NAPIER accepted an invitation to visit KASSA's tent. At the further side of the circular tent was a small couch covered with silk cloth, on which the Prince took his seat, and placed Sir ROBERT NAPIER at his side. The Abyssinian officers of high grade sat round the tent on the floor at the left-hand side of their chief, while the English seated themselves on the ground to the left of their commander. Girls bearing large baskets of Abyssinian bread and curry came in and placed them on the ground in front of the visitors. The bread was brown, formed in flat, circular cakes about a foot in diameter, and had a slightly sour taste. After enough had been eaten, other girls entered, bearing huge bullock-horns filled with "tedge," a drink made of fermented honey. This was poured into Florence flasks, and given to each guest. After a while, when many flasks had been emptied, musicians were introduced. The band consisted of six men who played on long pipes, which uttered wild but not unpleasant music. A war song was sung by a minstrel, and all the Abyssinians joined in chorus. After this the British commander was first invested with a silver-gilt armlet, the sign of a great warrior. Then a lion's skin and mane, the mark of a fierce fighter in battle, were placed upon his shoulders, a sword was girt upon his side, and a spear and shield for him were handed to one of his Staff, who acted on the occasion as his armor-bearer. The meeting then broke up. KASSA, after frequent hand-shaking, accompanied the General to the door of the tent, where a gray mule, caparisoned with Abyssinian saddlery and trappings, was waiting. On this Sir ROBERT NAPIER had to mount; and, again accompanied by the Abyssinian Army, rode down to the Diab, where the Abyssinians halted.

We are called upon this week to chronicle the end of this war, which has been very brief but very expensive. It was begun, as doubtless most of our readers know, for the release of a number of British and other foreign officers, merchants, and artisans forcibly detained by King THEODORUS, in order to secure the services of the latter, and for other State reasons. All peaceful demands having been refused the Derby administration of England ordered the Indian army, under the command of General NAPIER, to invade the domains of Abyssinia, and release the subjects of the Queen by force.

General NAPIER landed in Abyssinia in December, 1867, and immediately began his advance. King THEODORUS at the same time turned his capital of Debra-Tabor, and retired to the mountain fortress of Magdala. Here he was pursued by General NAPIER and his army of 10,000 men.

The march through the country is represented as having been very difficult. Elephants and camels had to be employed instead of horses and mules, and even these "ships of the desert" suffered greatly. The mountain passes were exceedingly difficult, and the ascents very high. Many of the animals employed were lost near Magdala, in crossing a ravine, which is described as being 8 miles wide, with a descent of 3500 feet, and an ascent of 4500 feet.

It was immediately after crossing this difficult ravine that the British army came within reach of King THEODORUS, and found him ready to obstruct its march. The fortress of Magdala was found to be a very formidable one, mounting 28 large guns, and garrisoned by about 15,000 troops. After reconnoitring it on April 7, General NAPIER pronounced it almost impregnable, but continued to advance until immediately in front of the position. On April 8 he forwarded a letter to King THEODORUS, demanding the release of the British captives. This he refused to do, and on April 10 General NAPIER invested the position. These movements brought on a fight, which resulted in driving King THEODORUS from his outer works into the citadel of the fortress, where he prepared to defend himself. During the next two days he released the English captives, but refused to surrender in person. This General NAPIER demanded, and on the expiration of a truce granted for that purpose he ordered an assault on the fortress. It was carried after a short but vigorous assault, in which the British loss was small. King THEODORUS was killed inside the citadel, defending it to the last. Two of his sons and fourteen thousand soldiers were taken prisoners. The fortress was given up to the troops, who plundered it. Among the "loot" were found four crowns of solid gold, thousands of silver plates, and large quantities of jewels.

On the second day after the battle General NAPIER began the return march to India, declaring that the purpose of the war had been accomplished.

SILENT LOVE.

You say I love not, 'cause I do not play
Still with your ringlets, and kiss time away;
By love's religion, I must here confess it,
The most I love when I the least express it!
Small gifts find tongues; full casks are ever found
To give, if any, yet but little sound:
Deep waters noiseless are; and this we know,
That chiding streams betray small depth below;
So when love speechless is, it doth express
A depth in love, and that depth bottomless.
Now since my love is tongueless, know me such
Who speaks but little, 'cause I love so much.

"NO MOVING IN MAY."

NARCISSUS SEMPLE was not more vain perhaps than the generality of his sex, which, to prevent any mistakes and misconceptions of his character at the beginning of this "moving tale by (East River) flood and (Long Island) field," I may as well say, was not that of the gentler sort. He had his faults, however, and modesty was not of them; but I, who am a little skeptical in regard to the virtues of man in general, still think he had no more vanity than the rest of his fellows, but knew less how to conceal it. He was very consequential of manner, but not, perhaps, more than his first-class position in (not first-class) society warranted. He knew the advantages of a well-turned figure, if not the joys of a well-regulated mind, and managed to array the one well in good clothes if he did not well store the other with great ideas. And yet I can not say that he presumed unjustifiably on his—well, on what, if you had ever seen him, you must candidly admit to be—his very dangerous, not to say killing, appearance.

If there was any virtue which could not be denied Mr. Semple, it was that of charitableness. He could not for the life of him resist a woman's appeal (or challenge) to a flirtation; therefore, is it to be wondered at that when, after several times encountering on the Fulton ferry-boats the fine person and expressive eye of Miss Lucy Peyton, to him incognita, she actually smiled to him (or at him), he succumbed to his better nature and took the first steps toward a flirtation by following the lady home?

But for some time this was all that he could accomplish. He had followed at a respectful distance, but the young lady was very timid, and had become nervous at seeing him following her; so she avoided him afterward, and he was for a long time compelled to be content with the information that she lived on the Heights, in a neat house, on the door of which was the name "Peyton." He passed by the house frequently on his way to his boarding-house in South Brooklyn, but he saw no sweet face at the window and learned no more of the lady. But I am sorry to say that he told his friend and fellow-lodger, Laurence Kirk, a great deal more than this, and boasted of smiles unsmiled and favors unextended.

During this winter, which Mr. Semple spent in an unsuccessful attempt to get up a flirtation, his boarding-house grew too familiar. Boarding-houses have a bad habit of doing this; they do not always improve on acquaintance. The nearer you approach your landlady the smaller she becomes; she grows less obliging, and takes a fancy to treating you like one of the family, and starving you on stale bread and tough meats. It must be patent to all my readers who have ever boarded long at one house that familiarity with boarding-houses, as with individuals, breeds disgust. A somewhat too long intimacy of three months with their landlady had thus disgusted Messrs. Kirk and Semple (not to mention the landlady), and they turned with desperation to the columns of the Eagle, to plunge among the delusive advertisements headed "Boarding," and after many searches they one day encountered this decidedly attractive document:

"BOARD.—A Lady living in her own house in Willow Street, on the Heights, will take two young men to board and lodge. No moving in May. Address Mrs. P., box 14, Eagle office."

"We will go there," said Kirk, decisively, as if all depended on his saying so.

"Just the place!" exclaimed Semple. "That's her neighborhood."

"Whose?"

"Hers—my charmer's."

"Which one?"

"Oh pshaw! you know who I mean. I never mention names."

"And all these conquests you have been telling me about refer to only one person."

"No, no, no. But attend to this now. Will you write or shall I? My note-paper is marked with my monogram. Perhaps I had better. It looks more distingué and responsible than plain note. Don't you think so?"

"Yes, yes, write by all means, and do it quickly. Let us get out of this place."

The note was written, sealed, sent, and answered. Moreover the answer was favorable, and an interview was desired. The number of the house was given and the name, Mrs. Peyton, No. —. The very identical house where his victim lived! But Narcissus never mentioned that fact to his room-mate.

The interview was had, the transfer was soon made, and the young gentlemen found themselves ensconced in a neat room in a pleasant house with the widow Peyton and her daughter, Lucy, the lady beforementioned by us, and admired by the susceptible Mr. Semple. If she remembered that gentleman at all Miss Lucy kept such knowledge to herself, and met the two gentlemen as if they were perfect strangers. Mr. Semple kept his knowledge of the lady to himself, and prepared himself to astonish Kirk by another conquest. Mr. Kirk made himself generally agreeable—at first paying his devoirs entirely to the old lady; while Semple absorbed the time, if not the attention, of Miss Lucy.

Why is it that young men of diametrically opposite characters are frequently found to be most intimate and constant friends? And why is it, too, that mothers, who have the training of daughters, bring them up to be so unlike themselves in every respect but features? Does friendship, like love, delight in opposites? Does maternal love, like the other species, delight in joining contrasts, or at least in producing them? No matter what the explanation may be, such is the case in many thousands of instances; and Laurence Kirk and Narcissus Semple, and Mrs. Peyton and her daughter Lucy, formed a couple of interesting illustrations of this curious fact and phase in human nature. I wonder if Kirk had not chosen his friend, and Mrs. Peyton had not trained her daughter, as "foils"—the contrasts to their own characters. Laurence Kirk was what Mr. Semple was not—a modest man, and a sensible one. He was, too, a little cynical, and disposed to be retiring rather than forward or sociable, while no one ever accused Mr. Semple of any such faults. He had no great opinion of his looks or attainments, and yet he was not a bad-looking man, and had a good command of language and a flow of ideas when he chose to express the one by the use of the other, which was not often, as he spent most of his time in reading. Perhaps it was owing to the fact that he did spend much time in reading that he was able to be interesting when he did talk—a fact, by-the-way, that many other persons than Mr. Semple do not seem to comprehend.

There was a similar contrast, so Mr. Kirk soon discovered, between Mrs. Peyton and her daughter. The old lady was what is vulgarly called a "high-flier," while her daughter was provokingly democratic. The elder was always on her dignity; the young lady was sociable to a degree that bordered on freedom—so Mr. Kirk was pained to conclude after he had been there a few days. But at the same time she was modest and not obtrusive, and decidedly cheerful and sensible. I do not mean that the old lady was not sensible and cheerful also; but she had a weakness about "her family name," and was a little too stiff in her manner. She differed from her daughter in that she seldom laughed heartily, though she always had a smile on her face; but most the contrast was observable in the difference between the manner of the two toward their guests or rather lodgers. While Kirk, with his quiet ways, absorbed the attention of the old lady, Mr. Semple made himself very attentive to Miss Lucy; and after they had been in the house a few weeks the result of this disposition began to affect every body with the possible exception of Semple himself. Kirk was disposed at first to admire, as much as he ever admired, the young woman whose cheerful disposition displayed itself under all circumstances. He had on one occasion come upon her suddenly while engaged in dusting the parlor with a handkerchief tied around her head to save her hair, and her conduct was so very easy and graceful under this trying circumstance that he began to look upon her as a sensible as well as sweet-tempered young lady. Miss Lucy was at first apparently quite as charmed by the grave face and manner and conversation of Mr. Kirk, and in her free and pleasant way she evinced much pleasure in his society. In a very few weeks the acquaintance between the two warmed into quite a friendship; they had long conversations—something as unusual for the sedate Kirk as it was common with the lively young lady; they even read Owen Meredith's "Lucile" together, or rather Kirk read it aloud to her; they went to hear the Grande Duchesse, and afterward hummed its airs over as does every body who has once heard that fascinating music—in short, Kirk came to be like one of the family. Semple meantime had not accomplished his proposed conquest, and shone to great disadvantage beside his friend.

But it is not necessary only that a young man shall be agreeable to the woman he admires to win her affection; it is just as absolutely necessary that he shall be agreeable to no other woman. Miss Lucy Peyton fully recognized the amiability and gallantry—the quiet, unoppressive gallantry of Mr. Kirk; but alas! for her comfort of mind, he was equally polite, and gallant, and amiable to other ladies—at least to one other lady. His conversations were pleasant—delightful, in fact; but they were addressed as much—indeed Miss Peyton thought a little more—to another lady than to herself; and as for those private, confidential confabs in remote corners of quiet rooms which ladies who love their prospective husbands most delight in, he never even sought them. In short, Miss Peyton felt and saw, and fretted to feel and see, that she had a rival.

Her mother!

Exactly so. Kirk was just as polite, just as gallant to the mother as to the daughter. He never began to read in the evenings until both had come in the parlor, and when he interrupted himself to comment on the more striking and beautiful passages of his author, his remarks and appeals for admiration were always addressed to the mother. The invitations to the Opera and theatre always included the mother; and what was worse, Kirk invariably escorted Mrs. Peyton, while Miss Lucy was carelessly turned over to the care of "that simpleton Semple."

Grave as is the offense of being too polite to other ladies than the one who loves you, it is as nothing in her estimation compared to the unpardonable crime of indifference. It is very dangerous for you to be gallant to another lady: but trebly so not to be jealous of the gallantry of other gentlemen to your sweet-heart.

Mrs. Peyton was particularly charmed with Mr. Kirk and with this arrangement. She had been afraid that her daughter might become interested in one of these young men "of whom and of whose family she knew nothing." The consideration of Mr. Kirk had much relieved her mind, and not that she loved the theatre or poetry more, but because she had high notions for her daughter, and wished her not to be left too much alone with the young men, did she accompany them to amusements and listen to Kirk's reading. She acknowledged no such admiration, however, to her daughter. Mr. Semple, they both agreed, was "of little consequence;" and there is no opinion which a woman can express of a young man so crushing as this. Women, more than men, despise negative characters, either of their own or the opposite sex; and to be set down by them as of little consequence is to be socially damned forever. But on the subject of Mr. Kirk they differed, though the opinion of the mother only found public expression. The daughter was silent.

"A very pleasant gentleman," said the mother; "but a mere warming-pan. He will do to nurse a wife, but not to display her. He would be fond but not proud of her."

Alas! for the force of Mrs. Peyton's arguments. In rearing her daughter she had produced her antitheton. Lucy wanted to be nursed, not displayed; petted, not fêted; and she had determined when she did wed to marry a man and not his family, as Mrs. Peyton proposed. The mother "had no particular objections to him. Oh no; he is undoubtedly a gentleman, and his recommendations are the highest; a good income too; but one does not want to marry a sedate old clerk who would be forever about the house, and, what is worse, keep you there."

"Me?" exclaimed Lucy, when her mother said this. "Me? He has no designs upon me, nor I on him. He is pleasant enough, but Mr. Semple strikes me as being the handsomest."

"But neither of them a catch," suggested the mother.

"Neither of them has thus far shown a desire to be caught by any body, or a design to entrap any body."

"That's because you, my darling, have wisely refrained from showing any partiality for either."

Alas! for the suggestion. The arguments of Mrs. Peyton were bad enough; her last remark proved a suggestion to the young lady which cost the mother much trouble, and produced these incidents which follow.

Was Mr. Kirk indifferent because he felt, as she did, that Semple was "of no consequence?" She would test that. From that day the demeanor of the young lady was changed, with a most surprising effect on the other dramatis personæ of this drama.

She began her operations at once. The same evening Mr. Kirk proposed reading "La Marquise," and had settled himself down in his easy-chair for the purpose of beginning, when Lucy, much to his surprise, excused herself.

"Excuse me this evening, Mr. Kirk," she said. "Mr. Semple promised to give me another lesson in chess, and I am so anxious to learn. He is such an agreeable tutor, and takes such interest in my progress."

"Oh, certainly," he said; and at the same moment Mr. Semple lisped his willingness to begin at once.

"Oh, you are so kind!" she said. "The board and men are in the library. We will go there so as not to disturb these old folks in their reading," with a peculiar emphasis on "old folks," and a little laugh.

And before the mother could prevent it, or Mr. Kirk could think to conceal his surprise, she had taken Mr. Semple's arm and was gone.

That night Mrs. Peyton suggested to her daughter that she ought not to have wounded

Mr. Kirk's feelings by declining to hear his readings.

"But I did not care to listen; chess, which I do understand a little, and Mr. Semple, who is very agreeable, are so much more interesting than verses I don't comprehend at all when read by men who are mere nothings, of no family, and who would keep one moping in the chimney corner forever. Better a gay simpleton like Semple, than a 'sedate old clerk like Kirk.'"

This was not exactly what the mother had meant when she had used the expression which her daughter had quoted; and the aptitude of her scholar caused her much vexation during the rest of the night. That same night Semple had confided to his room-mate his opinion that the campaign had now fairly opened, and he would soon see the conquest completed; whereupon Kirk had turned over with a "bah!" and slept, or seemed to.

A few nights after this was an Opera night at the Academy, and at breakfast that morning Kirk suggested that he would get places for the party; whereupon Miss Lucy looked indifferent and said nothing, which silence was contrary to her usual custom; while the mother, to whom the suggestion had been directed, answered that she believed they had no engagement for the evening. When the meal was over and the gentlemen had retired, Miss Lucy followed Mr. Semple to the door and asked him, loud enough for Mr. Kirk to hear, if he would not speak to Kirk for a moment. He stopped and they conversed for a moment, but in such a low tone that Kirk could not hear. He did not know the result of that conversation until evening, when he suggested that it was time to go to the Opera.

"I am engaged to ask you to excuse me, Mr. Kirk," said Lucy.

"Excuse you, Lucy!" exclaims Mrs. Peyton.

"Yes. I have had an engagement for some time past to go to Wallack's with Mr. Semple, and we have decided to go to-night."

And go they did, while Mrs. Peyton and Kirk went to the Opera, and were both so restless that they did not enjoy it; and I doubt much if Lucy enjoyed her trip, unless the knowledge that her tactics, of which this trip was a part, was having their effect.

And these tactics she pursued for some time unrelentingly. The readings were broken up entirely. Kirk and Mrs. Peyton were left to entertain each other, while Lucy and Semple played chess or flirted in the library. They avoided going out for an evening amusement with Kirk either and Mr. Kirk; and, to judge from all appearances, the flirtation was a desperate one.

And the effect of these tactics soon became visible. Kirk became more sedate than usual, and grew gruff to his friend. He kept his room more, and he also demonstrated that the manner without the daughter was no attraction whatever to him. Semple occasionally boasted of his conquest, and spoke so bold as to say to Kirk that the young lady was evidently very fond of him, when, much to his surprise, Kirk very indignantly called him a vain ass, and told him that the lady was merely trifling with him. This was the effect on Kirk; he gradually came to the cynical conclusion that the young woman whom he had admired for her good sense and easy manners, was as much of a heartless fly as the rest of her sex. But, singularly enough, it never occurred to him that she liked his friend.

But most this new and energetic flirtation between her daughter and Mr. Semple alarmed Mrs. Peyton. She soon gave Lucy to understand that the quiet tête-à-tête confabs in corners and secluded corners of the room with Mr. Semple were not, to say the least, advisable. "Particularly with a young man of no family pretensions and wealth." Lucy had only smiled at this, and promised her mother she would be as complaisant with any Prince of any High Mightiness, D.D., LL.D., or S.S.D., whom she would introduce, "and who," she added, "is as handsome as Mr. Semple." But the evenings out, and the secluded confabs, and the chess-playing, and the flirtation generally, went on until Mrs. Peyton began to think that there really was something in all of this all, and worried herself nearly to death thinking how she should get rid of these young men whom she had taken into her house with the understanding that they were to remain if they were pleased, and that there was to be no "moving in May."

Hints were thrown away. Hints she gave of intentions to discontinue keeping lodgers; hints of a coming brother who objected to having strangers in the house; hints of removal. They were all lost on the young men, one of whom did not hear, and the other of whom was determined not to heed them. She one day in plain English told Mr. Semple that she would be compelled to decline taking him and his friend to board after the end of the month. But Semple had been privately instructed by Miss Lucy, and answered the old lady by a reference to the agreement on "No moving in May."

At last, in her desperation, she appealed to Mr. Kirk, and asked him in so many words if he would not oblige her by giving up his room and inducing his friend to go with him elsewhere. Kirk was very much surprised, and begged to know why this request. Was he disagreeable? Was his friend troublesome? He demanded to know the reason for this sudden resolution; "for you know, Madam," he added, "our agreement was for permanent board and 'no moving in May.'"

But Mrs. Peyton was not disposed to give any reason; she protested that they were agreeable, no trouble, and all that; but she could give no reason. At length Kirk said that of course they would remove, but must unwillingly. But when it came to removal Mr. Semple, under private instruction of Miss Lucy, refused decidedly to budge. He referred Mrs. Peyton to her agreement—"No moving in May"—and explained to Kirk that "he had no idea of leaving this girl, who was so fond of him." Kirk stared at him in amazement; and for the first time the idea seemed to strike him that perhaps the simpleton was not a booster after all. Certainly Miss Lucy had been very much with him lately.

In the midst of these doubts he was sent for by Mrs. Peyton, and, descending to the parlor, was met by that lady with an earnest appeal to induce his friend to leave the house.

"He was not welcome," she said, her indignation getting somewhat the better of her discretion.

"Then we will certainly go, Madam," said Kirk.

"I will tell him so, and he will of course not refuse to go."

"I do not wish you to tell him so. The fact is, Mr. Kirk," she said, hesitatingly, "I might as well be candid with you. I have seen, and you must have seen, too, with pain that, of late, my daughter has become—become, not to say fond, but certainly rather pleased with the very marked attentions of Mr. Semple."

"What!" exclaimed Kirk, "you think so?"

"I am sorry to say I do."

"She likes him, you think? Really loves such a simpleton as Semple?"

"I do not think that you can call it love; but he is not the man I would wish for my daughter."

"Of course he isn't. A contemptible, vain ass, to come into a lady's family and make himself offensive by such acts! I did not think him as scoundrel as well as a fool."

"He has not been particularly offensive, and I do not wish to hurt his feelings; but I should feel like to have him leave the house with him, for I could not willingly recognize him as a son."

"He marry Miss Peyton! You astonish me, Madam! I should think the least idea of such a thing happening!"

"And you will induce him to leave?"

"Of course I will! I'll answer for it that he leaves immediately. The fellow is certainly crazy! I'll see that he goes."

"Oh! I shall be much obliged," said Mrs. Peyton, "much obliged indeed. We shall always be glad to see you both as friends; but my daughter has no idea of marrying—and—when can I have your rooms, Mr. Kirk?"

"My room! You want me to go, too?"

"I suppose so."

"But, Madam, I hope I have not been offensive."

"Oh, no, no."

"I have endeavored to be very agreeable both to yourself and your daughter. I—I had no intention of playing myself."

"But, Mr. Kirk—" the widow began to urge, only to be interrupted.

"I'll not hear of it, I repeat, Mrs. Peyton. You can depend on that; but as for myself, I think I'd better stay. I am sure you can have no objection to 'moving in May,' and he blushed deeply, "not on those grounds."

The blush deepened, and the confusion increased, and Miss Kirk, in desperation, brought the conversation to an end by rushing off to his room to settle with Mr. Semple. What the conference of the gentlemen was I can not say; but the result was that there was no immediate move on the part of either.

But there was noticeable a change in the manner of Mr. Kirk. He no longer left the young lady and Mr. Semple to their quiet chats in secluded corners or recessed windows. He either joined in them, or continually interrupted them, much to the disgust of Semple, and greatly to the consolation of Mrs. Peyton and the delight of her daughter, who began to perceive evidences of the jealousy she had desired to create. On an evening or two after the conversation above narrated, Semple and Miss Lucy had an engagement to go to the Opera. Kirk, more disgusted, the latter much pleased inwardly, to find that Mr. Kirk was determined to go with them, and that he insisted on sitting beside her and being very attentive the whole evening. Another day he neglected his business to spend an afternoon at home, and insisted on spending it in the sitting-room, where the ladies were at work, making himself very troublesome by cutting all the paper and fly-goods out of which he could get hold of into infinitesimal pieces, which stuck like wax to the carpet. At length he ventured to ask Miss Lucy to go out with him for an evening; but she regretted a previous engagement with Mr. Semple. "But," she added—the first word of encouragement he had given him—"you can come with us." And he did go, very much to Semple's disgust.

And, still more to that worthy's disgust, Miss Lucy and Mr. Kirk subsequently went riding of an afternoon, chilly as the weather was; and one night she caught cold—for Miss Semple's head by telling him, in reply to his invitation to the Opera, that she had previously promised to go with Mr. Kirk. Matters went on improving thus, until at length, and all of a sudden, Kirk regained all his original but quiet good humor, and began to treat Semple as complacently as before. But he did not relax in his attentions to Miss Peyton, and it was observed by her mother, with little satisfaction, however, that she now appeared to be pleased with—not to say fond of—Mr. Kirk rather than Mr. Semple. What the nature of the understanding between Miss Lucy and Mr. Kirk which produced this result was I can't say; but certainly the result appeared very satisfactory to them both, and decidedly unsatisfactory to Semple and Mrs. Peyton.

It was not "out of the frying-pan into the fire" this jump of Miss Lucy from Mr. Semple to Mr. Kirk; but it was just as bad in Mrs. Peyton's mind, and she fretted as much over the prospect or fear of Lucy becoming fond of Mr. Kirk as she had over that other. She continued to give out her hints; and finding none of them taken by the intended, she suddenly resolved, and as abruptly announced her intention, to sell her house and remove to the country.

"Sell the house, mother!" exclaimed Lucy.

"Indeed?" said Kirk, more quietly.

"Yes, sell the house and indeed," said the lady, sharply. "I propose to give immediate possession, and I tell you now, so that you gentlemen can hunt other lodgings."

And wherever the house the lady certainly did. Whether with the actual intention of selling or not I can not say, but in answer to her advertisement she received one such very favorable offer that she accepted as suddenly as she had resolved to sell.

And so one morning she announced that she had sold the house, that she was to give possession at the end of the month, which was April, and that she was "reluctantly compelled to ask the gentlemen to get other lodgings."

"I shall not move," said Kirk, quietly sipping his coffee—the announcement had been made at breakfast.

"Indeed!" said Mrs. Peyton.

"You know our agreement was, 'No moving in May.'"

"You can hardly hope to hold me to that agreement."

"No, hardly," said Kirk; "but you see I had come to the house to please so well that I did not relish the idea of leaving it, and so I bought it."

"You bought it!"

"Yes."

"From Mr. Merryman, the gentleman to whom I sold it yesterday?"

"No, Mrs. Merryman but through him. The fact is, Mrs. Peyton, that some time ago Miss Lucy and I concluded that this was an excellent investment to keep house in, and I have bought the house with the intention, if you have no very serious objections to me—I have no fam ily so you can't object to my relations—of marrying your daughter and setting up an establishment here.

It is not necessary, I hope, to tell how much the lady and Mr. Semple were surprised; how she was mollified, and his wounded feelings were soothed; and how then, finally, there was at that house "no moving in May."

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

On the 14th of last February a young gentleman residing in Leicester sent the following valentine to a young lady in London:

> Delicate Eyes And Radiant Eyes
> Scatter Their Wiles In Leicester;
> Leicester Your Other Under-Buys,
> Runs Down In Sale Rotherby.

In the course of a few days he received this answer:

> Darlings, Elevis! Can Love Inquire
> Never Entertainment Dearer,
> Than Rotherby By Sharp Twig Hurt—
> And Never Kiss Dearer?

It will be seen, on examination, that the initial letters of the first of these rather complicated verses form the words, "Dearest, will you be mine?" and those of the second, "Declined with thanks."

"My dear, what shall we get for dinner to-day?" "One of your smiles," replied the husband; "I can dine on that any day." "But I can't," said the wife. "Then take this," said he, giving her a kiss, and departing for his office. He returned to dinner. "This is excellent," said he; "what did you pay for it?" "What you gave me this morning," said she. "The dence you did?" said he; "then you shall have market-money the rest of the time."

POPPING CORN.

And there they sat a-popping corn,
John Stiles and Susan Cotter;
John Stiles was stout as any ox,
And Susan fat as butter.

And there they sat and shelled the corn,
And raked and stirred the fire,
And talked of different kinds of ears,
And hitched their chairs up nigher.

Then Susan she the popper shook,
Then John he shook the popper
Till both their faces grew as red
As sauce-pans made of copper.

And then they shelled, and popped, and sat,
All kinds of fun a-poking,
And he too suvent ate her ears,
And she laughed at his joking.

And still they popped, and still they ate
John's mouth was like a hopper,
And stirred the fire, and sprinkled salt,
And made, and shook the popper.

The clock struck nine, the clock struck ten,
And still the corn kept popping;
He stirred the fire, and then struck twelve,
And still no signs of stopping.

And John he ate, and Sue she thought—
The corn did pop most rarely—
Then cried out, "The corn's adire!
Why, Susan, what's he mutter?"

Said she, "John Stiles, it's one o'clock;
You'll die of indigestion
I'm sick of all this popping corn—
Why don't you pop the question?"

A Portland school-house caught fire the other day, and as the boys watched it, one in another school said, enthusiastically and honestly, to his companion, "Oh, Johnny! don't you wish it was our school-house?"

TIGHT PANTS.—Athmatical breathings.

An old gent of the "original Tentonic persuasion" entered a German conversation-room, when an artist in marble. Says he, "Mister, I vants a dozen stone for my wife mit de, and I vants dem made like little angels on." "All right," replies the accommodating artist, and the order was arranged. "Well, now," said he, "what you charge for one dozen stone for me, as I don't like to be mit my wife?" "Why, for him two?" The price was fixed, and the old man, turning to go, said, "But I tell right; I gives you fair, but mind, Mister, I vants my little angels mit trowsers on."

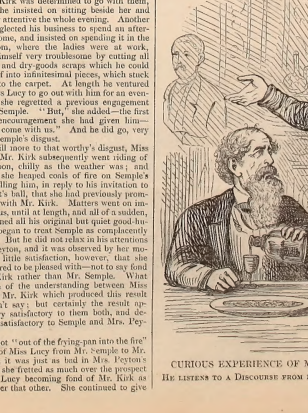
ON GOING TO CHURCH.

Some go to church just for a walk;
Some go there to laugh and talk;
Some go there for speculation;
Some go there for observation;
Some go there to meet a lover;
Some the impulse oft discover;
Some go there to meet a friend;
Some go there the time to spend;
Some go to learn the parson's name;
Some go there to would his fame;
Some go there to criticise dress;
But few go there to worship God!

A soldier, being on picket reserve, went to a farm-house, as he said, to borrow a frying-pan. For what none could imagine, as there was nothing to fry. However, he went to the house and knocked at the door, which was opened by a lady, who asked what he wished.



"Madam, could you lend me a frying-pan? I belong to the picket down here."

"Yes, Sir," and forthwith came the pan. He took it, looked in it, turned it over, and looked at the bottom, and then turned it over again, and looked into it very hard as if not certain it was clean. "Well, Sir," said the lady, "can I do any thing more for you?" "Could—could you lend me a little piece of meat to fry in it, ma'am?" and he laughed in spite of himself at the joke.

"You ought to acquire the facility of being at home in the best society," said a fashionable aunt to an honest nephew. "I manage that very enough," responded the nephew, "by staying at home with my wife and children."

The following inscription, which was copied from a tombstone in a church-yard at Liverpool, may be recommended to the collectors of curious monumental epitaphs:

> Oh, reader! here you read you'll see
> What soon you before and late we believ'd
> Why didn't you take that of me
> Which would have been better for the survivor?

CONVEYING SILVER FROM THE REAL DEL MONTE MINES TO THE CITY OF MEXICO.

MEXICAN TREASURE-GUARD.

THE illustration above shows the march of a guard of Mexican soldiers conveying treasure from the Real del Monte mines to the capital of the Republic. These mines are situated about 56 miles northeast of the city of Mexico in the Mexican Cordilleras, and are 9000 feet above the level of the sea. The mines have been known since 1749, but have been vigorously worked only since 1826. At that period an English Company obtained possession of them, but after working them for 22 years, they produced about $5,000,000 less than the expense incurred. A Mexican Company then purchased them, and soon after struck a vein which appears to be exhaustless, and which is known as the "Great Rosario Vein."

THE JAPANESE REVOLUTION.

THERE is probably no part of the world abroad in which the people of the United States are more deeply interested at this time than in the remote East, and particularly in Japan. The connections which are now forming, and which will soon bring Yeddo within a few days' instead of a few weeks' distance of New York, are of the most important character. They have been treated of largely in this paper. Here we propose simply to give, in addition to the particulars and illustrations hitherto published, later facts in regard to the revolution now going on in Japan, and which it will be remembered was precipitated by the opening of the new ports of Osaca and Hiogo to foreign trade.

GUARD OF THE AMERICAN LEGATION DEFENDING THE CUSTOM-HOUSE AND FOREIGN RESIDENTS AT KOBE, JAPAN.—[SKETCHED BY FRED. G. S. MELBYE.]

Our former dates gave an account of the defeat of the Tycoon and his flight to Osaca. From here he moved with his army in the direction of Kioto, and on January 26 he met a force of the rebels under Fusima near that city. A battle or rather grand skirmish ensued, continuing several days, and resulting, after the loss of two or three hundred killed on either side, in the defeat of the Tycoon. He fled to Osaca; and on January 31, at daylight, continued his flight, in his man-of-war, the Kai-o-mer, to Yeddo.

On the approach of the rebels the Foreign Representatives and residents left Osaca and repaired to the men-of-war stationed in the harbor near the mouth of Dry River, on which Osaca is situated, and which is about seven miles from the city. At this point there has long been a foreign settlement known as Kobe. The American, Prussian, and Italian Ministers were removed by the United States steamer Iroquois to Kobe; and here, with the British Minister, they took possession of the Custom-house, which is three or four miles east of the mouth of the river, and upon which they displayed their flags.

Osaca was given up to the mob; and on February 1 the deserted palace or castle of the Tycoon was burned. This was supposed to be the oldest, and was certainly one of the most remarkable buildings in Japan.

On the 4th of February one of the retainers of a rebel Prince, Mats-daira-Bizen-no-Kami, with about 200 or 300 armed men, marched through the main streets of Kobe, insulting and finally attacking the foreign residents. On approaching the Custom-house they fired upon it, wounding two French marines and one American. General VAN VALKENBURGH, the American Minister, promptly ordered his guard to advance to the defense of the residents and the Custom-house, and to attack the enemy. The guard, under command of Lieutenant WILLIAM H. EMORY, at once engaged the Japanese; and being immediately supported by the marines of the Oneida and Iroquois under command of Commander JOHNSON BLAKELY CREIGHTON, commanding the Oneida, and led in person by Commander EARL ENGLISH, commanding the Iroquois, and also by the marines and sailors of the English ship Ocean, under command of Captain STANHOPE, they soon dispersed the Japanese. The latter abandoned their brass cannons and baggage and fled to the mountains. The illustration on page 300, by our artist, Mr. FREDERICK G. S. MELBYE, represents the United States sailors and marines moving to the attack.

A further attack on the settlement was feared, and earth-works were thrown up and batteries put in position; the main streets were barricaded and pickets posted in various directions. A few skirmishes ensued, in which one of the marines of the Oneida and a sailor of the Iroquois were wounded; but no one was killed, nor was further damage done.

On February 4 a special Envoy Extraordinary from the Mikado arrived at Hiogo, with the design of entering into negotiations with the Foreign Representatives. After repeated interviews it was definitely arranged that the privileges granted by the Tycoon to foreigners should be continued by the Mikado; and the Tycoon having meantime abdicated (thus bringing the Tycoonage, which has existed for 300 years, to an end), the Foreign Representatives recognized the new dynasty. General VAN VALKENBURGH then formally demanded that the Japanese Government should apologize for the insult to the United States flag, and the punishment of the officer who commanded the party attacking the Custom-house. When our artist closed his communication preparations were going on for the execution of this officer.

BIRD'S EYE VIEW OF FORT HUMAITA, PARAGUAY.—[TAKEN FROM ALLEN'S BALLOON.]

VIEW OF HUMAITA.

THE fall of Fort Curupaity and the probable end of the war in Paraguay by the capture of Asencion, its capital, directs public interest in that direction. The war has now been progressing for about three years. It was originally begun by Brazil and the republics which border on the Rio de la Plate to obtain the freedom of the Paraguay and Parana rivers, which form the Plate. Several provinces of Brazil and the Argentine Confederation can only be reached by these rivers; and when LOPEZ, the Dictator of Paraguay, closed them to Brazilian and Argentine traffic, as the rebels once did the Mississippi River to Northern steamers, the people of Brazil and the Argentine and Uruguayan republics determined, as did the people of the North, that the rivers should be opened. This was the cause of the war. The operations have been almost exclusively confined to the siege of Humaita and Curupaity, which are on the Paraguay River, near its confluence with the Parana. Our engraving shows the long line of works which form the two forts, and which were lately captured. The details of the missing operations of the two and a half years' siege have not come to hand. When they do, the reader will find our illustration of great assistance in comprehending the descriptions. Fig. 1 in the engraving shows the locality of the bridge above Humaita held by the Paraguayans; Fig. 2, the city of Humaita; Fig. 3 is the town of Curupaity; Fig. 4, the town of Chaco; Fig. 5, the fort of Curupaity; Fig. 6, the camp of the Allies from which the balloon ascension was made; and Fig. 7, the location of the Allied gun-boats.

CIVIL MARRIAGES IN AUSTRIA.

AUSTRIA, according to the pithy saying of her own Radical politicians, is like an old coat—nothing improves her so much as a good beating: In time of peace, with a full exchequer, the Emperor ruled with a high hand, regardless of the liberties of Austrians and laughing at the boasted Constitution of Hungary. But when trouble came, and the Austrian army was defeated at Solferino in 1859, then the policy of the Government was changed. The peace of Villafranca was followed by the blessings of a Constitutional Government for the Austrians, and by an earnest effort for the Constitutions of Hungary.

The result of the defeat at Sadowa, in 1866, has been even more beneficial to the interests of popular government than the battle itself. The movement begun eight years ago has been accelerated and carried far on toward its triumph. The victory gained over Austria by the Prussians in the field was in itself far more significant than that won by the French in 1859. It was the victory of a Protestant "Young" party, and that extinct as was the triumph of Protestantism itself, and threw Roman Catholicism in Europe upon the defensive. It was the victory of a nation recognized as foremost upon the Continent in the progress of education. And thus the lesson taught to Austria by her defeat confessed the weakness of Roman Catholicism, both as an organ of political growth and as the recipient of public instruction.

The fruits of this lesson are seen in the institution of popular ministers, responsible to Parliament, and in the measures for legislation of the Reichsrath. Not only have the various religious sects in the Empire been placed upon a political equality, but the institutions of education have been for a large extent released from clerical domination.

In harmony with this liberal policy is the passage of the Civil Marriage Act by the Upper House of the Reichsrath. Hitherto marriage has been considered a sacrament of the Roman Catholic Church—in law no more legal without clerical sanction. Here, then, is a fresh blow aimed at the Romish Church, and against which the clerical party remonstrates in vain.

But if the Romish Church protests the people rejoice. An eye-witness thus describes the enthusiasm with which followed the passage of the bill in the streets of the Austrian capital:

"At five the result of the debate was made known in Vienna, and in a few minutes the joyous brilliantly illuminated, save where the Jewish colleges, monasteries, and the Cardinal's palace in the Rothenthurmstrasse and dark blots on the otherwise unbroken lines of light. In another hour the suburbs had followed suit. For example, Leopoldstadt and Wieden especially distinguishing themselves; and the whole population of the Kaiserstadt—bar the priests, who kept close enough—turned out into the streets to celebrate the triumph of the 'Honest Government.' Later in the evening—from nine to twelve o'clock—crowds, several thousands strong, marched, cheering and singing the National Hymn, from one Minister's residence to another, finishing each member of the Cabinet an ovation, and obtaining a few words from Giskra, Arneth, and Hasnke, in answer to their thundering 'Vivats.' Not the slightest disturbance was anticipated, and when the Cardinal's palace, nor was a single member of the Jesuit fraternity molested. When the long procession got to the Josefsplatz, where the statue of the great Josef stands, and where the tombs, and statues of the Burg, the Vivatsess citizens surrounded the insect of their beloved monarch, and greeted it with nine hearty and ringing cheers as ever were heard within the confines of Austria. At five o'clock this morning, by order of any kind, the population of Vienna returned home, and the Austrian Fast of March came to a worthy and glorious end."

The new policy of the Austrian Government is well expressed by the Minister of Public Instruction: "Society may be Catholic, but the State can not be Catholic if it wishes to be just to all its citizens."

THE DANCING MANIA.

MOST people have, at one time or other, seen some poor creature affected with those curious and painful nervous movements which are commonly called Saint Vitus's Dance. This, at least, is the popular name for the terrible affection, of which we have we back some instances among us; but it must not be confounded with the Dance of Saint John or Saint Vitus, a mania in the Middle Ages, although they have many points of resemblance. There was the dancing mania in Germany called Saint John's Dance, in Italy called tarantism (from the supposed bite of a spider); and we have also records of it in Abyssinia, where it has been named the tigretier, from the name of the country, Tigré, in which it most commonly occurs.

As early as the latter part of the fourteenth century large numbers of men and women in Germany, both in places of worship and in the streets, behaved as if they were possessed by devils. They danced in circles for hours together, leaped high into the air with wild gestures and frenzied cries, and, after raving for some time, they fell to the ground completely exhausted. Strange to say, in a few months this terrible disease spread rapidly in the Netherlands, and in most of the large towns of Belgium the demoniacal dancers appeared. Every thing was done which the wisdom of the age could suggest to put a stop to them, but in vain. The priests tried exorcisms, and there was even a law made that only consecrated shoes should be worn throughout the country, because the pointed toes, which were then popular, were objects of horror to the fiendish dancers. Certain colors, too, they hated and shunned, and the sight of any thing red was enough to throw them into more violent convulsions. The number of people who were possessed in various places was enormous. Five hundred were affected in Cologne, and the streets of Metz were paid at one time to have been filled with eleven hundred of them.

Many stories of dancing plagues were current in medieval times, even before the Saint John's Dance broke out in Aix-la-Chapelle. A mad rage for dancing had at various periods been manifested by large bodies of men, and even children had caught the contagion in their youth, and been afflicted with an incurable tremor for the rest of their lives. These dancing plagues seem to have arisen from the wild orgies with which the feast of Saint John the Baptist was celebrated in medieval times; and the religious and medical authorities of that day were wholly unable to cope with them.

Music of a rude kind always accompanied troops of Saint John's Dancers, and served by turns to excite and soothe them. They did of course an immense amount of mischief in every town they visited, and had not found in Saint Vitus a patron saint, under whose protection they supposed themselves to be, it would even now be dealt with them. Moreover, people believed them to be innocent victims to Beelzebub, and to be possessed with devils, like the persons mentioned in the Gospels. Their numbers were luckier in Germany than in other countries, where those possessed, and the people charged with being the authors of the supernatural affliction, were often persecuted with all the cruelty which could be devised, by men who believed that in such persecution they were willing a religious duty. A case occurred in Scotland, where the supposed authors of the demoniacal fits of dancing and singing in a girl named Christian Shaw were punished with death. Three men and four women were tried and burnt at Paisley, in June, 1697, for having bewitched the girl's hysterical condition to witchcraft.

As a natural consequence of the spread of the dancing mania, the hysterical affection of women were merged into it. Women, as is well known, are much more susceptible of nervous impressions and disorders than men. This is especially the case when they live confined and secluded lives, and the most amusing instances are on record of how the nuns in a convent would be affected by sympathy.

A case occurred in France, where in a large conventual establishment one of the nuns suddenly took it into her head to mew like a cat. Soon afterward, other nuns began to mew also. When this had gone on for a short time others followed the example; and, in the end, the whole of the nuns in the convent would mew for hours together, at a stated time in the day. This sort of concert so alarmed and disgusted the people of the neighborhood, that soldiers were ordered to guard of soldiers at the convent doors; and the nuns were told that unless they stopped their infernal performance the soldiers would come and whip them. The threat had the desired effect.

A still more remarkable case of this kind of sympathy took place in a convent in Germany in the century. A nun in a convent in Germany began to bite her companions. Then all the nuns in the establishment began biting each other. And this was not all; for when the news of this biting mania spread, it went from convent to convent, and from town to town, so that all the nuns in Rome took to the same infatuated practice.

A dancing mania exists at this time in Abyssinia, resembling in many ways that just mentioned. This is the tigretier, so called, as we have said, from its being chiefly confined to the Tigré country. It commences with fever and shivering sensations, which makes the patient very thin and debilitated, and causes him to fall into a curious way, that no one but a person who has seen it can believe. Every joint in the body, which is generally an expensive process. There is a cheap way, however, which is first tried—a sort of sympathetic cure, administered generally with cold water. This may be effectual, but it has also the disadvantage of very often heating the patient's death.

The more approved method is a ceremony of a curious kind, very much like that adopted in the case of Saint John's Dancers. A number of musicians are hired, and the friends and relatives of the unhappy patient assemble with them in a circle, while supplied with the intoxicating liquor. The music then strikes up, and the patient, at first only slightly affected by it, in a short time becomes a violent dancer. Women, as we have seen in the case of other nervous disorders, are more often attacked by the tigretier than men; and when a woman is to be invoked with all the jangles, amulets, and other trade appliances of jewelry that her friends can supply. During the dance, which often goes on for several days, and when her gestures and contortions reach a climax, she throws them off, and they are restored one by one to their owners. At the sunset of the day on which the treatment began, if it still continues, she will all at once start off running at a great pace for several hundreds of yards, and then suddenly drop down prostrate. A man comes up to her and fires a musket over her head, strikes her on the back with the flat of his sword, and calls her by her Christian name. If she can answer to it she is considered cured; for those who have the tigretier, says an eye-witness, are always unable to answer to their Christian names.

Jeanie's Quiet Life.

A NOVEL.

By the Author of "St. Olave's," &c.

8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

This book is written in a very graceful manner, occasionally eloquent and pathetic. Many of the pictures of country life are very pretty, and some of the characters are a great deal of poetry to them. The book has a vitality which distinguishes the productions of but few of our contemporary novelists. The author has shown a real creative power, and has given us some perfectly new and original characters.—Saturday Review.

We strongly recommend this novel. It is a charming story, worthy of careful perusal. Every page contains some pure and noble thought.—Observer.

A thoroughly interesting story. The book is one to be read, and it is sure to be admired.—Star.

The main interest of style, quaintness of expression, and pleasantness of detail which pervade all the writings of this author, will be found as rich abundance in this tale of domestic interest, in which noble feeling, high principle, and strong character are forcibly portrayed.—Messenger.

A BIG FARM.

I have spent enough money to buy a mile square of the best land in Oswego County, N.Y., within the last fifteen years in experimenting with farming and farming implements. I have been a great sufferer. I have had no rest myself for this cause, until urged to buy a plot of WOLCOTT'S PAIN PAINT. I got better, and, being interested in the matter, tried and now well, and have not an ache or pain. I can cheerfully recommend WOLCOTT'S PAIN PAINT. I say half built! Buy no liniments, for burning is placed out. Obey WOLCOTT'S orders, and get WOLCOTT'S PAIN PAINT.

LET NOT PREJUDICE USURP YOUR REASON.

It is a fact that, in the minds of many persons, a prejudice exists against what are called patent medicines; but why should this prevent you resorting to an article that has such an array of testimony to support it as

HOSTETTER'S STOMACH BITTERS?

Physicians prescribe it; why should you discard it? Invalids recommend it; why should you not avail and do use it in their families; why should you reject it? Let not your prejudices stand in the way of everlasting injury of your health. If you are sick, and require a medicine, try these Bitters.

Were the Bitters of a character ever sought by anxiety, and need a stimulant, this is the best that can be taken. It is tempered and modified with hygienic herbs and roots, which prevent it from fevering the blood; and hence it does not produce a mere temporary excitement, to be followed by corresponding depression, but communicates a permanent potency to the entire vital organization. Some of its herbal constituents are slightly aperient, but the most valuable characteristic is one of the accompaniments of nervous disease, a dose of it taken toward bedtime will be found to induce quiet and refreshing slumber. For palpitation of heart, tremors, hysterics, falling-fits, general restlessness, and the numerous nervous affections and irritations to which ladies are especially subject, under certain morbid conditions of the system and body peculiar to her sex, the Bitters will be found the most agreeable and certain of all counter-irritants.

The constitutional nervousness may readily keep their infirmity in constant check by the daily use of this beneficial tonic; and weakness, which has long enfeebled their nerves," as the phrase is, either by imprudent indulgence or undue physical or intellectual labor, will find in this vitalizing elixir a prompt restorative.

COFFEES ROASTED AND GROUND DAILY.

Ground Coffee, 20c., 25c., 30c., best 40c. per pound. Hotels, Saloons, Boarding-House Keepers, and Families who use large quantities of Coffee, can economize in that article by using our French Breakfast Coffee Roast, which we sell at 30c. per pound. Every package warranted to give perfect satisfaction.

Consumers can save from 50c. to $1 00 per pound by purchasing their Teas of

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA COMPANY,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey St. (Post-Office Box, No. 5643), New York City.

We warrant all the goods we sell to give entire satisfaction. If they are not satisfactory they can be returned at our expense within 30 days, and have the money refunded.

Through our system of supplying Clubs throughout the country, consumers in all parts of the United States can receive their Teas at the same prices (with the small additional expense of transportation) as though they bought them at our warehouses in this city.

Some parties inquire of us how they shall proceed to get up a club. The answer is simply this: Let each person wishing to join in a club send to us how much tea or coffee he wants, and select the kind and price from our Price List, as published in the paper or in our circulars. We then add them all together, and send in the order, and we will put each party's goods in separate packages, and mark the name upon them, with the cost, so there can be no mistake or difficulty in regard to each person receiving what he orders, and no more. The cost of transportation the members of the club can divide quietly among themselves.

The Teas may be put up in packages and can be sent by drafts on New York, by post-office money orders, or by express, as may suit the convenience of parties. Where goods are sent by express, they will be forwarded per Express to collect on delivery.

Hereafter we will send a complimentary package to the party getting up the Club. Our profits are small, but we will be satisfied with a fair trade, and we send no complimentary package for Clubs of less than $30.

N.B.—All villages and towns where a large number reside, by clubbing together, can reduce the cost of their Teas and Coffee about one-third by sending directly to "The Great American Tea Company."

BEWARE of all concerns that advertise themselves as branches of our Establishment, or copy our name either wholly or in part, as they are bogus or institutions. We have no branches, and do not, in any case, authorize the use of our name.

Post-Office orders and drafts make payable to the order of the Great American Tea Company. Direct letters and orders to the Great American Tea Company,

Nos. 31 and 33 Vesey Street, Post-Office Box 5643, New York City.

Cheap, Useful, and Elegant.
"IMPROVED BRONZE ALUMINIUM CASED WATCHES"
(The qualities and resemblance of this new metal are such, compared to gold, that even judges are deceived) and "ROSKOPF'S PATENTED PEOPLE'S WATCH."
The Improved Bronze Aluminium of which my watches are made is a metal differing entirely from any ever offered to the public. It has seriously occupied the attention of scientific men, and has not only called forth the eulogiums of the press in consequence of its peculiar properties, but has also obtained a Gold Medal at the Paris Exposition, and even been favorably noticed by rescript of His Holiness Pius IX., authorizing its use in the manufacturing of Church goods.
The qualities of this metal are such that it is surpassed by none, if we except gold itself, and that only on account of the intrinsic value of the latter. Further details will be found in my circular, which will be sent postpaid on demand.
My watches are made of three sizes, all hunting-cased—one small for ladies or lads, and two for gents. The movements are well finished, solid, and fit together by skillful workmen, and perfectly regulated. I can therefore warrant them excellent time-keepers. These goods being manufactured in my own factory, I am enabled to sell any of the above sizes at the extremely low price of $16 00. A full assortment of all kinds of chains always on hand.
Goods sent by express, C.O.D., with charges.

BORN TO THE PURPLE.

CECIL is heir to a manor,
Talks as if heir to a throne;
Can his love of the sunlight be greater
Than mine who have little to own?

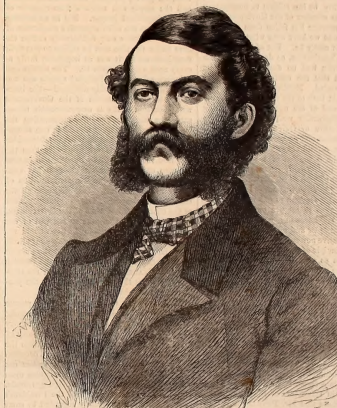
He has costly dresses and viands,
Beds of satin and down;
I dwell in a little chamber
In a quiet part of the town—

In a chamber facing the east,
With roses over its walls,
Where motionless birds are singing
To silent waterfalls.

He has beds of satin and down,
But is his sleep more sweet
Than mine, who lie with a quiet heart,
White-quilted from head to feet?

He walks within the shadow
Of old ancestral trees;
And whether in city or meadow,
Is haunted ever by these.

Heir of the sun and the breeze,
I wander forth at will,
Reading books in brooks,
Hearing songs in the rill.



On the sparkling sands of the sea,
Where blistered sea-weeds show,
Over loose shingle and rocks,
Worn with the ebb and the flow.

Pleasure upon my brow,
Fragments of verse on my lips,
I walk by the waves, and watch
The sails of passing ships.

We are but pilgrims here,
Treading on paths well trod,
Closer we move each year
To the judgment-seat of God.

There is sorrow on regal brows,
When angels gaze from the skies
On acres purchased by fraud,
And lands acquired by lies.

Better a rood of land
By honest industry thine,
Than for half-a-thousand acres
To barter thy birth-right divine.

MR. GEORGE F. SANDS, PRESIDENT OF THE NATIONAL BASE-BALL ASSOCIATION.
[PHOTOGRAPHED BY HOAG QUICK & CO.]

I am heir of the sun and the breeze,
Heir of all gardens and downs,
Though I have not a finger's breadth
Of land in country or towns.

Heir of the sun and the breeze,
The wealth of earth is mine,
Lilies and lakes, the song of birds,
And sweet smiles wherein all things shine.

THE BASE-BALL PRESIDENT.

BASE-BALL has come to be of late years as much the national game of America as cricket is that of England; and the enthusiasm with which the young men of this country devote themselves to their game is even greater than that displayed by John Bull. In fact, this generally commendable enthusiasm threatened at one time to lead the participants into some excesses, and make what was really a fine athletic sport for gentlemen a gambling game, influenced, if not controlled by "sports." We had occasion last year to allude to some of the objectionable features which were creeping into the game; we are glad to find that the indications are that there will be less reason for such strictures in future. The Convention of Base-Ball Players which met at Philadelphia in December, 1867, had much to do with checking and correcting these evils.

That Convention, during its session in December last, chose as the President of the National Association of Base-Ball Players MR. GEORGE F. SANDS, whose portrait we give on this page. MR. SANDS was one of the representatives of the forty-two base-ball clubs of Ohio in the Convention, which, by-the-way, was composed of representatives from 500 different clubs in the country, thus showing that, as each club must have at least 20 members, there were not less than 10,000 young men engaged in playing the game during the year 1867. The American Chronicle, which is an authority among base-ball players, and which is specially devoted to the advancement of physical education, has the following brief sketch of MR. SANDS:

"MR. SANDS has for years been prominently connected with the game in the West. Before the introduction of base-ball in Ohio, he was active in promoting the game of town-ball, not only as a player of the first class, but in every other way in which such sports can be made popular. The old Excelsior Town-Ball Club of ten years ago, and lately the Buckeye Town-Ball Clubs, were noted organizations in their time, and each club owed a great part of its prominence to the influence and exertions of Mr. SANDS. He was the catcher in the latter Club in nearly all its noted match games. He has lately taken a prominent position in Ohio in advocating the interests of our national American game of baseball. Although he has not as yet taken any rank as a player in base-ball, yet his opinions and judgments in regard to all the interests of the game are always sought and relied upon as correct. He has been the chief officer of the Buckeye Base-Ball Club since its organization, and very much of the morale of this noted and active Club has been due to its president.

"SEE-SAW"—AN ILLUSTRATION FOR THE JUVENILES.—[DRAWN BY C. G. BUSH.]

"Mr. SANDS has long been anxious to have an honorable esprit du corps existing among base-ball men generally. We know he has always been determined to do his opposition very severely of betting or gambling as connected with the match contests of base-ball. We know that if his counsels should be generally heeded the game of base-ball would become prostituted, but will command the patronage and support of the moral and educated classes of the country.

"Mr. SANDS is about thirty years of age, of pleasing address, and in every way well fitted to fill the position to which he has been chosen."

IRRESPONSIBLE EXECUTIVE POWER.

THERE were two apprehensions in the Constitutional Convention of 1787 which time has shown to be wholly unfounded. One was of national centralization, the other of Congressional power. It was supposed that the National Government would annihilate all State authority, and that Congress would overawe the Executive. HAMILTON did not share these fears. In the Federalist he forcibly pointed out the limitations upon Congress, the checks and balances provided in the Constitution. Indeed, HAMILTON thought the danger was exactly upon the other side. He said privately to JOSIAH QUINCY that he supposed the Union would last about thirty or forty years only; because he thought its centrifugal force so much stronger than its centripetal. History has annihilated these calculations. The great menace of the Union and its final desperate peril came from State authority, and President JOHNSON, in assuming to stretch executive function of reconstruction, made the most flagrant and unprecedented usurpation of the unquestionable authority of Congress. He had been as skillful as he was audacious, had he taken care to limit himself wholly with the Democratic party by giving to them the entire patronage of his office, his vetoes would have been more successful, and the subordination of the legislative to the executive branch have been accomplished.

The difficulty between the branches of government has almost always begun in the aggression of the Executive. The reasons are obvious. The Executive head, in other countries, but a traditional power, and in this the object of a peculiar personal loyalty. In this country he is the commander of the forces and the source of almost all patronage. He has every advantage for leadership, and he has no colleague to be jealous. If the prerogative claimed for the Executive office by the President's counsel before the Senate should be conceded, he absorbs the great power of the Government, is the judge of the Constitution, and his veto is absolute until overthrown by the Supreme Court. Nor is there any reason if he may disregard the legislative that he should not equally disregard the judicial department.

The duty of intelligent citizens in this country is to take care that the lessons of experience are not lost upon us. When the defects of our practice become apparent, let them be remedied as soon as possible. For the fact that concealment and avoidance has been terribly illustrated. The point of national supremacy and State rights was supposed left obscure by the Constitution, and we have paid the penalty. The peculiar peril from the Executive has now been made evident; let us guard against it hereafter. The decision of ANDREW JOHNSON has shown us that a President who is false to the principles upon which he is elected may administer the Government against the will of the people, provided that he can count upon a majority of not less than a third in Congress. It is unwise to expose any man to so extraordinary a temptation.

The Tenure-of-Office bill, the violation of which occasioned the late Impeachment of the President, was an effort to diminish the Executive power, which by constant and unchallenged usurpation was becoming overshadowing. Secretary SEWARD, one of the President's most devoted adherents, openly spoke of the various offices as if they were the personal gifts of the President, and of the office-holders as if they were in honor bound to his creatures. Mr. HAMLIN, in resigning the Collectorship in Boston, and Mr. DANA, in leaving the office of District Attorney, each seemed to feel that want of sympathy with the defection of the President obliged him to withdraw from his position. Thus the ill habit has grown of regarding all the national officers of every degree as mere satellites of the President; while the truth is, that, although appointed upon his nomination, they are as much servants of the people and officers of the Government as he. Yet nothing is a plainer and more necessary construction than that officers to whose appointment two powers are necessary can not, without especial provision, be removed by the concurrence of both. This is not only a necessary construction, but it is also contemporaneous.

In No. 76 of the Federalist it is stated, in speaking of appointment by the consent of the Senate, "The consent of that body would be necessary to displace as well as to appoint..... Where a man in any station has given satisfactory evidence of his fitness for it, a new President would be restrained from attempting a change in favor of a person more agreeable to him by the apprehension that the coalition of the Senate might frustrate the attempt, and bring some degree of discredit upon himself. Those who can best estimate the value of a steady administration will be most disposed to prize a provision which connects the official existence of public men with the approbation or disapprobation of that body which, from the greater permanency of its own compaction, will, in all probability, be less subject to inconstancy than any other member of the Government."

That the practice has fallen from this principle is true, and we have seen what the consequence must ere long be. But of the true doctrine of the Constitution, as HAMILTON, WEBSTER had no doubt, although he acknowledged that the contrary practice had gradually prevailed. Neither had the last Congress any doubt both of the meaning of the Constitution and of the necessity of restoring practice to conformity with it. It therefore passed the Tenure-of-Office Act. That it is both a wholesome and necessary restraint upon the Executive, candid reflection will assure us. It prevents the formation of a vast army of place-holders, individually independent upon the President, and obliged to sneeze when he takes snuff, lest they lose their offices. It tends also to make the whole system of offices more independent, and thus to remove one of the most demoralizing influences in our politics. There could be few simpler and more excellent reductions of Government than the general understanding of the principle of the Tenure-of-Office Act, and no means so effective in purging political practice as the passage and enforcement of Mr. SUMNER'S Civil Service bill.

DEMOCRACY AND REPUDIATION.

ANOTHER sign of the times is the passage of the resolutions in the New York Assembly recommending that the Government bonds be taxed. Every prominent Democratic majority, except three or four, voted for them, and every Republican but two or three voted against them. This is a direct approval by the Democratic party of this State of the REPUDIATION policy. It shows that Mr. PENDLETON is very likely to be a dangerous candidate for Mr. HORATIO SEYMOUR in the Democratic Convention. We speak of Mr. SEYMOUR as a candidate, although he has written two letters withdrawing his name. But as some of his own party papers treat Mr. SEYMOUR's letters as Mr. TOOTS used to treat himself, as of no consequence, it may be assumed that his withdrawal is purely a flourish, and that Bucks will be found "willin' if an unanimous Convention insists." Indeed, one of the most gratifying spectacles that could be offered to the lovers of blushing sincerity is presented by Mr. HORATIO SEYMOUR at Tammany Hall, on the 4th of July next, declaring, with his hand upon his heart, that he reluctantly yielded his most fervent and cherished desire of peace to the overwhelming entreaty of friends whose wishes it was his duty to prefer to his own. But unless he takes great care he will be left without a chance to decline. The Democratic party are very likely to demand a man of positive opinions—a war man or a peace man; a man like HANCOCK who fought, a man like JOHNSON who denounced the war, and was a secessionist. But a mere trimmer, who has nothing to recommend him to either powerful faction of his party except that he said he preferred to have a system of slavery to that of the Union—does not Mr. SEYMOUR think the chances of such a candidate are much doubtful?

This decided expression of opinion in favor of virtual repudiation by the Democratic majority of the New York Legislature, shows that the National Convention of the party will be irresistibly urged to declare itself in the same way. Crafty managers may try to avoid it, but the party will probably do in the matter of repudiation what that at Chicago in 1864 did in the matter of the war. Whatever might have been the wish of the managers, VALLANDIGHAM and the peace Copperheads had their way, and declared the war a failure. The Chicago platform of 1864 virtually demanded surrender to the rebellion; the New York platform of 1868 will virtually demand repudiation. The Chicago Convention put a soldier upon their peace platform. But even Mr. SEYMOUR could hardly accommodate himself to a platform of repudiation. The campaign against him would be fought by his latest Tweddle Hall speeches. And if he could be persuaded into the droll contest he would merely take his place by the side of M'CLELLAN.

Mr. PENDLETON comes into the Convention saying, "I openly opposed the war; you, my friends, opposed it secretly. I am perfectly willing to cast contempt upon the war-debt, by paying paper instead of gold. You can plead the letter of the party, and go with me. As for Brother SEYMOUR, he is a fossil." And with their unerring instinct for the course which an honest and honorable people detest, the chance undoubtedly is, that the Democratic managers will acquiesce in the nomination of Mr. PENDLETON.

MR. EVARTS AND THE PARTY.

THE speech of Mr. EVARTS in the Impeachment trial was very long, and very ingeniously set forth his views upon the nature of the Government, and upon the rhetoric and manners of the Senate, but even in the debates of the House of Representatives and in the conduct of the Impeachment. It was a very characteristic speech, and showed the intellectual accomplishments, the grave, polished, and sarcastic humor, and the ample and rather diffuse rhetoric of the distinguished lawyer. But as an attempt to point out the chief executive magistrate of the United States as deliberately violate the laws under the plea that he wishes to test their constitutionality, it was as hopelessly futile as every such attempt must be. The checks and balances of our constitutional system are undoubtedly very shrewdly designed—the independence of each branch of the Government with certain checks unquestionably necessary—the disadvantages of concentrating the legislative and executive powers in one assembly is undeniable. But all these considerations are not clearer nor more conclusive than the fact that the claim of the President to impose his veto upon a law after his veto has been constitutionally overruled is a concentration of power in the Executive that deranges all the checks and balances, destroys the independence of the other chief branches of the Government, and subordinates the latter to the will of one man. A more intolerable doctrine could not be urged. We are quite willing to omit all the other lame arguments of this one for the purpose of the argument merely. For if the position that Mr. EVARTS assumed be correct, the Government is not the Government which the people believe it to be.

It is, however, unnecessary now to pursue that inquiry. We differ, and we have no doubt that the most thoughtful people in the country differ, from those who called the theory of the Government necessarily resulting from the argument of Mr. EVARTS. The special occasion of his argument has passed. But it has not passed without some very severe strictures upon the course of Mr. EVARTS from his party friends. His consent to serve as one of the President's counsel has been apparently regarded by some critics of warm imagination as a virtual recognition of the Republican party. Why, it has been added, should a man oppose the President's personal policy in Congress, and then defend him from a charge of impeachment in the next April? But, we ask in turn, why shouldn't he? It is one of the most ancient principles of enlightened civilization that no man shall be condemned without a fair hearing and trial. Let us look at this case. The President, a renegade to his party, is impeached. His counsel are all politically his friends. His judges are the Senate, politically his enemies. He asks that of the most distinguished lawyers in the country, politically opposed to him, to help his defense; and three considerations probably decided that lawyer to accept.

In the first place, as a lawyer he would not decline a call to secure a legitimate defense to a political foe charged with the gravest political crime, any more than he would refuse to defend him from a charge of murder. His professional honor binds him. Not, indeed, to strain the law, nor to distort the fact, nor to conceal plausibly the guilty abhorrent or unfair, but to a plain defense upon such grounds as the case may afford, in order that the forms of law and truth are the safeguard of every citizen, be observed. And, secondly, when a case commits himself to the political theories upon which the action has proceeded—he then, of course, becomes no longer politically, and not only professionally, identified with his client. We say, so far as the special question is concerned. But it by no means follows that he has relinquished his political sympathies as to the proper general policy of the Government, which is the point of party separation. Very possibly Mr. EVARTS is of the opinion that the Government was not tenable upon the grounds alleged. But that does not show that he approves of the President's theory of reconstruction, nor that he is opposed to the Congressional policy of equal rights as the basis of reconstruction. It merely shows, that in his judgment the President's removal of Mr. STANTON, although it may have been a foolish act, was not in law properly an impeachable offense. Such an opinion seems to us most erroneous and perilous in its tendency. But certainly a man may hold it and be just as good a Republican as General BUTLER.

In the second place, it is very conceivable that Mr. EVARTS thought it to be desirable, even in a party view, that not the most important of the President's advisers, under the circumstances, should be of the Republican party. It preserved at least the air of impartiality. The Senate might well be supposed willing to hear with candor from a political friend the argument which it might naturally distrust in a political opponent. And in the third place, the very imaginable desire of an able lawyer, who felt his adequacy to the occasion, to be conspicuously associated with a most memorable and historic trial, may have had some influence in persuading Mr. EVARTS to appear for the President.

There is certainly nothing in the fact that a great lawyer consents to appear upon either side of a great case, always supposing a simple desire that there may be a fair hearing, and that justice may be done, which should subject him to censure. Further, in this particular instance a man may, upon the point in question, hold that the President's position is justifiable. Does he thereby show himself recreant to his political principles or to the party with which he acts? Not at all. Impeachment upon the grounds alleged has been indeed generally regarded by the sympathy and by the profound conviction of the dominant party, but it is not rightfully a party test. Sincere men may have believed in its propriety and necessity, it is plainly not of a nature to be made a party test. But the constitutional removal of the President should have been made such, and the particular occasion and the policy of any particular effort must necessarily be left open to individual judgment.

Nothing can be more fatal and sophistical and inconsistent than the tone of the New York Tribune upon this subject. During the delivery of the speech of Mr. EVARTS the Tribune argued with unusual heat and bitterness that the question was whether Mr. JOHNSON should be removed for usurping the authority of Congress on reconstruction, and declared that any Senator who should vote for his acquittal would look for his future outside of New York party. Now, Mr. JOHNSON'S usurpations have been flagrant for two years and more; yet, down to the 22d of February, the Tribune was opposed to impeachment. The President's usurpation was as manifest and as violent in the violation of the Tenure-of-Office Act then it had been for a long time before; and whatever defense was offered the occasion which should be improved for the constitutional removal was a question of expediency solely. Congress had no doubt of it. Most Republican journals had no doubt of it. We certainly had no doubt of it. But the Tribune had the same right to excommunicate Mr. EVARTS because he did not think impeachment expedient when they did, as General BUTLER and Mr. BOUTWELL had to excommunicate the Tribune because it did not think impeachment expedient when they did. Perhaps, however, the Tribune may see some reason for modifying the position of Mr. EVARTS as a regenade Republican when it remembers that he at least appears for the Government against Mr. JEFFERSON DAVIS, and not as his counsel or bail.

A PUBLIC DISGRACE.

THE country is disgraced by the Alta Vela debate and the quarrel between Mr. DONNELLY and Mr. WASHBURNE in the House of Representatives, and the President himself wince as he reflects that a nation must fairly be judged by the representatives it elects. The offenders in both these unprofitable scenes were chiefly Republicans; but if they or their colleagues who sat by and apparently laughed, suppose that a party can be publicly disgraced by the conduct of some of its representatives without seriously suffering they are profoundly mistaken. In the days of slavery we used to hear of plantation manners in Congress. But nothing more pitiful than the ribaldry is reported, or which we speak, was ever known in any deliberative assembly.

In the Alta Vela discussion Mr. LOGAN spoke of Mr. JAMES BROOKS's resolutions as "villainously attacking" character, when the Speaker called him to order. Again he declared that a gentleman had "knowingly lied about" some one, and the gentleman knew it. Mr. LOGAN was again called to order, his words taken down, and they were declared unparliamentary by the Speaker. General BUTLER, in explaining his share in the affair, alluded to a suit against "a fellow by the name of BROOKS." "The two BROOKSES had robbed this CLARKE." But "the affair was nasty, and not so fertile as genius." He further said that he would rather have taken the case with Judge BLACK in the Impeachment case "than with a pseudo-Republican who had been employed for that purpose;" and again alluded to Mr. EVARTS as a man who had stolen the livery of heaven to serve the devil in. Mr. ELDREDGE refused to yield the floor to Mr. LOGAN, saying—according to the report—"the member can't be a gentleman and treat his political opponent with politeness and civility." Mr. LOGAN retorted,

"You can't expect any thing else from a black-guard, and I don't take that back." MR. BROOKS said that "he never entered into discussion with such men as BUTLER and LOGAN." MR. BUTLER asked MR. BROOKS if he had not called him a gold-robber when he was in the service of his country. MR. BROOKS answered that the gentleman would never forgive him because he was the means of extorting from him sixty thousand dollars that had been taken from certain citizens in New Orleans. Moreover, MR. BUTLER had threatened him, and because the attention of the House had been drawn to the fact, had pursued him with a volley of abuse and vituperative language, which was fitter for Billingsgate and Newgate than for Massachusetts. MR. BUTLER called MR. BROOKS a coward. He tried to excuse himself, and proceeded to deride MR. BUTLER'S feats at Big Bethel and Fort Fisher, and spoke of "the beauty and booty (applause) the booty) of New Orleans," being reminded by the Speaker that all this had nothing to do with Alta Vela, MR. BROOKS added, that when MR. BUTLER retreated he did home from the war "he was attacked by a common bricklayer for insulting his wife, and soundly thrashed."

The next day, under plea of making a personal explanation, MR. IGNATIUS DONNELLY, of Minnesota, made a speech, ridiculing and vituperating MR. E. B. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, in a strain quite unprecedented and supremely shameful. The House listened and laughed. The House sat quietly and heard one of its members gibber like a monkey, in an indescribable harangue, as follows:

"I stand here repeating the challenge that if any where on God's earth, down in the mire of filth and all sordidness, the gentleman can plunge his hand which touches my honor, let it come: I shall meet it on its merits. I have gone through strange intelligence; I have analyzed the entire contents of the gentleman's brain pan. I have slipped my hand in, as I said, and I have examined the half-digested fragments which I first floating in the gastric juice; but if it is possible for the gentleman from Illinois [MR. WASHburne] to descend to a depth of moral degradation, more disgusting and more contemptible even than before, in God's name let it come..... If there be in our midst a man who, for vulgar self-aggrandizement, can disfigure intelligence, one heart callous to every kindly sentiment and to every generous emotion, one tongue leprous with slander, one mouth which is the very garden of foul breaths giving forth deadly odors; if there be here one character, which, while blotched and spotted, yet reves, and rants, and blackguards like a prostitute, if there be here one bold, bad, ranting, yelling demagogue, it is the gentleman from Illinois."

Speaker COLFAX, with a just respect for the honor of the House, which the House itself did not feel, stated in substance that MR. DONNELLY that his remarks were not honorable to the House of Representatives, and that although the House tolerated them, the Chair could not consent that they should go upon the record except with this protest.

In reply MR. WASHBURNE said:

"I desire only to say that if, under any operation of circumstances, were ever called upon to make a personal explanation in reply to a member, it would not be to a member who had committed the crime of not not be to a member who had run away; it would not be to a member who had changed his name; it would not be to a member whose whole record in this House is covered with vanity, corruption, and cowardice."

The Speaker called him also to order.

But the most painful and mortifying part of the affair is that the House, a hundred and thirty members of it reported, King among them, not only suffered this outrage upon common decency to continue, but actually extended MR. DONNELLY a time in which to disgrace Congress and the country. It is incredible that such men as MR. ELIOT, or MR. DAWES, of Massachusetts, or MR. MCCARTHY and others, of New York—indeed, almost honorable gentlemen from any—might name—could have been present and have refrained from protesting with indignation, in the name of the whole country, against such a gross insult to themselves and to their constituents. The damage which those who spoke and those who listened and cheered have done to their party reputation is most serious. And, as the time approaches when nominations are to be made to the next Congress, let this shameful occurrence admonish us to select men who, among the many necessary qualifications, have enough self-respect neither to indulge in such conduct nor to applaud it.

UNION OF CHURCH AND STATE IN NEW YORK.

In the Assembly of New York MR. FLAGG, of Troy, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, recently introduced a "Charity bill," or a grant of money to various charitable institutions. The State money given for charities, although the principle involved is denounced by many wise political thinkers, is generally given without grudging; and if MR. FLAGG had stopped at what it pretended to be there would, probably, have been no very serious objection. But it was not what it pretended to be. It was a special grant of State money to the schools of a particular denomination—the Roman Catholic—and as such was a fraud upon the people of the State.

The bill, as reported, was a political act of homage to the Roman Catholic denomination. MR. FLAGG is a Democrat. The majority of the Assembly were Democrats. They knew that their great party reliance in the State is the vote of the city of New York, and that a large part of that vote is derived from the citizens of Irish birth who are Roman Catholics. They knew how hostile the priests of that Church are to the common-school system of the State, and how anxious those priests are to obtain a share of the school fund in proportion to the number of members of their communion, in order to secure control of the education of their youth. Mr. FLAGG's bill was a plain into the hands of the priests of the Roman Catholic Church, to give them money from the State Treasury for the support of their denominational schools. It was an attempt in this State to do what Austria has just stopped doing, amidst the acclamation of all wise men; namely, to endow education at the expense of the State in a particular religious faith. Besides all the money which by State and local authority is taken out of the purses of the tax-payers to provide public schools, the bill children of every faith in the State, this bill proposed a special tax in favor of one denomination. Thus every tax-payer would be compelled to pay twice for the education of the Roman Catholic children which this pretended charity bill proposed to assist—first, in his tax for the unsectarian public schools to which children may go, if the ministers of their church would permit; and second, for the special schools named, whose those ministers would not permit.

Now if the Assembly of New York needs to renounce one of the most precious and fundamental principles of a free government—the absolute separation of Church and State—which proposes to educate children in a particular religious faith, why does it select the Roman Catholic—the one which comprises a small minority of the population—and not the much least sympathy with all other denominations? If MR. FLAGG wishes the State to support sectarian schools, why does he not select those of the various Protestant sects, with which at least a general affinity? The reason is very evident. The Roman Catholics in the cities are a political power.

MR. FLAGG's bill as reported contained provision for the gift of $56,500 to seventeen Roman Catholic churches in the city of New York, to aid in the maintenance of parochial schools under its charge." If our fellow-citizens of the Roman Catholic denomination, or of the Presbyterian, or of the Episcopal, or of the Unitarian, or Moravian, or of any other denomination whatever, prefer that their children shall not attend the public schools, let them provide private schools for them and support and teach them! But when Methodist, or Baptist, or Presbyterian, or Unitarian, or Moravian, asks of the State to support his sectarian school in addition to that which the State has already provided for all the children, a wise State will benignly answer that he is making a very foolish request. Now, it is not supposed that any sectarian in the denomination known as Roman Catholic that it must not be placed upon the same plane with all other denominations?

A more flagrant violation of one of the great principles of our system, and a more audacious bid for party support, could not be offered than that contained in MR. FLAGG's bill as reported. It is a matter of universal concern to the people of this State. If the bill as reported becomes a law, let every citizen understand that under Democratic leadership it is safe to support denominational schools, and remember that his remedy lies in not sending to the Legislature men whose interests lead them to support Roman Catholic schools at the expense of the whole people.

THE COMMON SCHOOLS OF NEW YORK.

THE Annual Report of the Superintendent of Public Instruction has been laid before the Legislature, and contains, as usual, very interesting statistics and several important suggestions. The relation of education to the common welfare is a trite subject, but it has been remarkably refreshed in public attention by the recent political movements in England, and by our own experience in America. MR. RICE, the late State Superintendent, devoted himself with untiring zeal and intelligent interest to his most important duties. Besides his Annual Report, he presented to the Legislature a Special Report upon the present state of education in this and other countries, and on compulsory education—a most important document of unique value, in the preparation of which MR. RICE expresses his obligations to MR. A. G. JOHNSON of his Department. This is a work to which we shall refer hereafter, which is full of information for every person interested in the subject of education.

The number of school districts in the State as reported is 11,722; of school-houses, 11,556, of which 172 are log-houses. The cost of their erection and improvement during the year was $1,713,107 01. The aggregate cost for ten years past is $7,947,758 17. The present value of buildings and sites is estimated at $16,180,596. The average value of school-houses in the cities is $20,844 43; in the rural districts, $693 92. The number of children between five and twenty-one years is reported at 1,376,982—in the cities 531,579, and in the rural districts 845,603. Of these 849,203 attended school; the average daily attendance 419,957. The entire attendance of the year at all the colleges, academies, public and private schools, in the State was 1,058,165. The number of teachers in the public schools for the year was 26,489, of which 5271 were men, and 22,218 were women. The amount of salaries paid them was $4,826,471 64. The average annual salary of a teacher in the city is $182; in the country, $216 73. Including all expenses, the total annual cost of the public schools for the last year was $7,683,201 22; in the cities, $3,992,893 20; and in the rural districts, $3,690,308 02.

MR. RICE recommends the levy of a tax for five successive years of one-eighth of all upon every dollar of taxable property, to aid in the erection of school-houses and buildings. He does this because outside of the cities there are 1059 districts that do not own the site of their school-houses, and which the school-house and apparatus are not properly separated from the highway and 2278 without the most necessary outbuildings. How wretched these houses must be is evident from the fact that the average value of all the school buildings in the rural districts, with their sites, is only $693 92.

MR. RICE moreover also recommends making a new office, called School Visitor, the term to be one year, and the office to be filled exclusively by women. The duties are to be the care of the libraries, the inspection of the condition, furniture, and conveniences of the schoolhouses, hunting up absentees, and careful inquiry into the children of the poor. MR. RICE is of opinion that the very thirty thousand women would gratuitously do more for the schools in such ways than an army of paid men whose occupation of visiting would also in such duties. He also recommends a liberal annual appropriation to the Children's Aid Society and other similar associations devoted to the elevation of poor children. He thinks, also, there should be special officers for vagrancy, and special reformatory and industrial schools for vagrant children, so that the necessary money be obtained from the license fees. Finally, when we know that in the city of New York there are not less than 40,000 vagrant children, between the ages of five and fifteen, it does not seem premature to propose some remedy.

The last Report of the Superintendent should be studied by every good citizen, as carefully as any report of any Department, for it treats of the very foundation of the State. The Report of MR. S. S. RANDALL, the City Superintendent, which is also full of interest and value, our space warns us to defer to another day.

A WONDER OF ART.

THERE is now upon exhibition at SCHAUSS'S in Broadway one of the most remarkable works ever executed with patient patience and ingenuity interesting not only to the connoisseur of art, but to the student of the human frame and its forces. It is a sublime picture, with the exquisite delicacy of a line engraving in sepia or India ink, called "A Rat-catcher with his Dogs." It represents a rat-catcher sitting just over a rat-hole with a spud in his hands, while his four dogs await the appearance of the rats from the hole into which the rat-catcher's whole empty cage is upon the bank, have descended. The marvelous expression of every hair of every dog is not less striking than the fierce fire of the old rat-catcher. But the wonder of the work is the fact of its execution. It is a picture painted with a hair-brush from the mane of a wholly unemployed man, who had scarcely any instruction in drawing. The story is so incredible that the English gentleman who owns the picture has shown the evidence of its perfect genuineness to several well-known citizens, who have signed a certificate assuring the public that the facts are unquestionably as stated. Among those who have thus signed are WILLIAM C. BRYANT; D. HUNTINGTON, President of the National Academy of Design; H. T. TUCKERMAN; C. A. DANA; JOHN C. GREENE, President of the Erie Railway; HURD & HOUGHTON; and JOHN B. BOUTON. We have satisfied ourselves also by the most ample proof that there is no question of the authenticity of the work, and we unreservedly commend it to public attention both for its intrinsic merit, which is wonderful, and for the wonder of its execution.

JOHN CARTER, who drew the picture, lived in the parish of Coggeshall, not many miles from London, and the vicar of the parish, REV. JAMES BEN's death, wrote a brief biography, which was published by J. W. PARKER & SON, among the earliest respectable English publishers. From this little memoir we have but space to quote a letter of CARTER'S, telling his own story. A facsimile of the letter, which he speaks is also in MR. SCHAUSS'S, with two or three interesting little studies, and a slight pencil outline of CARTER'S face, singularly sweet and refined. The letter is dated Coggeshall, July 17, 1845:

"DEAR SIR,—I am sorry to inform you that when I have written down my name and age, they are as follows: My name is John Carter, and I am in the seven years of age the 21st of this month (July, 1845). About two years since I have been taught to read and write, and made some little progress in arithmetic. I was soon sick of the small pox inside. After assisting the weavers for some time, I was put to a loom, and learned to weave in the figured branch; and, following the example of my fellow-workmen, I was frequently at the public house, and soon took delight in all riotous mischief. It was when I went to school that I first remember having an inclination for drawing. Whenever I had a piece of paper in my hand, way went the pencil, on my books or on my slate, and at home on the wall, or anywhere I could get at it, for which I have been whipped. After I had lost the use of my limbs, was as follows: Being fond of reading, I used to borrow books from my neighbors and others. My wife one day brought home for me a tract which gave an account of a young woman in some asylum at Liverpool who had lost the use of her limbs, and used to amuse herself by drawing with her mouth. The thought at once came into my mind that I might certainly do the same, and I could not rest satisfied till I made the attempt. My first piece was a Butterfly, in water-colors. After drawing in this way for some time I at last adopted the style in which I still continue to draw, which is to shade them after the manner of a line engraving. Dear Sir, I hope your health is improving. May God bless you with all happiness.

"I remain your humble servant,

"JOHN CARTER."

FOUNDER'S DAY.

FOUNDER'S DAY at Vassar College, on the 29th of April, was one of those pleasant reunions which will make the most pleasantly remembered. It is an admirable custom for the faculty and students of the college to recognize, with music and flowers and pious offices, the birthday of the generous Founder, who has shown that he regards himself merely as the steward of the DIVINE bounty, and carefully distributes it.

BELLOWING IN SLEEPING CARS.

Ed. Harper's Weekly:

As the tired and foot-sore traveler generally retires early during car to indulge in the wildest mirth and hilarity, I suggest that as a fitting place to converse loudly and at length upon topics which are more to interest and enchant himyour own affairs.

These remarks are addressed to MESSRS. BOARDERS AND STEVE. If I possessed as good a voice as either of these gentlemen, I should prosecd to a sleeping car on any of the main routes of travel and, in a voice loudly to be heard, "Where's my berth?" and continue to bellow at intervals, until the tired and foot-sore travelers were satisfied of my impertinence, and fully interested that their comfort, for which they paid as much as I, was of very small account. I should consider this the gentlemanly thing to do; and when I am traveling, by Jove, Sir, that gives these commercial travelers, and that class of fellows, Sir, to understand that you are not obliged to be civil to them with a beggarly bag; no, Sir. I should roar on all times, not gently, like a sucking dove, but like a typhoon, and I would not think of stopping and the passengers' sleep as well, and they and the babies might answer crying, crying!

To a person who has traveled from New city to New York city without stopping, a night's sleep before he gets home to his family is a mere nothing; if it is of any importance, he is a fool to look for it in a sleeping car. I therefore hope that, if it is a pleasure to them, MESSRS. BOARDERS AND STEVE will come into the sleeping car at every opportunity, and bellow loudly on any subject they may condescend to enlighten us upon.

A CHIP.

A NEWSPAPER in Alabama, which is not radical, but rebel, has the following. It is illustrative of the spirit which keeps the party of the Democratic party to obtain the political control of the country. It is headed "GRAND CIRCULAR."

"These are now before the public. They are issued by a committee comprised of such men as W. B. STOWE, A. G. MAHAN, JOHN GODWIN, and others of other names, more respectable, now contemned by all honest men. . . . . WE HAVE NOT room or inclination to tell you plainly that our views are any thing but favorable to the election of the blue lie over to the highest office in the gift of the people. Although we have no partiality for any one party now, yet we reason enough pride in our subdued hearts to wish to see the loud-mouthed radicals of the land humiliated, and not by a namskull who, not content with the natural depravity of his own instincts, invites a more than ordinary share of drunk publicity! The voice of the people is sacred, and a null quibble is a position. . . . . Gentlemen of insufferable impudence, send no more circulars to Alabama. Your impudence will fall tamely upon the fancies of honest Southern men, and can only be answered by the only race they are likely to please—the negroes."

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

IMPEACHMENT.

As this paper goes to press the trial of the impeachment of PRESIDENT JOHNSON is rapidly progressing, and, MR. Bingham, one of the Managers, being engaged in making the closing argument, MR. CURTIS' former report side and lengthy arguments have been made in the case by Messrs. Stanbery, Groesbeck, Everts and Stanbery. The case is to be submitted immediately on the conclusion of MR. BINGHAM'S argument to the Senate; and probably the decision will be known by the date of this present publication.

FOREIGN NEWS.

MR. DISRAELI was compelled, on May 4, to resign his office as Premier of England, and Mr. GLADSTONE was elected action of some of his own cabinet. He called a session of his Cabinet on May 4, and announced to the members his intention to resign office until a general election could be held. Lord Stanley, the Earl of Carnarvon, and Mr. Henley refused to serve under MR. DISRAELI under such circumstances; and the latter was the first to resign. The Duke of Buccleuch and the Marquis of Salisbury have declined to accept office, and the Duke of Cambridge will therefore succeed to the office. Parliament will be dissolved in the autumn, when a general election will be held. On the same night, in the House of Commons, Mr. Ayrton moved MR. GLADSTONE, the latter gave notice that the Opposition, which he knew, would push the latter to an early settlement.

CHAPTER I.

My fair friend, Miss Clack, having laid down the pen, there are two reasons for my taking it up next, in my turn.

In the first place, I am in a position to throw the necessary light on certain points of interest which have thus far been left in the dark. Miss Verinder had her own private reason for breaking her marriage engagement—and I was at the bottom of it. Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite had his own private reason for withdrawing all claim to the hand of his charming cousin—and I discovered what it was.

In the second place, it was my good or ill fortune, I hardly know which, to find myself personally involved—at the period of which I am now writing—in the mystery of the Indian Diamond. I had the honor of an interview, at my own office, with an Oriental stranger of distinguished manners, who was no other, unquestionably, than the chief of the three Indians. Add to this, that I met with the celebrated traveler, Mr. Murthwaite, the day afterward, and that I held a conversation with him on the subject of the Moonstone, which has a very important bearing on later events. And there you have the statement of my claims to fill the position which I occupy in these pages.

The true story of the broken marriage engagement comes first in point of time, and must therefore take the first place in the present narrative. Tracing my way back along the chain of events, from one end to the other, I find it necessary to open the scene, oddly enough as you will think, at the bedside of my excellent client and friend, the late Sir John Verinder.

Sir John had his failure—perhaps rather a large share—of the more harmless and amiable of the weaknesses incidental to humanity. Among these, I may mention as applicable to the matter in hand, an invincible reluctance—so long as he enjoyed his usual good health—to face the responsibility of making his will. Lady Verinder exerted her influence to rouse him to a sense of duty in this matter; and I exerted my influence. He admitted the justice of our views—but he went no further than that, until he found himself afflicted with the illness which ultimately brought him to his grave. Then, I was sent for at last, to take my client's instructions on the subject of his will. They proved to be simplest instructions I had ever received in the whole of my professional career.

Sir John was dozing, when I entered the room. He roused himself at the sight of me.

"How do you do, Mr. Bruff?" he said. "I shan't be very long about this. And then I'll go to sleep again." He looked on with great interest while I collected pens, ink, and paper. "Are you ready?" he asked. I bowed, and took a dip of ink, and waited for my instructions.

"Every thing to my wife," said Sir John. "That's all." He turned round on his pillow, and composed himself to sleep again.

I was obliged to disturb him.

"Am I to understand," I asked, "that you leave the whole of the property, of every sort and description, of which you die possessed, absolutely to Lady Verinder?"

"Yes," said Sir John. "Only I put it shorter. Why can't you put it shorter, and let me go to sleep again? Every thing to my wife. That's my Will."

His property was entirely at his own disposal, and was of two kinds. Property in land (I purposely abstain from using technical language), and property in money. In the majority of cases, I am afraid I should have felt it my duty to my client to ask him to reconsider his Will. In the case of Sir John, I knew Lady Verinder to be, not only worthy of the unreserved trust which her husband had placed in her (all good wives are worthy of that)—but to be also capable of properly administering a trust, which, in my experience of the fair sex, not one in a thousand of them is competent to do). In ten minutes Sir John Will was drawn up, executed, and Sir John himself, good man, was finishing his interrupted nap.

Lady Verinder amply justified the confidence which her husband had placed in her. In the first days of her widowhood she came to me, and made her Will. The view she took of her position was so thoroughly sound and sensible that I was relieved of all necessity for advising her. My responsibility began and ended with shaping her instructions into the proper legal form. Before Sir John had been a fortnight in his grave the future of his daughter had been most wisely and most affectionately provided for.

The Will remained in its formal box at my office, through more years than I like to reckon up. It was not till the summer of eighteen hundred and forty-eight that I found occasion to look at it again under very melancholy circumstances.

At the date I have mentioned the doctors pronounced the sentence on poor Lady Verinder, which was literally a sentence of death. I was the first person whom she informed of her situation; and I found her anxious to go over her Will again with me.

It was impossible to improve the provisions relating to her daughter. But, in the lapse of time, her wishes in regard to certain minor legacies, left to different relations, underwent some modification; and it became necessary to add three or four Codicils to the original document. Having done this at once, for fear of accidents, I obtained her ladyship's permission to embody her recent instructions in a second Will. My object was to avoid the confusion and confusions and repetitions which now disfigured the original document, and which, to own the truth, gaped sadly on the experienced glance of the fitness of things.

The execution of this second Will has been described by Miss Clack, who was so obliging as to witness it. So far as regards Rachel Verinder's pecuniary interests, it was, in fact, the only important part of the first Will. The only changes introduced related to the appointment of a guardian, and to certain provisions concerning that appointment, which were made under my advice. On Lady Verinder's death, Mr. Ablewhite, as the friend of my client, was to be "proved" (as the phrase is) in the usual way.

In about three weeks from that time—as well as I can remember—the first warning reached me of something unusual going on under the surface. I happened to be looking in at my friend the proctor's office, and I observed that he received me with an appearance of greater interest than usual.

"I have some news for you," he said. "What do you think I heard at Doctors' Commons this morning? Lady Verinder's Will has been asked for, and examined, already!"

This was news indeed! There was absolutely nothing which could be contested in the Will; and there was nobody I could think of who had the slightest interest in examining it. (I shall perhaps do well if I explain in this place, for the benefit of the few people who don't know it already, that the law allows all Wills to be examined at Doctors' Commons by any body who applies, on the payment of a shilling fee.)

"Did you hear who asked for the Will?" I inquired.

"Yes: the clerk had no hesitation in telling me. Mr. Smalley, of the firm of Skipp & Smalley, asked for it. The Will has not been copied yet into the great Folio Registers. So there was no alternative but to depart from the usual course, and to let him see the original document. He looked it over carefully, and made a note in his pocket-book. Have you any idea of what he wanted with it?"

I shook my head. "I shall find out," I answered, "before I am a day older." With that I sent back at once to my own office.

If any other firm of solicitors had been concerned in this unaccountable examination of my deceased client's Will I might have found some difficulty in making the necessary discovery. But I had a hold over Skipp & Smalley which made my course in this matter a comparatively easy one. My common-law clerk (a most competent and excellent man) was a brother of Mr. Smalley's; and, owing to this sort of indirect connection with me, Skipp & Smalley had, for some years past, picked up the crumbs that fell from my table, in the shape of cases brought to my office, which, for various reasons, I did not think it worth while to undertake. My professional patronage was, in this way, of some importance to the firm. I intended, if necessary, to remind them of that patronage on the present occasion.

The moment I got back I spoke to my clerk; and after telling him what had happened I sent him to his brother's office, "with Mr. Bruff's compliments, and he would be glad to know why Messrs. Skipp & Smalley had found it necessary to examine Lady Verinder's Will."

This message brought Mr. Smalley back to my office, in company with his brother. He acknowledged that he had acted under instructions received from a client. And then he put it to me, whether it would not be a breach of professional confidence on his part to say more.

We had a smart discussion upon that. He was right, no doubt; and I was wrong. The truth is, I was angry and suspicious—and I insisted on knowing more. Worse still, I declined to consider any additional information offered to me, as a secret placed in my keeping: I claimed perfect freedom to use my own discretion. Worse even than that, I took an unwarrantable advantage of my position. "Choose, Sir," I said to Mr. Smalley, "between the risk of losing your client's business, and the risk of losing Mine." Quite indefensible, I admit—an act of tyranny, and nothing less. Like other tyrants, I carried my point. Mr. Smalley chose his alternative, without a moment's hesitation. He smiled resignedly, and gave up the name of his client:

Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite.

That was enough for me—I wanted to know no more.

Having reached this point in my narrative, it now becomes necessary to place the reader of these lines—so far as Lady Verinder's Will is concerned—on a footing of perfect equality, in respect of information, with myself.

Let me state, then, in the fewest possible words, that Rachel Verinder had nothing but a life-interest in the property. Her mother's excellent sense, and my long experience, had combined to relieve her of all responsibility, and to guard her from all danger of becoming the victim in the future of some needy and unscrupulous man. Neither she nor her husband (if she married) could raise sixpence, either on the property in land or on the property in money. They would have the houses in London and in Yorkshire to live in, and they would have the handsome income—and that was all.

When I came to think over what I had discovered, I was sorely perplexed what to do next.

Hardly a week had passed since I had heard (to my surprise and distress) of Miss Verinder's proposed marriage. I had the sincerest admiration and affection for her; and I had been inexpressibly grieved when I heard that she was about to throw herself away on Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite. And now, here was this man—whom I had always believed to be a smooth-tongued impostor—justifying the very worst that I had thought of him, and plainly revealing the mercenary object of the marriage, on his side! And what of that?—you may reply—the thing is done every day. Granted, my dear Sir. But would you think of it quite so lightly as you do, if the thing was done (let us say) with your own sister?

The first consideration which now naturally occurred to me, was this. Would Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite hold to his engagement, after what his lawyer had discovered for him?

I depended entirely on his pecuniary position, of which I knew nothing. If that position was not a desperate one, it would be well worth his while to marry Miss Verinder for her income alone. If, on the other hand, he stood in urgent need of realizing a large sum by a given time, then Lady Verinder's Will would exactly meet the case, and would preserve her daughter from falling into a scoundrel's hands.

In the latter event, there would be no need for me to distress Miss Rachel, in the first days of her mourning for her mother, by an immediate revelation of the truth. In the former event, if I remained silent, I should be conniving at a marriage which would make her miserable for life.

My doubts ended in my calling at the hotel in London, at which I knew Mrs. Ablewhite and Miss Verinder to be staying. They informed me that they were going to Brighton the next day, and that an unexpected obstacle prevented Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite from accompanying them. I at once proposed to take his place. When I was only thinking of Rachel Verinder, it was possible to hesitate. When I actually saw her, my mind was made up directly, come what might of it, to tell her the truth.

I found my opportunity, when I was out walking with her, on the day after my arrival.

"May I speak to you," I asked, "about your marriage engagement?"

"Yes," she said, indifferently, "if you have nothing more interesting to talk about."

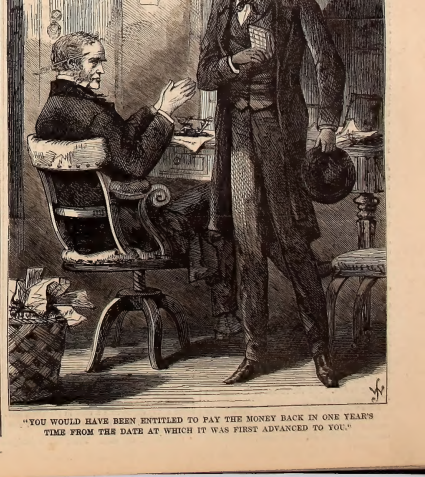
"Will you forgive an old friend and servant of your family, Miss Rachel, if I venture on asking whether your heart is set on this marriage?"

"I am marrying in despair, Mr. Bruff—on the chance of dropping into some sort of stagnant happiness which may reconcile me to my life."

Strong language! and suggestive of something below the surface, in the shape of a romance. But I had my own object in view, and I declined (as we lawyers say) to pursue the question into its side issues.

"Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite can hardly be of your way of thinking," I said. "His heart must be set on the marriage, at any rate?"

"He says so, and I suppose I ought to believe him. He would hardly marry me, after what I have owned to him, unless he was fond of me."



Poor thing! the bare idea of a man marrying her for his own selfish and mercenary ends had never entered her head. The task I had set myself began to look like a harder task than I had bargained for.

"It sounds strangely," I went on, "in my old-fashioned ears—"

"What sounds strangely?" she asked.

"To hear you speak of your future husband as if you were not quite sure of the sincerity of his attachment. Are you conscious of any reason in your own mind for doubting him?"

Her astonishing quickness of perception detected a change in my voice, or my manner,

"YOU WOULD HAVE BEEN ENTITLED TO PAY THE MONEY BACK IN ONE YEAR'S TIME FROM THE DATE AT WHICH IT WAS FIRST ADVANCED TO YOU."

when I put that question, which warned her that I had been speaking all along with some ulterior object in view. She stopped, and, taking her arm out of mine, looked me searchingly in the face.

"Mr. Bruff," she said, "you have something to tell me about Godfrey Aldewhite. Tell it."

I knew her well enough to take her at her word. I told it.

She put her arm again into mine, and walked on with me slowly. I felt her hand tightening its grasp mechanically on my arm, and I saw her getting paler and paler as I went on—but, not a word passed her lips while I was speaking. When I had done, she still kept silence. Her head drooped a little, and she walked by my side, unconscious of my presence, unconscious of every thing about her: lost—buried, I might almost say—in her own thoughts.

I made no attempt to disturb her. My experience of her disposition warned me, on this, as on former occasions, to give her time.

The first instinct of girls in general, on being told of any thing which interests them, is to ask a multitude of questions, and then to run off, and talk it all over with some favorite friend. Rachel Verinder's first instinct, under critical circumstances, was to shut herself up in her own mind, and to think it over by herself. This absolute self-dependence is a great virtue in a man. In a woman, it is the serious drawback of mortally separating her from the mass of her sex, and so exposing her to misconception by the general opinion. I strongly suspect myself of thinking as the rest of the world think in this matter—except in the case of Rachel Verinder. The self-dependence in her character was one of its virtues in my estimation; partly, no doubt, because I entirely sympathized and liked her; partly, because the view I took of her connection with the loss of the Moonstone was based on my own special knowledge of her disposition. Badly as appearances might look in the matter of the Diamond—shocking as it undoubtedly was to know that it was associated in any way with the mystery of an undiscovered theft—I was satisfied nevertheless that she had done nothing unworthy of herself. And I was also satisfied that she had not stirred a step in the business, without shutting herself up in her own mind, and thinking it over.

We had walked on, for nearly a mile I should think, before Rachel roused herself. She suddenly looked up at me with a faint reflection of her smile of happier times—the most irresistible smile I had ever seen on a woman's face.

"I owe you many apologies to your kindness," she said. "And I feel more deeply indebted to it now than ever. If you hear any rumors of my marriage with Godfrey, go back to London, contradict them at once, on my authority."

"Have you resolved to break your engagement?" I asked.

"Can you doubt it?" she returned, proudly, "after what you have told me?"

"My dear Miss Rachel, you are very young —and you may find more difficulty in withdrawing from your present position than you anticipate. There is no one—I mean a lady of course—whom you could consult?"

"No one," she answered.

It distressed me, it did indeed distress me, to hear her say that. She was so young and so lonely—and was she to do well? The impulse to help her got the better of any sense of my own unfitness which I might have felt under the circumstances, and I stated such ideas on the subject as occurred to me on the spur of the moment, to the best of my ability. I have advised a good many members of clients, and have dealt with some exceedingly awkward difficulties, in my time. But this was the first occasion on which I had ever found myself advising a young lady how to obtain her release from a marriage engagement. The suggestion I offered amounted briefly to this. I recommended her to tell Mr. Godfrey Ablewhite—at a private interview, of course—that he had, to her certain knowledge, betrayed the unworthy nature of the motives on his side. She was then to add that their marriage, after what she had discovered, was a simple impossibility; and she was to put it to him, whether he thought it wisest to secure her silence by falling in with her views, or to force her, by opposing them, to make the motive under which she was acting generally known. If he attempted to defend himself, or to deny the facts, she was, in that event, to refer him to me.
